Now we, no more than any man living, desire to prop our Christ into authority. If he cannot stand of himself, we say—let him fall down. We want not to be saddled, nor will we be saddled with anybody's dead weights in the name of religion. Nor do we give a moment's blind support to Christianity. Nor do we believe in it simply because our father did. Still, it seems to us that, in spite of THE INDEX's brief and specious strictures, Christ made this promise in violation of no principle of the universe. It enunciates only a whole truth. There is here no appeal to selfishness nor meanness. You cannot break up the relation between the cause and its effect. The universe is compensative. There would be no reason in it if it were not so. It could not be if it were not so. The waste that comes of sacrifice is compensated in the harvest which sacrifice gathers. What a man gives in feeling, sympathy, tears, money, life, is returned in the blessed consciousness of obedience to his best behests, in the joy that he has helped a soul—an orphan, a widow, a slave. The deed includes all these things. If he did not know that the "cup of water" would cool a hot lip, or allay a raging fever, he would not waste himself to secure it. It is this fact that makes it duty. To answer duty is to get reward. The rebound is the recompense.

Jesus simply announces in this promise the whole truth. He does not make it in the interest of selfishness. He says that in Christianity as in other spheres of life one's act involves, by an eternal necessity, a result, that the reward of the act inheres in and is essential part of it. THE INDEX believes this, and if it were not quickened by this faith it would never show its face again.

It is not good to have zeal without knowledge. It is not well for a man to be too smart. Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall. Our way with THE INDEX has been quite easy.

Spurgeon is reported as using some strong language, such as, "Through and through I believe the very heart of England is honey-combed with a damnable infidelity which dares still to go into the pulpit and call itself Christian."

A little boy in a Brooklyn Sunday School was asked recently what was the most beautiful verse in the Bible. After some hesitation, he replied blushing, "If any man pulls down the American flag, shoot him on the spot."

"Indeed, it seems to me that the glittering generalities of Free Religion and the load of metaphysical speculation which it labors under are not practically so efficient to carry conviction to the people, and rid us speedily of this despotic public opinion which would crush all free thought, as answers to such questions as the following, which have frequently been proposed to me—is the Bible inspired or not? Hundreds of your readers who do not believe in its inspiration would thank you to add your reasons to their own, so as to make out a strong case. Again—if the Bible is not true, what shall I believe? What is your idea of God, sin, atonement, future state, etc.? If we pull down, we must build up. The tendrils of faith reach out towards God, and if we wish to remove the clumsy, rotten lattice which shuts out the sunlight of God, yet let us substitute some strong, light support to the vine, which, if it grows, must grow upward. It may be said that the very spirit of Free Religion is opposed to proselytism, and does not wish to crystallize itself into a creed. True; and yet, if we claim the advance on previous systems, what is that advance? Are all our beliefs and opinions merely negative? If there is to be an aggressive element in Free Religion, should we not take such means to influence the masses as will first demolish such rotten defences as eternal wrath, atonement, Bible inspiration, etc., and then build up firmly the noble ideal of God, of man, the intimate relations existing between God and man, man and his brother? I am glad to see that in your last number you give a partial statement of belief. The article on Christianity and Civilization is a step in the right direction also. There are some liberal young men in the University, but not nearly so many as in our Eastern Colleges. Had the young professor of moral philosophy been elected at Cornell, that college would have been the nucleus of liberal thought in the country; for among such able and liberal men as Russell, Goldwin Smith, White, Prentiss, Wilder, Fiske, Wheeler and Cornell, he would not have been cramped into the narrow limits of dogmatic theology. The present fossil incumbent of the chair of metaphysics is perhaps the only weak spot in the fine faculty of Cornell University."

"Herewith I send you a year's subscription (dating from December 1st,) to your paper THE INDEX. I have read occasional numbers of it with great pleasure and spiritual expansion. I suppose I am what is called a heretic and infidel; but I am not of opinion that shocking the religious sentiments of my more conservative friends is a way of promoting their growth, and so I keep my doubts to myself, say out only such of my thoughts as are not likely to offend their sacred feelings, and keep a tolerable reputation as a Christian young woman. I wonder if you think that hypocrisy. I do not; because I am not faithless, nor unprincipled. I do believe—in human nature, its inherent possibilities and irresistible progress. That is about all I can earnestly assert. I am drifting off to Prof. Denton's latitude; but it seems to me that the most of modern Spiritualism is outrageously bad taste. I didn't mean to make this a personal letter. I believe that your paper is calculated to supply a need sorely felt among many of the uneducated, working, but thinking people. The experience of life and a knowledge of the mockery and hypocrisy of much that calls itself Christianity, brings many a humble workingman to the same conclusion reached—through purely mental processes, guided by some bitter acquaintance with narrowness—by the sons of colleges and divinity schools. I only wish you and they could more fully find each other out. Human nature does love to be appreciated, and I believe the effort of correct appreciation is the most rapid and complete growth. I am afraid I am indulging in platitudes."

"I regret to say I must discontinue taking THE INDEX for the present, therefore return the bill sent last week. Should there be any copies unpaid, please inform me, and I will attend at once. The paper has been sent me through a dear friend in New York the past year, therefore I have not kept account of copies. Allow me to say I have enjoyed the free, generous spirit of THE INDEX; and though I am in the midst of orthodoxy and have been denounced as an infidel for reading this paper, and though my early training and education was rigid, and my ideas were cramped and illiberal, yet through Mr. Frothingham, of New York, and dear William H. Furness, of this city, I am slowly and surely creeping out of darkness into the light; and among the best and truest memories of the past, will ever remain THE INDEX, whose teachings have not been in vain. Excuse the intrusion, but I could not refrain from giving in my testimony in favor of your liberal and faithful work. May you and your principles meet with every encouragement."

"It grieves me to think I can do so little for the good cause. My friends are rigidly conservative in religion, and fear and condemn my notions. Is there to be a bound volume of THE INDEX? I do hope so—you told us not to send the money for it at present. I distribute my papers among the Orthodox and hope the good fruit will be found in the future."

"A stout, healthy, wholesome person of about fifty, his fine head and strong manly voice told of power which could have won their way any where; and yet this man, with a wife and nine children absolutely dependent on his daily exertions, and these exertions limited to a little butcher's stand, and withal scouted and abused by his neighbors, has yet within the year or two past given some fifty dollars to the Radical cause, mostly through the Spiritualists. He, like all the other thinking minds I meet, is ill content with the literature of modern Spiritualism. They don't wish to be fed on dish water, but need some solid food. This man is too poor to pay for THE INDEX, and yet ought to have it. So if your fund for such cases is not gone, please send him the paper from that. If it is, send it and charge it to me."

"I feel a deep interest in the success of THE INDEX, as should every one who desires the triumph of religious liberty and the upbuilding of humanity. If liberal minds will but give a little time to the work of soliciting their friends and neighbors to subscribe for THE INDEX, there is no fear but that your paper can be made remunerative and encourage you to renewed effort in the noble cause you have so ably defended. Stand firm, my brother; never swerve from the line you have indicated and published to the world. Your effort is being appreciated by scores and hundreds of the noblest men and women of the country. Your paper must and will be sustained. May you have physical and mental strength to carry forward the great work you have begun, is the sincere desire of your friend."

"Before me is a badly torn (and partly missing) No. of THE INDEX—No. 4, vol. 2, Jan. 28, 1871,—which I found in a basket in a store, a few days since; and being inclined to read all new and old ideas of thinkers, I begged this, the only one of its character as yet seen by myself. After pasting it so as to keep it in shape as well as possible while I was reading, I have perused its columns with care and desire to understand your position. Your position is unlike that my mind occupies; but I am none the less, but rather the more, anxious to ascertain more than can be gleaned from No. 4, vol. 2, and as I see that you appear anxious to scatter a tract of sixteen pages, entitled TRUTH FOR THE TIMES, and that your proposition does not leave me so I cannot get a few, I venture to ask you to send me as many copies as four cents will pay the postage on."

"Allow me to suggest that your next lecture East be given in some milder season, unless it is true that Free Religion is so cold in itself that such a temperature is most congenial to its votaries. In that case I may perhaps be said to be lukewarm in my devotion to it, for I did not dare to go to Boston when the thermometer stood ten degrees below zero, although I had invited some friends to accompany me. But I have done what I could by my fireside this winter in enlightening my friends on the subject; and when my INDEX comes, I assemble my 'Radical Club' of two or three (I wish it were larger) and spend the pleasantest evening of the week with its essays and discussions."

"Free thought is the only basis of right, genuine, progressive ideas, and your paper satisfies me more in that respect than any other that I am in the habit of perusing, and sincerely hope that it will be fully sustained in the future."

"Enclosed find one dollar, for which send your paper one half-year. Excuse bad writing. I am over eighty years old, and very nervous. I will only say that your paper is just what all should read."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

Instead of holding the usual morning meeting, Mr. Abbot will reply to the recently published sermon of Rev. Mr. McCracken entitled "Our Public Schools," on Sunday evening, May 14, at the usual hour. Subject:—"The Battle for Free Education."

RECEIVED.

LIFE AND MORAL AXIOMS OF CONFUCIUS. By MARCENUS R. K. WRIGHT. Battle Creek, Mich.: Published for the Author. 1870. pp. 62.

THE WOLF IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING: OR, God in the Constitution. An Ingenious Interpretation of the Symbols of the book of Daniel and the Apocalypse, together with an Argument against recognizing God, Christianity, and the Sabbath in our National Charter. By Rev. MOSES HULL. Baltimore: Published by the COSMOPOLITAN PUBLISHING CO., 166 West Baltimore Street, Baltimore, Md. 1871. pp. 23.

THE JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY for April, 1871. St. Louis: E. P. GRAY, ST. LOUIS BOOK AND NEWS CO.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW for May, 1871. Rev. JOHN H. MORISON, D. D., Editor. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLES, Proprietor, No. 3 Beacon St.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. Edited by Mrs. M. CORA BLAND. Indianapolis. May, 1871.

Poetry.

FREEDOM.

Here's freedom to him that wad read,
Here's freedom to him that wad write;
There's nane ever feared that the Truth should be heard,
But they wham the Truth wad indite,

BURNS.

The Index.

MAY 13, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for Single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the Subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion.—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [Three Lectures.] 8. Lying Pretences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom, and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
For the INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO, O., April, 1871.

DEBTS TO MAN AND DEBTS TO GOD.

Several weeks ago a letter was published in the Morning Star, the able organ of the Free-will Baptist denomination, which arrested our attention as one of the most extraordinary we ever read. It was written by some one who had many years before pledged one hundred dollars to the Foreign Mission Society, but had found it difficult to redeem this pledge on account of poverty. After making excuses for his long neglect to pay, the writer continues as follows:—

"But as I have read your earnest appeals for aid, the inquiry has arisen: Why should I not apply the same principle to this which I endeavor to apply to the cause of Christ in general,—make it first? And as the result of that inquiry, I enclose a money order for forty dollars, the balance of my pledge. I am able to do this by withholding payment of a wood bill of twenty dollars, and several smaller bills, trusting my chances for their payment. It leaves me not a single dime, but I have the consciousness of having made some little sacrifice for God's cause."

But even more extraordinary were the comments made on this letter, which we also copy:—

"There need be no fear but the brother will be amply able to pay his wood bill, and any other debts he may have. The spirit and example here exhibited commend themselves everywhere as worthy of imitation, if we heed the principle of the gospel."

C. O. LIBBY, Cor. Sec."

Consider the actual state of the matter, stripped of the pious phraseology by which the real nature of this transaction is concealed.

A man orders wood to the value of twenty dollars. The dealer, trusting to his honor for payment, delivers it. By and by the purchaser finds himself in possession of forty dollars, every dime of which is due for the wood or other property similarly acquired.

Concluding that his promise to the Foreign Mission Society (a voluntary pledge, not a debt for goods received) is an obligation to God which outweighs his obligation to man, he resolves to neglect the latter, trust to luck for means to pay his wood and other bills, and thereby run the risk of ultimately defrauding his creditors, out of zeal for the "cause of Christ." He then writes a letter to Rev. Mr. Libby, enclosing the forty dollars, and informs him of his "consciousness of having made some little sacrifice for God's cause." Mr. Libby publishes the letter, praises "the brother" for his act, and holds him up as an example for imitation by the whole Christian community.

These are the naked facts. We have a word or two to say concerning them.

In the first place, who makes the "sacrifice?" Not the "brother", but the wood dealer, who is defrauded of his money, at least for a time, and perhaps forever. The "brother" has had the wood and enjoyed it. In his own phrase, he "withholds payment;" probably, therefore, the dealer already needs the money. The "brother" runs no risk and makes no sacrifice; the risk is run and the sacrifice made by the dealer. This being remembered, the praise bestowed is undeserved, although a desire for it was apparently quite as strong a motive for the "sacrifice" as disinterested love of the heathen. The dealer is defrauded of his money; and the "brother" claims and gets credit for defrauding him. The case would have been one of real and honorable self-sacrifice on the "brother's" part, if he had sent the money first and gone without the wood. But to withhold payment of a just debt and then claim credit for a sacrifice thus forced upon another, is what every honest man must condemn. Such an act is simply betrayal of a trust, not changed in character by the specious piety which would turn it into a cause for self-glorification.

In the next place, the principle of "making the cause of Christ first," that is, of making debts to God of higher obligation than debts to man, is pernicious. If we have any debts to God, they are these very debts to man. We owe God nothing but to be true to our own humanity in all our human relationships. Fidelity to these is fidelity to him; infidelity to these is infidelity to him. Nothing can be a debt to God which involves contempt or postponement of any debt to man. The homely duties of honesty, faithful labor, good workmanship, punctuality of payment, strict and prompt discharge of business obligations, conscientious performance of all promises, and so forth, despised as they are in comparison with what are called "Christian" or "religious" duties, are as real and sacred as the latter are illusory and superstitious. Debts to man, of whatever nature, are binding by the law of natural morality. If debts to God are set up as of superior claim or sanction, they become snares and moral pit-holes. The only real debts to God are the obligations inherent in human nature to be true to ourselves and our brother men.

Furthermore, the praise accorded by Rev. Mr. Libby to a really immoral act shows how the clergy are blinded by their own self-interest to the right relations of things. The remittance of these forty dollars was really a theft from the wood dealer and other creditors; and by accepting it Mr. Libby really became an accomplice in the crime. We im-pugn the conscious motives of neither the "brother" nor the Secretary. They doubtless conceived the act to be proper. But, rightly viewed, it deserves nothing but censure. When we are told that it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen—in other words, that seventy-five per cent. of all monies contributed for foreign missions goes to pay salaries and keep the ecclesiastical machinery in running order,—we see how easily secretaries and other officials may be led to look on all such donations as the "brother's" as meritorious. It is necessary to praise the donors. It is necessary to encourage the belief that such donations are demanded by the "principle of the gospel." This financial necessity warps and perverts the moral vision of the clerical managers of Missionary, Bible, and Tract Societies, to an incredible extent; and from them proceeds that constant iteration and reiteration of the sacred "duty of giving to the cause of Christ" which warps and perverts the moral vision of the laity. This is one of the great evils engendered by the dominant ecclesiasticism, which radiates moral darkness in all directions by exalting ecclesiastical necessities into paramount duties to God.

Lastly, we have here a single illustration of the universal moral tendency of orthodoxy. Orthodoxy persistently condemns "mere morality," as insufficient for salvation and a dangerous temptation to rely on self-help alone. Laying supreme stress on "faith in the Savior," it underrates, vilifies, and anathematizes natural religion, which knows no higher law than the law of right and wrong. As an inevitable consequence of this depreciation of "mere morality," orthodoxy itself becomes immoral, and the fruitful parent of immorality. Witness the pious fraud of the "brother" and its pious endorsement by the "Secretary." These men are doubtless unconscious of the real character of the act thus offered and accepted as a fit "sacrifice" on the Free-will Baptist altar. They are doubtless merely the victims of a false and demoralizing system. But when small-pox is about, it is well to get vaccinated; and when orthodoxy proves itself to be moral small-pox in this unmistakable manner, regard for the public health in morals requires a resort to moral vaccination. The community will never manifest a healthy moral tone, until a conviction of the supreme sanctity of natural morality has supplanted the present conviction that debts to man are less sacred than debts to God.

FAITH AND FEELING.

"The pursuit of truth is easy to a man who has no human sympathies, whose vision is impaired by no fond partialities, whose heart is torn by no divided allegiance. But the case is very different with the searcher whose affections are strong, whose associations are quick, whose hold on the past is clinging and tenacious. He may love truth with an earnest and paramount devotion, but he loves much else also. He loves errors which were once the cherished convictions of his soul. He loves the church where he worshipped in his happy childhood, where his friends and his family worship still; he loves the simple old creed which was the creed of his earlier and brighter days, which is still the creed of his wife and children. The past and the familiar have claims and talismans which hold him back in his career, till every fresh step forward becomes an effort and an agony."

These words were written more than twenty years ago by William Rathbone Greg, in the preface to his most able and noble book, the "Creed of Christendom,"—a work characterized as strongly by tenderness of feeling as by intellectual fidelity. Every chapter bears marks of an unflinching truthfulness, and also of the suffering the truthfulness has cost the writer. The last chapter, in particular, on "The Great Enigma," discusses the question of personal immortality in a manner so lofty yet so humble, that, as the scales drop from the reader's eyes, the tears start into their place.

The genuineness of Mr. Greg's feeling must be confessed by every candid reader of his volume. To him the pursuit of truth has been "a daily martyrdom;" "every new glimpse of light a flood of pain poured in upon his soul." But he did not flinch from inquiry because he dreaded the possible conclusion; nor turn aside from the path as soon as he caught a glimpse of the unwelcome goal; nor "hold his dearest hopes on the tenure of a closed eye and a repudiating mind." To him faith had its rights as well as feeling, and its duties as well as its rights; and the mental suffering it required of its devotee measured the extent and the sacredness of its claim. It told him how much he had to overcome, not how much he might be excused from undertaking. Shame to those, he says, who make the pursuit of truth doubly a martyrdom, by adding reproach to the inquirer's sorrow.

The martyr presently finds an end to his pain; for he attains "the serenity of soul that is possible only to the fearless and the just." But they who embitter the martyrdom do not desist.

There is a strange delusion encouraged by timorous minds, that to break away from the past is dangerously easy. They exhort people to cling to their old associations, to hold on to their ancient traditions, to keep close under the sheltering roofs of their inherited persuasions, to look out for their tent-pins lest they be swept off the planet by their own breathing. The sober truth is that the past has hold of us, and with a grasp that can no more be loosed than the sap in the twig can be detached from the sap in the trunk of a tree. The past has thousands of years in its favor—all the time there is. The past has created us; it has built up our frames; constructed our organizations, mixed our temperaments; stamped its predestination on bone and muscle; wrought itself into fibre and tissue. It holds us down with the ponderosity of generations. Get away from it indeed! Jump off the planet!

In its struggle with feeling faith has need of every advantage it can secure. With the load it must drag, a too rapid passage is the last evil to be dreaded. No experiments in flying-machines have as yet been so successful that the shoemakers are deprived of their occupations and railroad stocks are worthless. No radical can pull up the roots of his own constitution. No progressive can go faster than the laws of Nature allow. The faint blooming on the surface of the coral reef will not carry the deposits of centuries away among the clouds.

Pure intellects are exceedingly rare; so rare that when a seraph is found we should make the most of him, hailing him as a relief from the mushy mass of sentiment which the river of time has deposited on the ground of our existence. Such is the multitude of bodies that are destitute of head and wings, that the sight now and then of a being all head and wings would be a welcome solace and hope. A being who was under no necessity of sitting down to dinner, or snuggling under bed clothes, would encourage us to think that we might some day become intellectual. While waiting for such a creature to appear, we may as well address ourselves to the task of helping those few who are trying to emancipate themselves from the thralldom of feeling as a preparation for the spring of faith. The task of loading a vessel that is too heavily freighted already, may profitably give way to the far more difficult task of crowding sail on her in order that she may not sink.

Indolent people are heard saying that radicalism goes with the tide, and has but to sit still with folded arms and be carried swiftly on to its destination, while conservatism, unaware that its vessel floats on the same stream, pulls desperately against the current that sweeps it also down. Conservatives themselves, in disheartened moods, are betrayed into similar modes of speech. It is quite as true and perhaps truer to say that radicalism is the budding and blossoming of the tree, the ancient conservative trunk whereof is sure of its place in the soil. That will hold its own for years to come; but whether the budding and blossoming will come in due season is another question; and it is a further question yet whether the budding and blossoming will result in fruit. It is to that matter that special care should be directed, and on it that special solicitude should be felt.

O. B. F.

"INTUITION AND SCIENCE."

Under this title Mr. John Wetherbee has written to the Banner of Light an article of criticism upon the two lectures given in the Horticultural Hall Course, Boston, last February, by the editor of THE INDEX and myself. This article did not come to my notice till reprinted in THE INDEX, April 22. Had I seen it earlier, I should have thought it worth while to correct before now one or two strange misapprehensions in it concerning my own lecture. Mr. Abbot's lecture has since been published in full and speaks for itself; and even if it had not been, there would be no occasion that I should speak for him. My lecture will appear entire in the June number of The Radical; and some persons who have given it the compliment of their criticism, if they will read it then, will find perhaps that they have been bestowing their attention upon something very different from the actual lecture.

Mr. Wetherbee, for instance, quotes as my words, that "soul is a quality of matter which appears under certain conditions of development;" whereas, in reality, the paragraph in which this sentence occurred was a statement of the position of those scientists who undertake to deny personal immortality, and to refute this position a considerable part of the lecture was devoted! I for one do not believe that "thought is a function of matter" merely,—that "soul is only a result of organic material development;" and I attempted to show in the lecture that, taking these scientific materialists on their own ground, they had not yet proved this position to be tenable. For, as I said, they have to assume a "formative principle," "a directive agency," as an element in every organic process of development. These are scientific phrases, and they imply plainly, as it seems to me, a principle of thought, of intelligence, somewhere. In other words, in that primary substance, power, force, whatever it be, which science admits but does not attempt to analyze, there must be involved the germ of thought as well as of matter; otherwise thought could not have appeared in the phenomena of the universe. And this developing germ of thought, giving the "formative principle," or "law," for evolution, has certainly had as much to do in producing the varied forms of organism, as organism has had to do in producing the phenomena of human consciousness.

As to "intuition," it did not come in the line of my lecture to say much directly upon that head. I certainly did not, as Mr. Wetherbee represents, "turn my back upon intuition." I did say that science would compel a revision of the argument for immortality from intuition, but did not say that it would wholly abolish every form of that argument. Science, I believe, will very essentially modify the intuitional philosophy. Darwin's definition of intuition and instinct as "inherited habit" indicates the modification. That is, instead of saying that what we call the intellectual and moral intuitions are the direct personal gift or revelation of God to each soul, science will go behind these intuitions to explain how they have been gradually evolved and acquired through the disciplinary experience of myriads of generations of sentient beings. But science does not therefore say—does not say through Darwin at least—that there is no such thing as "intuition" and "instinct." It admits the fact and attempts to explain it. And it need have no more trouble with explaining "intuition" in man than "instinct" in the brute.

Nor does this explanation of the intuitions preclude the idea that they represent distinctions which are real and eternal. Though our intuitions be the inherited knowledge of long ages of experimental life, it does not follow that this knowledge has been wholly dependent on outward and material conditions of development, and would have been utterly different if these conditions had been different. As a matter of fact the outward conditions have varied among different races, countries, climates. And yet, whatever the conditions, whenever a certain stage of intelligence is reached, men have everywhere come to certain perceptions essentially the same; as, for instance, of mathematical truth, of logical relation, of the obligations of virtue. All may not have reached the point of perception in respect to certain mathematical and logical relations, but all who have reached it see the same thing and are obliged by inward necessity of nature to assent to it. So there may be some variance whether this or that particular act shall be called virtue, but there is no variance on the point that what any one thinks to be virtue is obligatory upon him rather than its opposite. And as human beings have advanced in intelligence, under whatever variety of surroundings, it is evident they have advanced also towards unity of moral sentiment,—have come gradually to regard the same things as virtue. The Golden Rule has been independently reached in several different quarters of the globe, by different races and religions. The law of human development clearly is, that in proportion to their advance in intelligence, under whatever conditions, men converge to unity of mental and moral perception. Given a certain stage of mental development, certain intellectual and ethical intuitions appear.

It does not seem, therefore, as if outward material conditions, physical organism, experience however long accumulated, could account for everything in intuition. In tracing the development of the human consciousness, we need the aid of a "formative principle" quite as much as we do in the evolution of material organisms. As we need it in material organisms to account for the law of their formation, so do we need it in the human intelligence to account for the higher law of its conscious obligation to truth and virtue. The whole question, indeed, between the believers in intuition and, not science, but that portion of scientific men known as Materialists, turns upon this:—Does mind contribute anything from itself to life's experiences, or does everything in experience come through material organism from the outward world? He may properly call himself an intuitionist who says that the elements of mind must be at least as old as the elements of matter, and that without them we can account for neither "organism" nor "experience." If science will admit that, no offence need be taken at her attempt to go behind the intuitions to trace their genealogy: rather is the "reconciliation between physics and metaphysics," at which Huxley hints, near at hand.

W. J. P.

Our opening essay this week is especially worthy of perusal, as the estimate of Thomas Paine's theological works formed by a scholarly, thoughtful, and independent man who has just read them for the first time. The fact that the writer is also a Presbyterian minister will lend it an additional interest, and furnishes fresh proof (if any is required) that the spirit of free inquiry is spreading with most significant rapidity in the very bosom of the Christian Church. His closing suggestion regarding Mr. Paine's portrait is exceedingly apt, and will, we hope, lead to a vigorous investigation into the reasons for its unaccountable disappearance from Independence Hall. It would be a shame indeed, were the Fourth of July, 1876, to find it still absent from a Hall which derives so much of its historic glory from the disinterested and heroic labors of Thomas Paine.

Among our "Communications" will be found an abstract of Dr. Bellows' fifth lecture recently delivered in New York city. It is difficult not to see in the closing sentences a bitter allusion to Mr. Frothingham's chivalrous and just defence of Paine and other so-called "infidels," in the Horticultural Hall lecture previously delivered by him in Boston. But we would fain believe otherwise. The positions taken by Dr. Bellows are most extraordinary. Their amazing weakness, their manifest reactionary leaning towards orthodoxy, the sharp and acrimonious spirit that pervades some of the statements, show how desperate is the case of Unitarianism when it tries to defend itself before the tribunal of modern thought. Dr. Bellows (who, by the way, has just assumed the editorship of the Liberal Christian) is a man of large and generous sympathies who is capable of most magnanimous actions; and it is with regret that we see him do such bitter injustice to himself as this report would indicate. We cannot help hoping it is incorrect, though we have no reason for thinking it so except our general respect for one who once did us a great kindness under circumstances especially honorable to himself.

Instead of honorably confessing that he had misunderstood our editorial on "Infidels" and "Infidelity," the editor of the Boston Investigator reiterates the charge which we denied and disproved. He says we "began the attack by saying in effect that an Infidel is a scoundrel;" and notwithstanding our emphatic denial that we had either said so or thought so, he asserts that we "remain steadfast in this opinion." If Mr. Seaver can afford to bear such false witness as this against us, we must henceforth remain silent under the accusation. We do not care to investigate his motives for it. From many a Christian paper we have received just and fair treatment; the Investigator alone has deliberately and persistently falsified our words. Mr. Seaver has us at a fatal disadvantage. We cannot use his weapons.

For examples of that spirit which makes controversy ennobling alike to head and heart, we must turn to the great leaders of thought in the present age. The following paragraph from a notice of Mivart's "Genesis of Species" in the Liberal Christian is the best thing we have seen in that paper for many a long month:—

"Meanwhile, what an example to theologians and historians and literary critics does not the spirit of the great writers in science of our day set! In respect of courtesy, candor, the single love of truth, the exercise of magnanimity toward competitors, the grateful sense of others' services, we know nothing in professedly Christian writers superior—might we not say equal?—to what is exhibited uniformly in Lyell, Huxley, Darwin, Wallace, Mivart. Indeed, the moral graces have rarely been so beautifully exhibited in the heat of honest rivalry as by the whole class of English physicists of this generation. Darwin is the very Bayard of chivalrous honor and deference in his scientific writings. Wallace is a Sydney, and Mivart a knight sans peur et sans reproche. These men, differing greatly, earnestly, manfully, never stoop to injustice or any arguments ad invidiam. They deal in no side looks at the public, like bad actors coquetting with the pit. They write on conscience, in the love of truth, in the fear only of doing each other wrong. Let alone Mr. Darwin's ethics or religion; make them theoretically what you will, he practises the highest religious principles and exhibits the most difficult Christian graces in his ever tempting and exciting position as the head of a school which owes its importance to the sustained originality of his genius and the fortification of his cardinal doctrine. But he would evidently die sooner than willingly deceive as to a fact or deny another man's rights in discovery. When have theologians exhibited as much candor and love of truth? How will the odium theologicum bear comparison with the loves of these scientists, from whose honest researches clergymen commonly shrink as though 'their craft were in danger?' Such a temper can have in it no possible fruits of evil or danger to true religion."

Those who see no cause for any movement in America in behalf of larger freedom of thought and speech, should ponder the following statement of Horace Greeley:—

"I doubt whether the social intolerance of adverse opinions is more vehement anywhere else than throughout the larger portion of our country. I have repeatedly been stung by the receipt of letters gravely informing me that my course and views on a current topic were adverse to public opinion, the writers evidently assuming, as a matter of course, that I was a mere jumping-jack, who only needed to know what other people thought to ensure my instant and abject conformity to their prejudices."

"He who nourishes the little belonging to him," said Mencius [Works, VI, 14, 2], "is a little man; and he who nourishes the great is a great man."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

"INFIDELS" AND "MISCREANTS."

MR. F. E. ABBOT:—I cannot agree with you in your editorial article on "Infidels and Infidelity," neither do a majority of the free thinkers or independent thinkers throughout the country, as far as my experience goes. The word "infidel" I think you will agree has undergone a differentiation of meaning; and in fact so much so, that the word "infidelity" really means "fidelity" to the laws of nature and humanity. Mr. John Stuart Mill, in his "System of Logic," gives some illustrations where words in the course of time acquire a meaning almost diametrically opposite to that in which they were originally used. Mr. Spencer, in his essay on the "Instability of the Homogeneous," gives a few illustrations of almost the same kind. For instance:—"In the old divines 'miscreant' is used in its etymological sense of 'unbeliever;' but in modern speech it has entirely lost this sense." So has the word "infidel" entirely lost its original sense or meaning, and the more we dislike owning it, the greater pleasure it gives Christians to fasten it upon us. Words are often used as a "bugaboo" to frighten with. The word abolitionist was so used before the late war here, and the bare mention of it was almost sufficient to make timid women go into hysterics, or children to cover up their heads after retiring.

Now since there is an instability in the meaning of words, and since the word "infidel" has undergone such a differentiation of meaning, I cannot conceive that it is inconsistent for unbelievers in Christianity to accept it as applying to themselves, because it is almost universally used against those who do not accept the popular religious notions and popular religion of the country in which they live. The Mahometan Bible, the Koran, abounds in anathemas against the infidels, the unbelievers of the Mahometan religion and the Prophet, etc. The word is scarcely known in any other sense than to express unbelief in the dominant system of religion of a nation or people. The word everywhere is now used in strictly a religious sense. It does not seem to me that it ought to shock an intelligent man to be called "infidel," because the moment the epithet is fastened upon him, the implication is made (even by those who anathematize him) that he is a believer in the fixed and immutable laws of the universe—beyond the power or possibility of man to suspend or evade. If, then, "infidel" means unbelief in superstitious notions, impossibilities, legendary, and traditional stories, as divine truths, and all the other absurdities belonging with them, then it is certainly honorable. Christians are infidels to progress, and we are infidels to superstition and its attendants. Which is the worst?

Yours, &c.,
April 12, 1871.

B.

[The above was written, as the date shows, before our reply to Mr. Seaver was published.]

Our courteous correspondent is under a misapprehension, if he supposes the article he comments upon was written because we felt at all "shocked," or in the slightest degree annoyed, at being called an "infidel." For several years we have been called so habitually, and never object to this or any other style of abuse. Nor do we now object. We object to nothing but the admission on our part that such abuse is deserved—an admission we think involved in the voluntary acceptance of such an opprobrious epithet. Let us confine the discussion, at least in the columns of THE INDEX, to the true meaning of the word "infidel."

Mr. B. thinks the epithet has entirely lost its opprobrious character. We think differently, and the passage we quoted from Mr. Seaver shows that he also thinks differently—at least, part of the time. Even Mr. B. seems to recognize its opprobrious character in speaking of the Christians as "fastening" it upon liberals, and thereby "anathematizing" them. Why should bigots "take pleasure" in using it, if it implied no reproach?

Doubtless words change their meaning. The only question is, has this word "infidel" lost all its derogatory implication of moral unfaithfulness? We think no one can really claim that it has, who considers the use made of it by bigots. The word "miscreant" (originally "misbeliever") implied reproach at the start; and now it means nothing but reproach. If it offers any analogy to the word "infidel," it tends strongly to confirm our own idea of the latter's meaning. Perhaps "infidel" also, now signifying unbelief and moral unfaithfulness combined, will come by and by to signify moral unfaithfulness alone. If so, its change of meaning will correspond precisely to that of "miscreant." Mr. B.'s illustration seems a little unfortunate for his view of the matter ; for it shows that a moral meaning clings to a word more persistently than any other.—ED.]

DR. BELLON'S FIFTH LECTURE.

THE CHURCH AND ITS HISTORY, CONSIDERED AS WITNESSES.

Christianity is not yet wholly victorious, but its success is only a question of time. Its slow progress is in accordance with the progress of the physical world. It is in alliance with all the civilization of the world, and any institution which we wish to succeed must be placed on it.

How was Christianity founded? Whence did it come?

If an Indian should see a steamboat going with the current, he would not be surprised; if he saw it going against the current, he would at once perceive it to be a new kind of craft, different from anything he had before seen, and impelled by some mysterious power within. Thus the false religions go with the current, and Christianity goes against it. Sometimes the false religions are cited as proofs of man's affinity to God. We should be no more surprised at their spread than at the spread of weeds, or fire, or passions, or superstitions, and the like. The ancient religion of Rome was a beautiful superstition, easy and accommodating. It is easy to be tolerant when you do not care about the matter. This religion was as easy as lying, so that thoughtful people had to turn to philosophy. Christianity came to oppose our desires, to humble, to bind duty in bonds unbreakable, to veto darling sins; was as unaccommodating, intolerant to sin, at the start as now. It has had to make head against human nature. The difference between our views of human nature and the views of our orthodox brethren is not essential, but lies in words. In a certain manner human nature is depraved. We know that people have low desires which can be subdued only by power from above—by superhuman efforts. So we may say that Christianity spreads against human nature so understood.

Christianity started in the face of the Jews, Jewish institutions and Jerusalem. Christ preached three years at most; according to the best authority, fifteen months. In that time he made twelve apostles; common men who, during his lifetime, did not fully believe in him. He passes through a false trial and is crucified. Friends fly and believe no more. He rises and is seen forty days, during which time he performs miracles. He ascends into heaven. The apostles declare to the angry Jews that Jesus is the Christ, Lord, Messiah, and Master of them all. Nothing but the most powerful conviction of these facts would have enabled them to face the angry crowd. The weapons of Christianity are not the power of political influence, but absolute consecration of soul and body to the one important thing, a reliant faith which, to be explained, must be traced back to the divinity of Christ which was divinely transmitted to the twelve apostles. Christianity is as intolerant as the multiplication table—two times two make four; and if you say they do not, you lie. No other way to salvation except through faith in Christ, no God but his Father,—these are the weapons of Christ. They were at first disliked as rough; but intense conviction conquered. People who had seen the miracles could have no toleration for any but the Christian religion. A religion coming from Jerusalem and founded by a Jew supplanted the beautiful and powerful religion of Rome in the face of a bitter persecution which lasted from 30 to 305, A. D. This was done without arms, and the new religion could not compare in beauty and opulence with the old. The people were luxurious and devoted to pleasure; the new religion was severe and hard.

How did it conquer? How but by the intense conviction of the early Christians of the reality of the miracles, the divinity of Christ, and the truth of the resurrection? These things they must have seen with their own eyes to believe. Would the martyrs have died for their faith without this conviction? True, men have died for lies before, but not thousands of men, age after age. Could twelve men be deceived in regard to the events of the last forty days? It is impossible that so good and great a thing as our religion should be founded on lies. As well say that the Hudson River is fed at the other end with water-pots and engines.

Religion and morality are essentially different. Christ came to unite them. Religion is love to God; morality love to men.

Gibbon gives five reasons for the spread of Christianity:

- 1st, the inflexible and intolerant zeal of the early Christians.
- 2d, the doctrine of future happiness as a reward of present virtue.
- 3d, the miraculous powers ascribed to Christ.
- 4th, the virtues of the early Christians.
- 5th, the union and discipline of the Christian Church.

I detest and hate his villainous hypocrisy, which inserts virulent doubt under pretence of reason. Nevertheless, I would have you read him. Read also Bishop Watson's answer to him, and read Watson's answer to Tom Paine. And,—yes, you may read Tom Paine too; I would rather have you read him than hear him spoken of by those who exalt him.

The best criticism against Christianity was written in the third century; but those critics were silenced, and so will be the critics of to-day.

A DEFENCE OF INTUITIONALISM.

LOUISIANA, Mo., April 19, 1871.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—Allow me to suggest the following reasons for dissenting from your view of the great spiritual questions discussed in your lecture on the "Intuition and Scientific Schools of Free Religion."

You say that the Intuition School regards God and Immortality as self-evident facts, the Scientific School as open questions. But Herbert Spencer, nearly the foremost philosopher of the scientific school, has shown that the consciousness of Absolute Being is more certain than any other mode of consciousness, because more universal; and also that, being an ultimate and fundamental truth, it cannot be stated, much less proved. He takes the very same ground in regard to it that the Intuitionists take in regard to their consciousness of God. Now it is true, as you observe, that neither Herbert Spencer nor any other individual can speak for the school. But I apprehend that the conclusion of his argument will never be disputed again; in truth it never has been disputed, though Hamilton, Mansel, and others among his predecessors have overlooked it.

Now the Absolute, of which Herbert Spencer thus shows that man is intuitively conscious, he has not shown to be a self-conscious God. But I think that conclusion follows immediately from his own. I am conscious of the Absolute. But what am I? Certainly in my true nature an Absolute. And there cannot be two unconditioned beings, for each would have to be in some relation to each other. Therefore the Absolute is conscious of itself. And the Infinite must be Absolute, for it cannot be conditioned. Therefore the Infinite is conscious of itself. Thus the thinkers of the Intuition and Scientific schools adopt the self-same methods when they treat of noumena; and, if they follow those methods up, must reach the same conclusions. I think, too, that the immortality of man follows clearly from that same consciousness of the Infinite which Herbert Spencer has demonstrated. In a work of mine, which I have reason to believe is now through the press, I have expressed my dissent from his philosophy on the ground that he has stopped short of these consequences from his own principles, and even, on other grounds, denied them.

Thinking thus, I share that belief in the impossibility of Atheism which you censure. Lord Bacon, the father of the Scientific school, says of Atheists that we see them labor to make converts, even suffer martyrdom, "whereas," he observes, "if they really thought there were no God, why should they trouble themselves?" This curious argument seems to me decisive. If an Atheist, so-called, will suffer for his negations, he must believe in a Supreme Reality, his fidelity to which is more important to him than life; and this is inconceivable, unless he regards that Reality as having a point of union with his own self-conscious soul.

Yours truly,
C. L. JAMES.

[If man is "an Absolute," we cannot dissent from our correspondent's conclusions. But this seems to be an untenable premise. How he can be regarded as an "unconditioned being," when he is manifestly subject to so many conditions, is certainly not clear.—ED.]

SCIENCE AND FREE RELIGION.

OLATHE, KANSAS, April, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—What you term the "positive side" of Free Religion, or that which prompts to aid in developing society at large up to its true stand-point, seems to be much less regarded than the "negative side." We often meet with a determined repudiation of every kind of tyranny, religious, social or political. But how best to teach the masses "correct ideas" of God is seldom considered, or, if so, is regarded as impracticable. It is generally urged that each should choose for himself that form of religion which suits him best. The mutual dependence of each on others to a great extent for his development is not seen.

As suggestive of thought in this direction, I would ask how Radicals have got their ideas of God,—ideas which they believe to be correct, and which have placed them on the free religion platform? Has it been by cultivating the religious sentiment, or, as some would have it, by cultivating their "intuitions" about God? How can any sentiment be developed, except by first developing the intellect? Or rather, are not all the sentiments and feelings merely blind tendencies to action in certain directions, until guided by intellect? No one will deny that the religious sentiment has blindly prompted man in all ages. So has benevolence,—frequently producing great evil, although good was intended; and even conscientiousness, the highest of all sentiments, prompting us to what we think is right towards God and towards man, has produced incalculable mischief, when not guided by an enlightened reason.

Does not psychology show that these so-called "intuitions" are nothing more than inherited tendencies of sentiment and thought, which are gradually developed generation after generation? They are not principles already perfect, given us for our guidance by a benevolent Creator, but rather tendencies which have been developed by the external surroundings of individuals and transmitted to their posterity. If they were Divine endowments, or "spiritual intuitions," as claimed, they would certainly not be subject to the law of development; and the inference would be that an "intuitive" idea of God would be as perfect at man's creation as now. So with benevolence, conscientiousness, &c.

But if not "intuitively" in this sense, how have radicals got their "correct ideas" of God and religion, so that they believe in the "Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man?" Has not science told them that the "unknown force" governs by certain uniform, unchangeable laws, and that all men are governed by those laws? That differences of complexion, of religious creed, of nationality, are merely external and transitory, and should not break the chain of sympathy connecting all in one brotherhood? Has it not told them that there has been no selection of a "peculiar people" or chosen Israel, but that God is no respecter of persons—that all are subject to his unchangeable laws, which, when obeyed, will secure the happiness of all? Will not science, or the knowledge of the laws of nature, give to all the most correct ideas of God? Will not scientific lectures—for instance on psychology or the laws of thought and feeling, on geology or the earth's history itself, and on astronomy,—do more towards giving correct ideas of God or teaching Free Religion, than any arguments or lectures on the sentiment itself? To advocate Free Religion directly, without first informing the intellect on these great laws of nature, seems like commencing at the superstructure before the foundation is laid. To use an illustration of Spencer's: "A little child with his toy, taken to the finest mountain scenery in the world, will have his attention absorbed by the toy—will not notice the scenery." So a lecture on Free Religion will be disregarded, and a circus show preferred; so THE INDEX and the Radical will be thrown aside for any dime novel of the season, unless there is a previous preparation of the intellect for it.

The feeling of opposition to new religions is not excited by a scientific lecture, which by a sort of "flank movement" takes possession of the mind, as it were, before its consequences are perceived. After such scientific facts are known, the religious sentiment may be safely left to itself for finding the best mode of development.

Fearing that I have trespassed too much on your space,

Respectfully yours,
J. E. S.

Because the accident occurred Sunday, and there was no urgent necessity of his riding on that day, Mr. Piper loses his suit against the town of Shapleigh for defective road. A remnant of the "blue laws."

A minister asked a tipsy fellow leaning up against a fence where he expected to go when he died. "If I can't get along any better than I do now," he said, "I shan't go anywhere."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WANTED—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed). The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 38yl

A Few More Agents Wanted For THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD. A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

- The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
- I am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
- The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
- The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
- God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
- Infidelity: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
- Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
- Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
- Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
- What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
- Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
- Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
- The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.

Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.
ALSO,
The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.
Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.
"It Injures our Business": Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?
Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.
These four for 10 cents.
Address
CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts,
SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for IMPURE BLOOD.

And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooftland's German Tonic Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hooftland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in cases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON, Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hooftland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD, Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooftland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,

Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.

I have used "Hooftland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,

Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooftland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ., Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania. This is to certify that I have used "Hooftland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooftland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.

(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hooftland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hooftland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hooftland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1 50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7 50. Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

24—cowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

INSTITUTE OF PRACTICAL CIVIL ENGINEERING, SURVEYING, AND DRAWING, Fits Students for R. R. Field-Work in Three to Six Months. Through Course One Year. For Circular address.

A. VAN DER NAILLEN, Principal, Room C, Reynolds' Block, Chicago.

71-75.

A RARE OFFER.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE

Will be sent on trial the balance of this year (7 months) for ONLY FIFTY CENTS.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE

Is an Original, Literary, and Progressive Monthly.

"It is the most charming, the most instructive, and in every way the most popular publication in the West."—Indiana Journal.

"I am perfectly delighted with it."—Oliver Logan.

"It sparkles among other ladies' Magazines, like a real diamond among pinchbeck jewelry."—Illinois Statesman.

"It is a sensible woman's paper, and we hope there are sensible women enough to give it a wide circulation."—Advent Herald, Boston.

"It has the largest corps of regular contributors of any Western Magazine, and is really a most charming publication."—Country Gentleman.

Good Agents clear from $5.00 to $10.00 a day canvassing for it.

MRS. M. CORA BLAND,

Editor and Publisher, Indianapolis.

71-74.

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50.

64-78

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75.

ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

THE CELEBRATED

CRAIG

MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Bels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but nowhere is it of GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail.

Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms.

53t26

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1863. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65.) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

LEcky's History of European Morals, 2 vols. 6.00

MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols. 5.00

EMERSON'S Prose Works, 3 vols. 5.00

WEBER'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes. 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price. $2.00

LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price. 2.00

Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price. 2.00

Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOCK, with portrait, price. 2.00

Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each. 2.00

On the Heights, AUERBACH. 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names, 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names, 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names, 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names, 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,

LOCK BOX 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,	1
What is Free Religion?	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Character,	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions,	5
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,	6
The Practical Work of Free Religion,	7
Unitarianism versus Freedom,	8
Sunday Schools,	9
Friendship,	10
Grief and its Compensations,	11
The Hebrew Prophets,	12
Capital Punishment,	13
Human Ideals,	14
The Essence of Religion,	15
The Management of Children,	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),	18
The Candle of the Lord,	19
Public Opinion,	20
Conscience,	21
The Pedigree of Man,	22
"Following Christ,"	23
The Tongue,	24
The Golden Age,	25
What is Truth?	26
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,	27
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,	28
The Sunday Question,	29
Motes and Beams,	30
The Dove's Departure,	31
The Bible in the Public Schools,	32
Religious Freedom,	33
A Plain Talk to Young Men,	34
Noise,	35
The Humility of Free Religion,	36
Chaos and Cosmos,	37
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,	38
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,	39
War and Free Religion,	40
Religious Revivals,	41
Mary and Martha,	42
The Ministry of Free Religion,	43
Success,	44
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,"	45
Spiritual Beauty,	46
The Book of Daniel,	47
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter,	48
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,	49
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,	50
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,	51
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,	52
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers,	53
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,	54
Parties and Party Spirit,	55
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,	56
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,	57
Transient and Permanent,	58

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No 20.

TOLEDO, OHIO, MAY 20, 1871.

WHOLE No. 73.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

POPULAR AMUSEMENTS.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, May 7, 1871.]

"Now the young man of our type may be seen early on any evening, standing about the thoroughfares, under the awnings, loitering at depot or mail-office, waiting 'for something to turn up.' His day's work is over, and the thought of toil must be banished till tomorrow. Body and mind are too much flagged for anything but amusement. His own room of seven by nine,—with its meagre furniture and uninviting bed, its mean equipment of scant carpet, handleless pitcher and broken bowl, resting on a rickety chair, and testifying to the long lapse of time since it was purged of its alluvial deposits; his own attic room, with its walls of ancient whitewash unrelieved save by the bravery of some pictorial newspaper, its heat roasting him in summer and its cold freezing him in winter,—has neither cosiness nor comeliness nor comfort nor allurements, and to the best rooms all access is forbidden, except when he enters one of them to feed on sparse food, weak tea, poor bread and butter for boarders. His room is his only home, visited once a day by landlady or 'hired help,' for the briefest 'settling to rights;' a home nevertheless equal to any other one he could afford to hire on the small wages at which he and all his peers must work, or starve. His natural manners may perhaps be acceptable, his information tolerable, his conversation intelligent, were he only brought forward by some friendly sympathy. But he is a stranger in a strange land, and there is nobody to whom he can appeal. Even were some good fortune to throw in his way some good friend, he may have an innate pride that prevents his confession of loneliness and drives his starved nature back to feed upon its own stunted and meagre stores. He has worked all day upon a single, monotonous subdivision of his craft, bringing into play only a few faculties and leaving all the rest to profitless disuse. If a carpenter, and kept at making doors and nothing else; if a machinist, and kept at making screw-nuts and nothing else; if a watch-maker, and kept at making watch-springs and nothing else, and therefore ignorant of every other department of those handicrafts, he has, after his day's fatiguing monotony, neither inclination, opportunity nor strength to look into their other details. He must be relieved by recreation, and the recreation that succeeds to labor must meet at least two requirements, to be healthful. It must entertain, so as to induce forgetfulness of the day's work, and it must be innocent and refining, so as to become a beneficial reminiscence on the day following. When, to the exclusion of all recreation, nothing but sleep interrupts thought of the day's work, a man may dream of his work, and, the strain of the day passing on into the night, there is no rest to his soul. True and efficient recreation drives away the thought of toil and leaves behind pleasant and refreshing memories of itself.

Now it is a noteworthy and singular fact, that even inferior considerations sometimes confirm men in general good conduct. Fear of loss of political standing, of general reputation in business, struggles to meet responsibilities, fear of the mere words of inquisitive neighbors, hedge them in, like the 'divinity that doth hedge in kings.' So true recreation is a protection, even though it be recreation in mere trifles. But none of these supports prop up our young man; he is but like the empty bag that failed in its effort to stand upright. The elements within and about him are not encouraging. Yet he must go somewhere; he must do and have something. The civilization of our time has rejected, as too cruel even for the worst criminal, the idea of prolonged solitary confinement; for it has been proved that to shut a human being away from all society is, if long continued, fatally destructive of the human mind, and the more advanced civilization of the future, if not its temperance philosophy, will revolt at the idea of forcing out, and pushing towards the temptations that lead to intemperance, any human being because of his poverty of purse and consequent poverty of culture.

Now men must do something. Human nature revolts at the vacuum of idleness. They must work or play, read or think, sing, converse, listen, travel, dance, or sleep. That state of society gives the best harbingers, which most inspires the greatest numbers to continued activity of some sort, affording to all proper opportunities every hour of the day and every day of the year. As long as any considerable number exists who ask in vain for good homes, pleasant places of amusement, proper associates with whom to converse, or opportunities to bring into exercise those qualities and endowments that will contribute most to their advantage and pleasure, just so long will the seductions of improper allurements make steady additions to the ranks of infamy and drunkenness. If 30,000 drunks die annually, there will be 30,000 recruits enlisted to fill up the drunken ranks out of our population of 40,000,000. What shall save them?

But let us not forget our young man illustration. He has finished his evening meal, and returning to his room he rummages closet or trunk in hope of finding something that may yield suggestion of amusement. 'Tis all in vain; and, disappointed and disheartened, he gazes from his window upon the countless chimney-tops that choke the ambient air with their effluvia; his glimmering lamp dies out in fetid smoke of kerosene; and sick and sorrowful he quits the dreary scene, and makes for the street, the only place, so far as he knows, to which he has a right. A dangerous place is this street, for there badness in every variety stalks and talks its ribald slang, and temptation, in garb of varied seducing, lurks for its prey, and he is just the fly to be lured into its parlor. Loitering there and then, under all such circumstances, that moment is to him, morally, about the most perilous moment of his whole life. The tempter is upon him, and his training, or rather his want of training, renders him utterly unprepared to meet the foe, and he is vanquished at the first assault."

SECOND ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BUREAU OF STATISTICS OF LABOR, OF MASSACHUSETTS, embracing an Account of its Operations and Inquiries from March 1, 1870, to March 1, 1871. pp. 543-545.

Next to the need of a wise system of really universal education, I doubt if the American people has any greater need than that of a wise system of popular amusements. On the one hand, it should be made impossible for any child born within the limits of the United States to grow up in ignorance; and on the other hand it should be made impossible for any one to be deprived of all opportunity of spending his leisure hours with profit and enjoyment. In the accomplishment of either of these objects, many difficulties, I am well aware, must be overcome; but I regard these two objects as of nearly equal importance. The American people (by which term I mean to include, not merely all persons born on our soil, but also all persons who in good faith have made this country their home) should provide good public schools for all their children, and require the education of all, either at these public schools, at equally good private schools, or in the parents' homes. When all children are thus ensured the priceless benefit of a good education, there will be no occasion for imposing any educational test as a condition of suffrage, as desired by some; and this I regard as the only proper method of securing intelligent suffrage. But the duty of the American public will not even then be wholly discharged towards its own members. Besides securing to all the fullest and freest opportunities of entering life well prepared for its various tasks, it ought equally to secure all from the dangers and temptations of idleness, by affording cheerful and improving ways of spending unoccupied time. The excuse for ignorance must be taken away; and the excuse for vice must be taken away. Not until then shall we really have a complete and perfect right to punish either ignorance or vice as sins against society.

Now the public mind is rapidly awakening to the need of more thorough-going measures for the extension of education throughout the community; and it is no part of my purpose to dwell on this point today. With regard, however, to the need of a generous system of popular amusements, and even to the need of amusements of any kind, I think the public mind is much more sluggish. Yet I conceive it to be a matter of vital importance to the well-being of mankind that these latter needs should be understood and met. Allow me, then, to urge this morning the right of our human nature to amusement, as well as to education and toil; and to offer a few thoughts on a subject which receives far too little attention in our busy American life.

We live in a new country. Compared with the Old World, the entire history of America belongs to modern times. Our antiquities themselves are new-fangled; and veneration for antiquity is known to us chiefly by hearsay. On every side of us, even in our oldest States, are undeveloped resources, unsettled country, unutilized means of civilization. Rich and productive land is waiting to be tilled; valuable mines are waiting to be worked; subterranean lakes of oil are waiting to be tapped; great hills of iron are waiting to be smelted and forged; great forests are waiting to be cleared; great rivers are waiting to be bridged; great mountain ranges are waiting to be tunneled; great railroads are waiting to be constructed; great cities are waiting to be built; valley and hillside, prairie and plain, are waiting to be dotted with towns, villages, and homesteads, as thickly as the midnight skies are strewn with stars. Here is the most vigorous nation ever yet known on this earth waiting to be gradually nurtured and developed into the giant of human history, with no natural limits to his patrimony but the Atlantic and Pacific, the Arctic Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico. In a word, America is today only an infinite possibility; and on our shoulders as a people lies the Herculean duty of converting this possibility into a fact.

Now the more or less strongly felt consciousness of this amazing destiny acts on the American mind as excess of oxygen acts on the lungs. It is burning us up by slow combustion. Over-excitement, over-stimulation, over-activity—these are like a fever in our blood, and we are living at a dangerous pitch of nervous tension. Future ages may gain in one point of view by the fact that this generation is over-working itself, inasmuch as it will bequeath a vaster legacy of accomplished facts to its successor; yet in another and graver point of view they may lose by it, since posterity may inherit a diminished vigor of physical constitution, an over-developed nervous system and a less stable equilibrium of the vital forces. This result could hardly fail to ensue, were it not for the constant and large influx of a fresh population from the shores of the Old World. But notwithstanding this fact of ceaseless immigration, which perhaps may save posterity from feeling the full effects of our wasteful expenditure of nervous energies, the present generation itself suffers by it.

Flattering as is the amazing development of our American resources, the wonderful growth of our commerce, manufactures, and trade, when looked at in a merely material point of view, I think that this glowing picture has its dark side also. I would see, if possible, a little less growth in these directions, and a little more growth in directions higher still. Putting so much of our life-force, our time, our interest, our ambition, into hard, material work, we fall far behind the German nation, for instance, in productive intellectuality, in works of scholarship, belles lettres, science, and art. Nations, like prize-fighters, may develop their arms at the expense of their brains. As individual men and women, we have to pay dearly for our undue absorption in business. Instead of being content with a competency, and reserving a fair share of our time to purposes of generous culture, we plunge into an insane competition in the race for wealth, and pay for it (even if we escape adding to the vast hosts of business wrecks at last) a price for which wealth is no equivalent—well-stored and finely-balanced minds. While admitting to the full the great value of wealth, both to individuals and to society, and while heartily repudiating that Christian depreciation of it which is at the present time to a very large extent thoughtlessness or hypocrisy, I yet believe that the saying is pre-eminently true of Americans—"Things are in the saddle, and ride mankind." On the value of large and symmetrical individuality I set so high an estimate, that I believe not only we, but the race as a whole, experience severe loss from any cause that hinders us of being physically, intellectually, and morally well-developed men and women. For this reason I regret the excess of energy, the disproportionate interest, the almost monomaniacal ambition, that are devoted in America to material prosperity. Attention to business is a virtue; absorption in business may become a vice.

Moreover, this determination of the national blood, not to the head, but to the arms, produces its natural results. The health of the people suffers. The nerves of thousands give way in the fierce competitions of American business; and the average of longevity is reduced. The standard of intellectual culture is kept low. The ideal of moral character, conformed to a code which has a financial rather than a moral basis, is degraded by the passion for success. But, over and above all this, Nature avenges herself in another way.

It is asserted, and I believe with truth, that dissipation is on the increase, especially in our large cities, at a ratio above that of the population. Intemperance and its allied vices, especially, is said to be extending with deplorable rapidity. Gerrit Smith says that "every year fifty thousand of our youth join themselves to the great army of drunkards." Now I do not believe that mankind are growing intrinsically worse, or that they are learning to love evil for its own sake. In this increased tendency to coarse dissipation I see simply the natural reaction of overstrained nervous systems, exhausted by the hard labor and (what is far more dangerous) by the intense excitement of our business life. Kept all day and perhaps all the evening on the stretch by the intense rivalries of business, the mind is fatigued and enfeebled; craving for unnatural stimulus is engendered; healthful amusements seem flat and insipid; and the man is driven, with jaded mind and impoverished will, to seek refreshment in a mere change of one harmful excitement for another more harmful still. So long as the major part of his time is absorbed by the exciting or wearing pursuit of his business, the man wants to get the maximum of pleasure out of the minimum of time; he is unfitted for calm and simple enjoyments, nor has he acquired any taste for them; and, almost unresisting, he is thus sucked into the vortex of destructive dissipations. Others in the same condition add the strong influences of sociality to the seductions of vice; and thus the victims of too intense competition go to ruin in droves.

This is especially true of young men who enter business at an early age as clerks or employees of any kind. Drawn into the whirl of the current too soon, unprotected by interests of their own which might exert a restraining influence, unfortified by tastes which supply a better occupation for leisure hours, and often thrown among perfect strangers who have become already the victims of similar circumstances, these unfortunate young men are launched on waters they do not know in skiffs without rudders or oars. Recreation they must have; and none that is innocent offers itself. Can they be very severely blamed if they go to wreck? I think not. The mischief lies really farther back than their wills. Their lapse into ruinous dissipations seems to be in large measure due to other causes than their own volition. Chief of all is this too intense activity of business competition. It forbids young men to spend a sufficient length of time in cultivating their minds, and drags them prematurely into business life. It holds them too long and too closely each day to exhausting labor. It keeps them continually in an atmosphere hot with conflicting ambitions and intense excitements. It then throws them out for a brief period to snatch what pleasure they can in the scanty intervals of toil. Under circumstances such as these, it requires stricter principles than most young men possess to keep out of dens of perdition; and if we trace their pitiable fate back to its origin, we seem to find it in the excessive business activity produced by the undeveloped state of the New World.

Is this evil, then, in any way to be obviated or mitigated? Can we find even a partial remedy for it? I think we can; though whether men will be induced to apply it, is a very different question.

Perhaps it may be requiring altogether too much to ask that the American business man should be less eager for business success; that he should aim a little less exclusively at getting rich, and care a little more about making himself a whole, symmetrical human being. Nor am I at all sanguine of being heeded by any one. Nevertheless, the naked truth is that, if business men were more moderate in their desires, this new country of ours might be developed more slowly, but the people who inhabit it would at least have a chance to be worth more in character and culture. Keep boys out of business till they have had ample time to get a good education. Shorten the hours of business by common consent, that employer and employee alike may have a reasonable amount of leisure for culture and enjoyment. Furnish to all, young or old, rich or poor, means of devoting this leisure to healthful pleasure and profitable recreation. Qualify business competition, even in business hours, by due remembrance that money is not the chief end of man, but only a means to this end; that he best fulfils his destiny when he succeeds in making himself in the highest degree noble, useful, and complete as an individual being. If these simple suggestions should be faithfully acted on, does any one doubt that the world would be both happier and more virtuous? I think not. The reason, however, why they will not be acted on is, shortly, that the average man is not yet a "rational animal."

But without expecting too much of the average man, and still leaving him to continue his experiment of trying to get happy by getting rich, until he discovers that his head is not so hard as the rock he so stupidly butts it against, it does seem possible to ameliorate the condition of things by devising some sensible system of popular amusements, and putting them within the reach of all. Whoever shall succeed in persuading the public to do this, will have accomplished more for the cause of temperance, good morals, and good order, than all the prohibitory and penal laws that could be engrossed between now and the crack of doom. Crime has its own laws, like everything else; and men will not commit it, if you can make them happier without it. It will do no good to shut up haunts of vice, unless you open places of rational enjoyment in their stead. The way to conquer intemperance and vices of all kinds is to flank them. Begin with universal education; continue with universal equality of all human rights; add universal opportunities of rational amusement; and I believe that crime of all kinds would be diminished ninety-nine per cent. The importance of opening to the poor and unfortunate some natural and innocent channel for the gratification of their pleasure-loving instincts has never, I believe, been appreciated as a reformatory agency. Punishing and preaching are alike ineffectual. Nobody will rob or murder, if he can get what he wants without these acts of violence; and whoever furnishes real enjoyment to the desperate man disarms his desperation. Popular amusements, wisely established and liberally sustained, would be as much better than courts and prisons as prevention is better than cure; and though it may be a long time before they are seriously regarded, much less fairly tried, I believe that the day will come when they will be once more, as they were in Greece, a recognized means of civilization.

It cannot be expected, of course, that a universal system of popular amusements could be established with advantage, until a system of strictly universal education had been previously established. Too many of the amusements now popular with the multitudes are a disgrace to the age; and if the public taste could not be elevated, it would be a mischievous attempt to minister to it. The horse-races which are managed solely with a view to betters and betting; the cock-fights and dog-bits and prize-rings which stimulate the most brutal instincts; the low theatres, saloons, dance-halls, gambling-hells, brothels, which are simply sinks of iniquity; even the "Black Crook" and "White Fawn" and "Can-can" performances which disgrace theatres of a higher reputation and are really an open door to scenes more disgraceful still; even the negro-minstrel shows which consist usually in coarse caricatures of a race just struggling into recognition as human beings like ourselves,—all these will be condemned as either vicious or unseemly, and could be included in no scheme of popular amusements which I at least could approve. Better leave things as they are, than seek to multiply such influences as these. Unless amusement can be pure and elevating, it becomes injurious. We had better go without our laugh than be made worse by it.

But there is no need of resorting to amusements like these. There are numerous ways of spending one's leisure not only with great enjoyment for the moment, but with permanent benefit to mind and body. Provided we can create a widespread taste for amusements of a healthy and elevating character, people will surely abandon those which are pernicious and degrading. Yet how can we create this better taste, except by offering constantly the attractions of a better class of entertainments than now draw the multitudes? No amount of preaching will be of avail. We must furnish good amusements, free to all, or the public will have no chance to acquire a taste for them. Let me enumerate a few.

1. Public parks for pleasure-walking and driving, and spacious fields for active outdoor games, such as foot-ball, base-ball, cricket, croquet, and so forth; and attached to these fields large, airy, and sunny gymnasia, free to every one. Well-kept beer-gardens might be advantageously added.

2. Public boat-houses, with boats and oars without charge, well-kept and ready at all times for use. The expense of boat-clubs debars thousands from the enjoyment of this most healthful exercise.

3. Public baths and swimming-schools, safe for young persons, and affording to both sexes during the summer months those opportunities of frequent ablution which experience has shown in Boston for several years to be so eagerly embraced by those who have no other chance of keeping themselves even decently clean. Large bath-houses should also be kept open all winter, somewhat as in Rome. The public bath could not fail to be greatly improved by such bathing facilities, available all the year round.

4. Public buildings devoted to libraries, reading-rooms, smoking-rooms, billiard-rooms, rooms for indoor games (chess, checkers, cards, and so forth) and rooms for social intercourse, in which evening parties with dancing and other innocent recreations can be held, terminating in all cases as early as eleven o'clock, P. M. To these should be added a pleasant theatre for amateur theatricals of various kinds, under the management of responsible persons.

5. Free public concerts, out of doors in the summer and in suitable halls during the winter; good plays and good operas, lyceum lectures on miscellaneous subjects, and scientific lectures with diagrams and experiments by the best-qualified persons.

6. Public art-galleries, floral conservatories, zoological gardens, scientific museums, and every conceivable means of fostering a taste for useful and ennobling information.

These are a few only of the amusements which might be devised, combining entertainment with instruction, and permanently benefiting thousands who now plunge into low and pernicious dissipations. Of course they could neither be established nor maintained without the expenditure of large sums of money. But when the people are better educated, they will economize in churches and court-houses and jails for the purpose of securing that ounce of prevention which is worth uncounted tons of cure. It will doubtless be a long time before the public will be wise enough to lay the axe at the root of social disorders. They will continue to dam up the stream of corruption with bulrushes, until long and bitter experience shall have shown the folly of not recognizing the facts of human nature as the true basis of legislation and social reform. But I hope it is not waste of time and breath for those who believe in rational methods of social improvement to state their convictions, and leave them to the candid consideration of all who really desire to accomplish the same beneficent ends.

SELF-SUPPORT.

[By Col. T. W. Higginson, in the Woman's Journal.]

For one, I believe in the dignity of self-support, whether for men or women. It is the English theory that society needs a leisure-class, not self-supporting, from whom public services and works of science and art may proceed. Even Darwin, in his new book, recurs to this theory. But how little is England doing for science and art compared to Germany; and the German work of that kind is not done by a leisure-class, but by poor men! I believe that the necessity of self-support, at least in the earlier years of life, is the best training for manhood; and it does not seem desirable that women should be wholly set free from it.

Gail Hamilton, on the other hand, maintains in the Independent that women should never support themselves, if it be possible honorably to avoid it. "Pecuniary dependence, degrading to men, is not only not undignified, but is the only thoroughly dignified condition for woman. In a renovated and millennial society all women will be supported by men—will have no more to do with bringing in money than the lilies of the field." This statement is delightfully uncompromising, and it is a great thing to hear an extreme position so clearly and unequivocally put. Especially on a question so difficult as the labor and wages of women, it is particularly desirable to have each extreme worked out to its logical results.

Gail Hamilton's view seems to me right, at least so far as this. It is certainly the normal condition of woman to be a wife and a mother. It is equally certain that this condition withdraws woman from the labor-market, during the prime of her life. The very years during which a man attains his highest skill and earns his highest wages—say, from 25 to 40—are lost to woman, so far as earning money is concerned. This is the main fact, as I judge, which keeps down the standard of both work and pay among women, as a class. If men, as a class, were thus heavily weighted, the result would be as clearly seen in their impaired business position. Where one sex brings into the market the full vigor of its life, and the other has only crude labor to offer, the result cannot be doubtful. Yet this is precisely the state of competition between man and woman.

I believe, therefore, with Gail Hamilton, that woman was not intended to be the equal competitor of man in business pursuits—nor to be self-supporting at all, during her career of motherhood. I think we all recognize it as a calamity, when she is obliged to support herself at that time. And most people believe with Miss Mitford that "women were not intended to earn the bread of a family," and that men are. But to earn the bread of a family is not self-support. And when Gail Hamilton takes a step beyond and says: "I think the necessity of earning her own living is always a woman's misfortune"—then she seems to theorize beyond good sense, and to confuse things very different. Self-support is one thing; supporting seven small children is quite another thing.

What she seems to me to leave out of sight is the dignity of labor. Woman during the period of maternity is rightly excused from earning money; but it is because she is otherwise occupied. She is not exempted in the character of a lily of the field, but in the capacity of mother of a family. It is an important distinction. For labor in the lower sense she substitutes what, in a higher and more sacred sense, we still call "labor." She is not supported because she is a woman, but because in her capacity as woman she happens to have home-duties. If she had no such duties, there seems no reason why she should be supported any more than if she were a man. To be a wife and mother is a vocation, and one which usually precludes all others. Merely to be a woman is not a vocation; and so long as one can make no better claim on the world than that, the world has a right to demand something more. The Irish-woman who locks her little children into her one room that she may go out to earn their bread seems to me in a position no false than that of the over-worked father who breaks himself down with toil that his daughters may live like Gail Hamilton's lilies. "In a renovated and millennial state of society" it is to be hoped that both these evils may be remedied; that wives and mothers may accept support as their right, and that single women may take pride in that self-support, of which Gail Hamilton affords so honorable an example.

"Father" Taylor on Ralph Waldo Emerson: "He is a Christian, no matter what he says about it, and will have to go to heaven—for if the devil got him, he would never know what to do with him. There seems to me to be a screw loose somewhere, though I never could tell where; for, listen as close as I might, I could never hear any jar in the machinery. He's certainly a Christian, though he knows no more of the principles of Christian doctrine than Balaam's ass knew of the principles of Hebrew grammar."—Boston Commonwealth.

THE DESCENT OF MAN.

[From Blackwood's Magazine.]

- "Man comes from a Mammal that lived up a tree,
And a great coat of hair on his outside had he,
Very much like the Dreadnaughts we frequently see—
Which nobody can deny.
- "He had points to his ears, and a tail to his rump,
To assist him with ease through the branches to jump—
In some cases quite long, and in some a mere stump—
Which nobody can deny.
- "This Mammal, abstaining from mischievous pranks,
Was thought worthy in time to be raised from the ranks,
And with some small ado came to stand on two shanks—
Which nobody can deny.
- "Thus planted, his course he so prudently steered,
That his hand soon improved and his intellect cleared;
Then his forehead enlarged and his tail disappeared—
Which nobody can deny.
- "Tisn't easy to settle when Man became Man;
When the Monkey-type stopped and the Human began;
But some very queer things were involved in the plan—
Which nobody can deny.
- "Women plainly had beards and big whiskers at first;
While the man supplied milk when the baby was nursed;
And some other strong facts I could tell, if I durst—
Which nobody can deny.
- "Our arboreal sire had a pedigree, too;
The Marsupial system comes here into view;
So we'll trace him, I think, to a Greek Kangaroo—
Which nobody can deny.
- "The Kangaroo's parent, perhaps, was a bird;
But an Ornithorhynchus would not be absurd;
Then to frogs and strange fishes we back are referred—
Which nobody can deny."
- Thus far Darwin has said. But the root of the Tree,
Its nature, its name, and what caused it to be,
Seem a secret to him, just as much as to me—
Which nobody can deny.
- Did it always exist as a great institution?
And what made it start on its first evolution?
As to this our good friend offers no contribution—
Which nobody can deny.
- Yet I think that if Darwin would make a clean breast,
Some Botanical views would be frankly confessed,
And that all Flesh is Grass would stand boldly expressed—
Which nobody can deny.
- The Loves of the Plants, so deliciously sung,
Must have softened his heart, when his bosom was young,
And the Temple of Nature has prompted his tongue—
Which nobody can deny.
- But now if in future good breeding we prize,
To be cherubs and angels we some day may rise;
And, indeed, some sweet angels are now in my eyes—
Which nobody can deny.
- If this is our wish, we must act with due care;
And in choosing our spouses no pains we should spare,
But select only those that are wise, good, and fair—
Which nobody can deny.
- Yet however he came by it, Man has a Soul,
That will not so submit to despotic control,
As to make Monks and Nuns of three-fourths of the whole—
Which nobody can deny.
- The Bad may be pretty, the Good may be plain;
And sad matches are made from the lure of gain;
So perhaps as we are we shall likely remain—
Which nobody can deny.
- After all, then, I ask, what's the object in view?
And what practical good from this creed can ensue?
I can't find in it much that's both useful and new—
Which nobody can deny.
- Our old friend Lucretius explained long ago
How the fittest survive and the weak are laid low;
And our friends of the Farm must a thing or two know—
Which nobody can deny.
- I would ne'er take offence at what's honestly meant,
Or that truth should be told of our lowly descent;
To be sprung from the dust I am humbly content—
Which nobody can deny.
- But this groping and guessing may all be mistaken,
And in sensitive minds may much trouble awaken,
So I'll shut up my book, and go back to my Bacon—
Which nobody can deny.

CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT.—The difference between Romanism and Protestantism may be briefly stated thus:—A Protestant dogmatist tells you to think, but devotes you to perdition if you think differently from himself. A Roman Catholic dogmatist will not let you think at all. We hold that the first is a great improvement on the second.—Investigator.

A correspondent of the Golden Age asks:—"What has become of the lost Ten Tribes of the children of Israel?" We respectfully inform our correspondent that at the latest moment of going to press we had received no reliable advices on the subject.—Golden Age.

A WONDERFUL BOOK.

[By the Literary Critic of the Boston Commonwealth.]

The Kingdom of Heaven: What it is, Where it is, &c. By Jesse H. Jones. Published by the Author. For Sales by Noyes, Holmes & Co., and by Henry Hoyt, Boston.—Mr. Jones is an "orthodox" preacher settled at Natick. He is a brave man—has encountered the Free Religionists on their own platform; has bearded the Radical lion in the creature's own den in Chestnut street; and, to judge him by the present extraordinary product of his pen, is a match for the world, the flesh, the devil and common-sense all together. His book, whatever its immediate success or want of success, will be nuts for some future mouser after literary curiosities. It is an amorphous and incredible compound of Genesis, St. Paul, John Calvin, Fourier, Mrs. Farnham and the Reverend Jesse himself. He is entirely and stringently "orthodox," to begin with. No one can be sounder on the Fall of Man and the Plan of Salvation. He is of opinion that the last and lowest possible result of Adam's irregularity is to be found in Free Religion. So far he is quite satisfactory. In these latitudinarian days, it is refreshing to come across one who toes the mark so squarely. Next, he insists upon the opposition of the flesh and spirit, quoting and following St. Paul. Then he hastens to assure us that the flesh is represented by the male human creature, and the spirit by the female. Here he probably does not profess to invoke the authority of Paul. Then he demonstrates that the kingdom of heaven was announced as to come in this world, not in another. This is neither doubtful nor new. Entering now into detail, he specifies the purposes of Jesus Christ: first, to abolish slavery; secondly, "to destroy the custom of deeding land," which is "a form of selfishness;" thirdly, to put an end forever to "wages, rent, interest and profit," which are not only "forms of selfishness," but "forms and degrees of slavery" as well; fourthly and finally, to establish woman-suffrage. With this last the kingdom of heaven will burst into perfect blossom, to satisfy the eyes of men and angels with unutterable beauty, and to fill the nostrils of all creation with a sweet-smelling savor. Having got so far, the writer arrives at the culminating article of his remarkable creed. To this he surrenders a full page, set off with a very flowery and emphatic style of ornamental border. We cannot afford the space to do it justice in the same liberal way, but will compromise upon simple capitals. It runs thus: THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA IS THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN WHICH JESUS CHRIST CAME TO ESTABLISH ON THE EARTH.

Ordinary criticism is unequal to the encounter with the Rev. Mr. Jones. He carries quite too many guns for us. He fires east, west, north and south, and from east, west, north and south, and down from above and up from below; he hurls upon us cartloads of Bible history, and peppers us out of his native resources with prophecy by the ton. If modern civilization does not succumb to this ubiquitous cannonade, it will behave quite improperly. For ourselves, having read the book, we feel confused, contused, obliterated, left nowhere. Mr. Jones's kingdom of heaven is undoubtedly coming, for he says so in such an awful tone of prophecy as we have no strength to contend with. We have not been oversanguine as to the future, but really had not imagined that anything so bad was in store for the world. That three-fold communism, "communism in life-work, communism in social life, communism in political life," which Mr. Jones is about to inaugurate, surpasses all our worst apprehensions. As we anticipate and imagine it, a little picture arises before us. It is that of ourself as a small boy standing up in school, and saying very pleadingly, "Please, ma'am, may I go out?"

It is high time for our "Evangelical" friends to stop sneering at Unitarianism as "Religion made easy," for there is a laxity in the terms of salvation as expounded by "Orthodox" teachers which often shocks Unitarians, and Universalists also.

In a volume of selections from the works of "that renowned Puritan, Thomas Brooks," edited by the still more renowned C. H. Spurgeon, and published by Gould & Lincoln in 1860, we read: "He that believeth shall be saved, let his sins be ever so great; and he that believeth not shall be damned, let his sins be ever so little."

Rev. S. J. May bears witness that in one of Henry Ward Beecher's "Familiar Lectures," published in the Independent, the pastor of Plymouth Church said: "This is our danger; not that we shall be sinful, not that we shall be imperfect, not that we shall be vain, not that we shall be foolish, not that we shall be corrupt in our imaginations, but that we shall not believe in Christ. Our salvation is not half so much imperilled by wickedness as by unbelief."

In the last Register, we quoted from an eminent "Evangelical" divine who teaches that men may be regenerated in sleep, and it is not long since a prominent journal boasted that according to the "Orthodox" theology, a man of the worst life and character can read his title clear to Heaven, if, a few hours before death, he repents and relies wholly upon the atoning blood of Jesus. Even Dr. Nehemiah Adams, in a tract which we read several years ago, told of a graceless youth who was killed suddenly by being thrown from his horse, but his friends were comforted by the hopeful suggestion that

"Betwixt the saddle and the ground
Was mercy asked, and pardon found."

—Christian Register.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"In your little dispute with the Investigator about the meaning and bearing of the terms 'Infidel' and 'Infidelity,' I think you both a little at fault. Though you were right respecting the literal, radical (etymological) meaning of these terms, yet you were, perhaps, a little too strict in their application; for whatever their literal sense may be, their general sense, even as used by Christians, expresses mainly disbelief in, and infidelity to, the Bible or the Christian religion. Mr. Seaver, on the contrary, was wrong in allowing only the sense given them by him and infidels, and in charging you with insinuations which you, I know, intended as little to make as he himself. The time has, happily, passed when the literal sense is coupled with the use of the term 'infidel,' even if used by Christians themselves; and actually means now no more than 'unbeliever.' Yet it is still, and will be, an odious nick-name, so long as the terms 'Christian' and 'believer' are synonymous with honesty and respectability. Let them use these terms who may, and give to them the meaning they choose, I do not care much myself to be called an infidel, nor do I hesitate much to avow myself an infidel when called one. I think it better to avow it and boldly defend infidelity, than to deny it and make a long argument to prove my fidelity.

About a year ago, the Chancellor of the Bishop of came to my place in company with the Catholic priest of this city, and a little dispute was soon got up. In the course of this dispute, and when a little cornered respecting the Bible, the former said, 'Why, sir, you are an infidel!' But when, instead of repelling the charge and defending myself, as he no doubt expected, I said, 'Of course I am,' he was non-plussed, and became so disconcerted that he could not argue any more. It was, probably, too new and unexpected to him, that an infidel should avow his unbelief in the Bible to his face; that he should be told that his dictum was deemed insufficient; that it was not enough to say, 'You dare not think thus and so,' but that he should have to give reason and argument. That entirely disconcerted him. He went away saying, laughingly, 'I shall make a good Catholic of you yet?' 'You may,' I replied, 'as soon as you can give me reason and argument enough to convince me.' But he has never tried since to make a good Catholic out of me. And so I am still for no-religion and infidelity, but with much esteem and sincerity yours."

"I write to acknowledge receipt of the bound copy of THE INDEX. I have had time to give it but a cursory glance, yet the little that I have read is enough to convince me of how much value and comfort it will be to me. It treats of subjects that have been perplexing my mind for many years. Educated in what has been claimed to be a liberal faith (the Unitarian), I was alarmed when I first commenced to doubt some of its articles of belief; but in spite of my temerity the spirit of the age got possession of me, and I am now, I suppose, of that number who would be classed among the most radical of radicals. My best wishes attend your undertaking. Would that there could be an INDEX missionary society, rich enough and powerful enough to scatter its hopeful and comforting views to the millions of hungry and thirsting CHRISTIANS who are longing for something more and fresher to help them than can be found in their good, but not perfect book, the Bible."

"I saw the notice of your paper in The Independent. I wish you to send me one copy of your paper, as we have some twenty-five in this place that have lately unpinned themselves from creeds and old Biblical notions. I think your paper will be what we now want. Please send one, and if it suits I will send you all the subscribers that I can get—I think from twelve to twenty-five."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RECEIVED.

SECOND ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BUREAU OF STATISTICS OF LABOR, OF MASSACHUSETTS; embracing the Account of its Operations and Inquiries from March 1, 1870, to March 1, 1871. Boston: WRIGHT & POTTER, State Printers, 79 Milk Street (corner of Federal). 1871. Paper. pp. 655.

FAITH AND MORALS. Two Sermons, by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, March 5th and 12th, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 47.

CATALOGUE OF THE OFFICERS AND STUDENTS OF the Meadville Theological School, for the Academic Years 1869-70 and 1870-71. Meadville, Pa.: REPUBLICAN Book and Job Printing House. 1871. pp. 8.

THE LADIES' REPOSITORY AND HOME MAGAZINE. May, 1871. Rev. A. W. WILEY, D. D., Editor. CARLTON & LANAHAN, New York.

TYPOGRAPHIC MESSENGER. April, 1871. JAMES CONNER'S SONS, 28, 30 and 32 Centre Street, New York.

Poetry.

SUPERSTITION.

That superstition which has grown with us,
Know it for superstition though we may,
Relaxes not for that its hold upon us.
Not all who scorn their chains are free.

LESSING'S "NATHAN THE WISE."

The Index.

MAY 20, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for Single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the Subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [These Lectures.] 8. Lying Pretences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom, and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
TOLEDO, O., April, 1871. For the INDEX ASSOCIATION.

MISS COBBE'S NEW BOOK.

We are indebted to Miss Frances Power Cobbe for a copy of her "Alone to the Alone: Prayers for Theists by Several Contributors," just issued by Williams and Norgate, London. It is "designed for the use of those who desire to cultivate the feelings which culminate in prayer, but who find the rich and beautiful collections of the churches of Christendom no longer available, either because of the doctrines whose acceptance they imply, or of the requests to which they give utterance."

The preface (which Mr. Towne will reprint in his next Examiner) is a beautiful essay on the subject of prayer, marked by that wonderful delicacy and tenderness of religious sentiment which have given Miss Cobbe so great an influence over multitudes of the noblest souls of the age. Her philosophy of religion, like that of Theodore Parker, whom she so deeply revered, inclines strongly to intuitionism; and perhaps no one living is better qualified than she to represent it in its most admirable phase. Many of the prayers (some of which are in French) are instinct with feeling and life, and will doubtless in numerous cases fulfil their aim of ministering to a devout inward life. They utter the profoundest aspirations of brave and gentle spirits, and such will read them with sympathy,—we doubt not, also with increase of pure and high purpose.

And yet, while pausing on these pages, we are conscious of a sense of unrealized hope. Something we want that we fail to find. Too much of the supplicatory tone, too little of self-poise even in the felt presence of Infinite Being, jars upon us. There is a grand dignity in the prayer of Epictetus which cannot be spared. Paganism also has its lesson to teach. Prayers of petition, impossible without the ignoring of law, are at all seasons unseasonable, even though the good sought be a spiritual good. Man gets what he takes,—no more. He must unlearn the petitionary attitude. Still less can he afford to apologize to God. If he has done evil, let him apologize to the brother he has wronged, or to the selfhood he has degraded; but to God, whom he can neither wrong nor degrade, let him offer a self-respecting worship. When fear is outgrown, let the language of fear be disused; and out of the awe and grave confidence which befit the finite in contemplation of the Infinite, let no thought or word be born unworthy of the divine unity that makes them one.

We have for genuine prayer nothing but inexpressible reverence; and in this genuine book there is much that touches its hidden springs. While no book can become a breviary to those who make their temple in the solitariness of their own souls, the pages of this little volume are rich in the moral inspiration and the spiritual life which deepen all that is best in man. Miss Cobbe has earned the gratitude of all who are moved by the passion for ideal excellence and truth and beauty, and who find in these the supreme manifestation of Universal Being.

A LIBERALIST VICTORY.

From the Toledo Woehentliche Express, of May 15, we translate the following:—

"At the election of school directors on Tuesday, Mr. Chas. W. Hill was re-elected in the first ward, Mr. Calvin Cone in the third, and Mr. D. Y. Howell in the seventh. The result, especially in the third ward, is a very satisfactory one, since the conservatives [die Mucker] in that ward had nominated Mr. Hiatt with the express understanding that the Bible should be retained in the free schools. Mr. Cone, who was nominated by the liberals without regard to partisan opinions, belongs on the contrary to the rationalistic society of Mr. Abbot, which desires to have all sectarianism banished from the schools. This is a new proof of our assertion, on the occasion of our late city election, that the liberal element of the Republican party in our city has the upper hand."

We add that the re-election of Gen. Hill is also a very satisfactory result to us personally, since the marked success of the Evening School experiment is largely due to his disinterested, generous, and indefatigable exertions. He believes that the existing State laws prevent the abolition of all distinction in the Toledo day schools on account of color; and although there is a difference of opinion among the citizens on this subject, nobody questions the entire sincerity of Gen. Hill's opinion. In justice to him, moreover, it ought to be stated that he is as earnest for the removal of the real or supposed restrictions as any one. In the Evening Schools of last winter no distinction on account of color was permitted; and this course had the full approval of Gen. Hill. We doubt if another gentleman could be found in the whole city who would be willing to give so large a share of his time and services to the cause of education; and while we are exceedingly anxious that the last traces of inequality on account of color should be banished from all our institutions, we believe that nothing but a sense of duty to execute existing laws has been the reason of Gen. Hill's course in this particular. If these laws are still behind the age, let an urgent petition from the School Board be sent to Columbus for their immediate modification, and let Toledo free itself as speedily as possible from the disgrace of perpetuating odious distinctions which had their origin in African slavery.

Dr. Dean, a missionary writing from Bangkok, and referring to the interior of China, says in a recent number of the Morning Star:

"Standing face to face before these hundreds of millions of our fellow-men going to eternity without Christ, we are awe-struck, and stagger back from the sight."

Considering that, according to Dr. Dean's theology, "going to eternity without Christ" means going to an everlasting hell, we think he ought to stagger. Evangelical believers are horrified at the Spanish Inquisition administered by Catholics in former times with such frightful and cold-blooded cruelty; but they themselves worship a Grand Inquisitor from whose inconceivably more horrid atrocities death opens no gate of quick escape, but by whose fiendish order the executioners inflict throughout eternity an infinitude of agony at each moment upon their pain-maddened and despairing victims. An intelligent Chinese, coming to America and beholding what sort of a God is adored in our American churches, would be more staggered than Dr. Dean. And with infinitely better reason.

Zion's Herald has been hunting through its old copies of THE INDEX for "blasphemies," and at last pounces, like a hawk on a hen-roost, on something it discovers in an issue of ours more than a year back. The Herald is undeniably a connoisseur in blasphemy. We would no more dispute its judgment than that of the Holy Office of the Inquisition. But it is encouraging to learn that so competent a judge vouches for our freedom from blasphemy during the year just elapsed. If we had dropped a bit of blasphemy at a later date, the lynx-like eyes of the Herald would have seen it; and, with our amiable contemporary, seeing is telling. Considering our reformation, we trust this præco blasphemie will pardon a youthful indiscretion. Meanwhile, it is delightful to discover that the Herald is such a faithful student of our old INDEXES. Continued study of them will doubtless be very beneficial. Shall we send a bound volume?

Dr. Bartol, so well known at the East as one of the few long-honored ministers among the Unitarians who thoroughly sympathize with the advanced thought of the age, will issue through Roberts Brothers, Boston, in October, a book with the title—"Radical Faith." The public will await its appearance with impatience to learn what this poet-thinker has to say; while his friends will hope to discover here the secret of a life and character which are yet more eloquent than his words.

Mr. Pillsbury will lecture to the Free Congregational Society at Florence, Mass., on the second and third Sundays of June.

THE RADICAL: CONTENTS FOR MAY.—The Ethics of the Will: Moncure D. Conway. The King Beautiful: F. G. Fairchild. Unpublished Letters from Theodore Parker: T. W. Higginson. Prayer in the Light of Law: George S. Burleigh. Goethe's Conversations with Frederick von Mueller: C. C. Shackford. Religious Conceit: Elizur Wright. Somewhere: Augusta Cooper Bristol. A Symposium in London: M. D. C. Love Comes Again: J. A. The Radical Club. Usbek a Rhedi: C. W. F. Scripture Lesson: Samuel Longfellow. Annie Beckett. III. Notes: Editor.

"The Radical for May is the best number of that monthly we have ever seen."—Christian Register.
"Dull and dangerous."—Zion's Herald.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston on the 1st and 2d of June.

A session for business (hearing of Reports, election of officers, &c.,) will be held in Fraternity Hall on Thursday, June 1st, at three P. M.

On Friday, June 2d, there will be a general Convention with three sessions in Tremont Temple. Essays are expected from John Weiss on "The Attitude of Science toward Religion;" from Rabbi Wise, on "A Jew's View of Jesus;" and from O. B. Frothingham, on "The Existing Power of Superstition and Dogmatism;" and these will be the subjects for consideration at the several sessions. Other able and distinguished speakers will be present.

Let there be a good attendance of the constituents of the Association from the whole country.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

"ECCELESIASTICAL CONTINUITY."

There has been not a little discussion in recent years concerning "ecclesiastical continuity." This discussion has been mainly among those who hold liberal views in religion; and yet it is evident that not all who have taken part in it have agreed as to the meaning of the phrase. When a Roman Catholic or a strict Episcopalian makes a claim for ecclesiastical continuity, we know, of course, that he means by it something very different from what can be meant by a person of liberal and rationalistic faith who asserts his belief in it. To the Catholic, ecclesiastical continuity means simply the unbroken permanence of the Church of Rome. To the strict Episcopalian, it is but another term to express his belief in the unbroken line of Apostolic succession. But liberal Protestants who have put in a claim for ecclesiastical continuity appear to mean simply the permanence and spiritual unity of the Christian Church and institutions under whatever variety of dogma or change of form. And their argument is directed mainly against the growing tendency on the liberal side of Christendom to believe that it is possible that the future religious welfare of the world may depend on something else besides the specific institutions of Christianity.

But the argument springs from a misconception of this tendency, and rests upon putting into the term ecclesiastical continuity an artificial and arbitrary meaning. Many persons seem to think that there is a portion of Christendom that is trying to break off absolutely from the influence of these eighteen centuries of Christian history, and to go on as if Christianity had never been: and they exclaim,—“Impossible!” The very culture and vigor of thought with which you protest against the permanence of Christianity are the result of your Christian training; and the very virtues which make your protest seem plausible have come to you through a long line of Christian ancestry and spring from a Christian root. You cannot break off from Christianity and go along as if it had never been, however much you may try to do it.” Now is there anybody in Christendom who expects to accomplish that wonderful feat of spiritual legerdemain? The writer of this can claim to be somewhat conversant with the radical religious thought of the time, but he knows of no one who proposes to jump clean off the world, and begin society, religion, life, utterly anew, as if nothing had ever been. He knows very many persons who do not believe that Christianity contains the whole of religious truth, or that it is synonymous with absolute religion, or that it is the root of everything that is good in modern civilization, or that it has the necessary elements for becoming the permanent and universal religion of mankind. But he knows of nobody who does not recognize as a fact that modern society in Europe and America has been moulded and permeated by Christian influences; nobody in the limits of Christendom who is not profoundly conscious that Christianity in some of its features has entered into the very ground-work of his mental and moral being, and who would not think it as preposterous to suppose that he could cut himself off from these elements, hereditary and educational, that have gone into the formation of his character, as it would be to try to separate his present physical life from the elements of the atmosphere which he has breathed into his lungs, and from the particles of various nutriment which have gone into the substance of his body.

But the phrase “ecclesiastical continuity” does not go deep enough to express the whole truth; and does not express except by a loose use of language what is really the truth in respect to religious progress. Ecclesiastical continuity properly means the continuity of the church, or of religious organization and institutions. But the line of ecclesiastical organization and development is by no means coincident with the line of religious progress. On the contrary, the line of ecclesiastical continuity must often be broken in order that religious progress may be preserved. And the phrase that properly denotes that unbroken line of natural religious development which may be traced in regular sequence through all systems and phases of religious history, is not ecclesiastical continuity, but religious or spiritual continuity. Between Catholicism and Protestantism ecclesiastical continuity was most effectually broken, but religious continuity was preserved,—the religious sentiment in its natural order of development assuming freer conditions of life and throwing off old beliefs and ceremonies in order to clothe itself with new forms better suited to its needs. So, again, between Calvinism and Liberal Christianity ecclesiastical continuity was broken, while the lineage of religious ideas remained intact. It was indeed the natural progress of the ideas that shattered the ecclesiastical line and formed new sects. And, again, the fundamental principle of Liberal Christianity, pushed to its logical consequences, develops a radical rationalism. Once assert the full right of free inquiry and private judgment in religious matters, and what stopping-place is there short of that absolute denial, which modern rationalism makes, of all spiritual authority save the voice of human reason and conscience? Thus through the entire history of Christianity continuity in the development of religious ideas has been preserved, though ecclesiastical continuity, or the chain of religious organization, has been again and again broken.

And what is true in the history of Christianity in this regard is true also of its origin, and of the whole religious history of the race. This principle of religious continuity is of universal application. There are no sudden and marvellous importations into history, but everywhere the grandest results have been preceded by a series of natural causes adequate to produce them. Christianity did not come out of the brain and heart of one man, though that man were the greatest of prophets or even an incarnate God, but out of the brain of the human race inspired with religious power through long ages. Ecclesiastical continuity between Judaism and Christianity was, indeed, very thoroughly destroyed, but religious continuity was preserved. Jesus simply announced with new emphasis and put into new shape the essential idea of “the Law and the Prophets.” The substance of religion remained the same, only developing, under a change of conditions, into new activities and producing new phases of belief and ritual.

And Christianity had its natural continuity with other religions than that of Judaism. The religious ideas of the Greeks and the Persians were also among its ancestral elements and contributed largely to its character and power. The grand characteristics of the age were that ecclesiastic forms, both Jewish and Pagan, were losing their cohesion and breaking to pieces, while religious ideas from several distinct sources were being emancipated and left free to flow together and form a more powerful religious system.

Were we to sum up, therefore, our whole indebtedness to the past for the religion we hold today, the obligation would not end eighteen centuries back. We should have to trace our religious descent beyond Christian sources; and even if we were to follow up the main genealogical line of our spiritual ancestry until we came to Moses, we should immediately be remanded back to Egypt, the mother and educator of Moses, and the nurse of a large part of the art, literature and civilization of the race, as the source of much of the wisdom and vigor that are shown in the Mosaic code of laws and in Hebrew history. In fine, we should come back at last to human nature itself,—to human nature in vital contact with infinite Intelligence and Love,—as the primitive source of all religious ideas and as furnishing the permanent substance of all religious systems. Churches perish, and ecclesiastical continuity is being broken continually; but the substance of religion is never destroyed nor lost. All the moral momentum that has been accumulating in the faith, knowledge, and virtue of the race from the beginning of its existence is saved in its career today. We begin with the inherited advantage of the entire experience of humanity. So far from standing alone and in the air, the whole solid past is beneath us. From its shoulders we lift our hands to the work of the present.

W. J. P.

See advertisement of the useful little “Abstract of Colenso on the Pentateuch.” It contains in forty-eight pages the chief results of the heretic bishop’s five volumes.

If God is indeed an “angry God,” as orthodoxy teaches, many a man has set him a better example by being superior to anger.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

I am not idle, but have harvested too much east wind and wet weather to be useful; and a severe cold and inflammation of my right eye, are among the consequences, almost unfitting me for work.

My last report brought me to Ashtabula, Ohio. That town was never known as an Eden of reform and progress, but it gave me an attendance, an attention, a contribution and list of subscribers to THE INDEX almost equal to the most ripened patch on the whole Western Reserve. The meeting was held on but short notice, too. Two or three earnest men and women can wake up any place when they set about it.

My next meeting was in Peterboro, New York, a town, as seems to me, a little unfortunate, like some young men, in having a wealthy and indulgent father. There is lack of moral thrift and enterprise. Hon. Gerrit Smith has done well for it, wondrously well—has saved it from intemperance, proslavery, prejudice against color, and other vices; but there is wanted stamina, backbone. He will endow it with an Academy, a Library, a Town Hall, a Temperance Hotel, bar-room even now converted into a well stocked reading room; will present the county with an Orphan Asylum, also located there, and already many other advantages, too numerous but not too unimportant to mention.

Still there is something more wanting to the people to give them tone, vigor, vim. An excellent lady with whom I chanced to ride into it in the stage called it immoral. But not in the common vices of our towns, generally; for she rightly considered none more free from them than Peterboro.

But the old church was deserted, had gone to decay; the new ones did not attract the people, and Sunday was their dullest day of the week.

I think it their dullest day too; but then all are too dull. I longed to see more moral and spiritual animation. The village appeared too much like what the world calls "good children," who make no noise; break no crockery, no windows; do no mischief, are always quiet; "examples of early piety;" loving to repeat—

"I want to be an angel,
And with the angels stand."

who die young, "too good for this world," and whose biography becomes a Sunday School Library book—"Published by the American Sunday School Union."

Peterboro appeared to me to need waking up, electrifying. Mr. Smith is certainly one of the most radical, as well as every way one of the noblest men of the age; and he has blessed his town and is blessing it, superabundantly; but it surely is one of the most conservative places in all the Empire State.

It is easy to see why the little meeting-houses do not attract. The stained glass of usage, custom, habit, formality, shuts out the nineteenth century sunshine. To meet as a form, to worship as a form, in the name of Radicalism, and with pretence or profession of progress, is even more fatal to true spiritual growth and development than any of the old sectarian observances themselves.

I gave two lectures in Peterboro to very attentive audiences; though with very little immediate result of any kind. But the respectful, patient, and deep attention to every word were to me assurances that the day was by no means lost.

I have left no room to tell of Syracuse and the excellent work and workers there. But you have seen them, and your readers have already heard of them, though the half has not been written nor told.

P. P.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

RATIONALISTIC METHODISM.

BROOKFIELD, MASS., April 10, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—I still insist that the existence of an appetite implies the existence somewhere of food suited to satisfy it, and that, accordingly, the food that best satisfies it is the divinest—is the one intended for it. I am prepared to argue this question with you before any jury you may see fit to select; and I will undertake to show that, as the constitution of the eye implies light, the ear sound, the lungs atmosphere, the stomach with its appetites food, so the conscience implies an authoritative rule of right, and the religious nature of man implies the existence of something more than mere speculative truth or pure thought,—the love of God shed abroad in the heart."

You say the heart must conform to the head, not the head to the heart. Never. It never has; it never will. If this is your position, you are the one that is whistling against the wind, not I. If you are pleased to "fight it out on this line," do so to your heart's content. We have only to fear those who, more cunning than you, manage to beguile and bewitch the affections.

It is something very strange to me that persons that talk so much about "humanity," "human nature," &c., as the Radicals do, and set so much by it—esteem it so highly, indeed, that they have no absolute faith in anything else—should yet be so very ignorant of it.

You intimate that the "basis facts of Christianity," referred to in my communication, are assumed, and "not proven." By no means. They have been proved over and over again. Their evidences are patent to all. Will you please "buckle down to them," and disprove them? You will find something to do to overturn the arguments adduced in favor of the basis facts of Christianity.

You speak of "buckling down to close study and hard thinking on the points at issue." That, my friend, is precisely what I am doing. Facts and arguments are precisely what I like to deal with. Nothing is easier than for Christianity to "justify itself to the intellect." It has always done it. To intimate to the contrary, with the array of learning, culture, scholarship, and genius, as well as piety, committed to its defence, seems to me anything but modest.

You ask—what matters it that Methodists are building churches at the rate of four per day, if 'Methodist ideas are dying?' What evidence have you that they are dying? Come. You demand "evidence." Now I call for it. You have insisted on "facts." I have adduced them. I called attention to the fact that the Methodists alone were building a new church every three hours, and that these churches are filled with eager listeners, and maintained by persons as ready to deny themselves to propagate their views and extend their cause as ever,—vastly readier to do so than the Radicals are. And all this goes to show that "Methodist ideas are dying," and that the "coming man will not attend church!" This may be Rationalism, but it seems to me it is not reasoning.

Finally, you seem to think my doctrine of hell might well interfere with the "mild and mellow light" our doctrines are calculated to throw around the hard features of human life. Why any more than your doctrine of grog-shops, gambling hells, and brothels, and all their attendant and unutterable misery? Hell, whatever it is, is nothing I am accountable for. It is simply the bed every man makes for himself. My winking and blinking and shutting up my eyes to the fact does not blot that fact out of existence. This earth is hell to multitudes, and the soft things you prophesy in regard to it does not mitigate the case in the least. "Myself am hell" is the testimony of thousands, and what is man in another life other than what he is in this? Will you please inform us? My doctrine on this subject is precisely what Mr. Channing states in this same number of THE INDEX. "With solemn earnestness of feeling as well as with calm scientific conviction, I am satisfied that men are free to make or mar, to crush or crown with beauty their own destiny." Will you deny this?

I close by calling attention to a bit of most significant evidence, contained in this last number of THE INDEX, of the truth of what I have frequently stated in your columns, that only Christianity, a religion of the heart, can give a happy, peaceful, triumphant death. The dying testimony of a lady of great worth and of Radical belief is thus set forth:—"She said, 'I am not afraid to die, but it does seem hard that we must all thus take a leap in the dark. I know just as much of the future as any one; and that is just nothing at all. Of one thing I am sure. If there is a future state of individual existence, I shall meet my departed friends there.' What could be sadder than such a testimony? And is this the best Radicalism can do for us? It would break my heart to have my bosom friend die thus. I repeat it, this hopelessness in view of death and eternity is the legitimate and inevitable issue of the Radical's position. How different the estate of the live Christian who, rejoicing in the light of his assured hope, exclaims:—"We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

R. H. HOWARD.

[1. The mere fact of "appetite" proves nothing, unless the appetite is shown to be natural. Will Mr. Howard adhere to his own argument, and admit that "the food that best satisfies" the appetite for opium is "the divinest—the one intended for it?" It is not the existence of the appetite, but its naturalness, that is the point in debate. Orthodoxy is opium. Every healthy mind rejects it as poison. We refer Mr. Howard to De Quincey on the effects of opium-eating.

2. Whether the "basis facts of Christianity" are proved or not, millions and millions of outsiders disbelieve the proof. Does Mr. Howard expect to convert them by appeals to their "hearts?" A very brief experience will undeceive him. He will yet perceive the necessity of addressing their reason. But he must first learn to appreciate the arguments he now ignores, and abate his confidence in the "easiness" of "justifying Christianity to the intellect."

3. Mr. Howard calls for evidence that Methodist ideas are dying. Not to dwell on the "alarming spread of intidely," which is so generally bewailed by the Christian press, we will point to one or two facts that are more specific. If any ideas have been universally recognized in past times as "Methodist ideas," the control of denominational matters by the clergy alone, and the limitation of ministerial service in one place to two years, are among these. But the secularizing influence of the age has at last forced lay representation upon the Methodist Church, thus curtailing most essentially the power of the clergy; and it has already lengthened the term of service to three years in certain contingencies, with a prospective certainty of abolishing the itinerancy altogether. Furthermore, the necessity of an educated ministry in these days of increasing enlightenment is making havoc of the old Methodist notion that the "grace of God in the heart" was a sufficient qualification for preaching. It is found that ignoramuses nowadays make few converts. Appeals to the "heart" are not enough.

But the decay of Methodist ideas is illustrated still more strikingly in Mr. Howard himself. He has become, it seems, a rationalist. Of this fact no other proof is needed than his present article. He here says explicitly that his doctrine concerning hell is "precisely" that stated by Mr. Channing, a Radical Unitarian! Now Mr. Channing was stating no doctrine of hell at all in the words quoted, as Mr. Howard is perfectly well aware. Nothing was intended or asserted but the fact of human freedom and the law of retribution as operative here on earth. No reference was made to an everlasting hell hereafter for all except "believers," which was the doctrine of primitive Methodism; and Mr. Channing would most indignantly deny believing in any such hell as that. Yet Mr. Howard, fully aware of this, declares that Mr. Channing has stated "precisely" his own "doctrine" of hell, and thus in effect declares that he himself rejects the old Methodist idea on this subject. In THE INDEX No. 52, we have already seen him rationalizing away the doctrine of total depravity; and now we see him rationalizing away the doctrine of an everlasting hell. What better proof does he want that "Methodist ideas are dying," than this proof that two of them are already dead in his own mind?

If any of our readers should say that Mr. Howard really believes in the old Methodist idea of hell, we reply that we shall not without positive proof admit that, while really believing in such a hell, he has shrunk from confessing fully his own convictions, and attempted to shield himself behind Mr. Channing by quoting his words with what we should be obliged to characterize as nothing less than disingenuousness. We have too much respect for Mr. Howard to believe him capable of any such mode of argumentation; and nothing but his own explicit avowal that he does believe in an everlasting hell hereafter, could force upon us conclusions so repugnant. We are now by his own words compelled to attribute to him, as his doctrine of hell, Mr. Channing's doctrine of purely natural retribution; and, since he well knows that Mr. Channing rejects the old Methodist idea of hell, he must now be regarded as himself rejecting it. He evidently explains hell in some rationalistic manner, and remains a Methodist somewhat as Beecher remains a Congregationalist. But what further evidence could be asked that "Methodist ideas are dying," than such cases as those of Mr. Howard, Prof. Taylor, and others who are cutting loose more or less openly from orthodox Methodism?

4. We can understand better the "soft and warm coloring" which Mr. Howard discerns in Christianity, now that we have discovered that he discards its horrible tenet of eternal hell-torments. But we cannot understand how he should forget to quote, in his closing allusion to a death-bed scene, a statement which is essential to a fair representation of it:—"She died calmly, falling sweetly asleep without a struggle or a murmur, and retained consciousness to the last." The quotation of these words, however, would seriously have changed the impression which Mr. Howard desired to make; and this may have been the reason for its omission.—Ed.]

SPIRITUALISM AS A SCIENCE.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I frequently observe that in discussions on Immortality the evidences of a future existence furnished by Spiritualism are depreciated by metaphysicians. As I cannot understand the reason of the low estimate in which these evidences are held, I beg for light; and at the risk of hitting wide of the mark in my total inability to see what appears so plain to others, I will ask a few questions which to me appear pertinent.

1. Do such metaphysicians deny the sufficiency of the testimony as proof of the facts alleged; or do they deny that the facts proved are sufficient to establish the existence of disembodied spirits?

2. What objection is urged against the mode which Spiritualists take for the examination of the question of the reality of spirit intercourse? Is it not properly an induction, and therefore a scientific method?

3. Is not the great fact established that there exists an inner or clairvoyant sense developed in some persons and latent in others; and are not facts in the material and spiritual world brought to light through this sense?

4. Wherein do some metaphysicians think the intuitional faculty, through which they claim to recognize God and Immortality, better proved or more reliable than this inner or clairvoyant sense?

As the discussion which you have initiated regarding the intuitional and scientific schools has taken such hold of the public mind, it appears to me that the claims of Spiritualism as a scientific method ought to be fully and freely examined. The fact that millions at the present day rest their hopes of a future existence on the developments of Spiritualism ought to stimulate inquiry on this topic, that we may have the benefit of clear ideas for the prosecution of further investigations, if those already made prove to be defective.

The world owes you a debt of gratitude for having presented this subject; and the first effect should be an attempt to discover how far science can acknowledge the perceptions of intuition. By science I mean the whole body of truth demonstrated, and by intuition I mean that faculty of the mind by which we perceive truths or facts of which we have little or no sensible evidence. That such a faculty exists is evident, not only from the experience of almost every one, recognizing it either in himself or others, but also from the most usual phases of Spiritualism; for the great difficulty in proving that communications come from disembodied spirits arises from the possibility that they are only the results of the intuitional faculty. But whether intuition, in the sense in which I have used it, can be identified with clairvoyance, and whether mediumistic and psychological impressions are to be attributed to the same faculty, are points which need elucidation.

I say little about God and Immortality as objects of research, because those are infinite questions. But there is no inherent impossibility of settling the question of a future state of existence on firm scientific principles; and it is evident that no satisfactory line of inquiry can be adopted, unless the inductive method be pursued. As Spiritualism alone deals with facts on this subject, so it is only from that source that we can expect scientific proof of the life hereafter.

L. BRISTOL.

[Without assuming to speak for the "metaphysicians" referred to, and without any desire to disparage the beliefs of Spiritualists, we reply to our correspondent's direct questions without reserve.

1. The proofs of spirit-intercourse offered by Spiritualism, so far as we have had opportunity to know what they are, are insufficient to satisfy our own mind. Mediums have a perfect right to insist on what "conditions of spirit-manifestation" they please. But they have no reason to be offended that others remained unconvinced, if these conditions cut off all chance of scientific inquiry. It is frivolous to speak of "investigation" in an utterly dark room, while all present are required to sit with clasped hands during the "phenomena." We have gone many times for the purpose of "investigating," but were never yet allowed to "investigate." We simply state facts. It is unfortunate that the "conditions of manifestation" are precisely such as preclude "investigation."

2. The "communications" always seem to be of so general a character as to furnish no satisfactory proof of coming from the alleged spirits. This has been our own experience of them. We deny the experience of nobody else; but in such matters we cannot take second-hand testimony. Something more than honesty is required in witnesses to such extraordinary "facts" as are recounted, namely, a mind trained to scientific observation and able rigorously to separate what is observed from what is inferred. All that any witness can testify to is what he has seen, heard, touched, smelt, tasted, thought, or felt; his testimony to any theory of all this is simply a matter of inference. Like any other court, science rigidly excludes all the inferences of the witness. She wants the bare facts alone, and she wants them all.

3. With regard to clairvoyance, we can say nothing. It ought to be scientifically studied, if possible.

4. This question we must leave for intuitionists themselves to answer.

It is our belief that Spiritualism is indeed an attempt, though we think it a crude one, to approach the problem of a future life bravely in the spirit of science. As such it is worthy of all respect; and we feel nothing but respect for the liberality, independence, and progressive sympathies of many Spiritualists. The narrowness of some is no discredit to others; and we sympathize heartily with Spiritualists of the class to which our correspondent evidently belongs.—Ed.]

IMMORTALITY: HOW PROVED.

Mr. Abbot, in his lecture on the "Intuitional and Scientific Schools," argues that nothing short of scientific demonstration will be or can be accepted by many as satisfactory proof of immortality, or (what is regarded as synonymous with it) continued intelligent existence after death. In this he is right. The intuitional faith may satisfy some, but not the mass of thinkers. Mr. Abbot does not say so, but I infer that he expects mundane science yet to furnish this proof. In this I am sure he will be disappointed. The proof will come, and it will come in strict accordance with scientific principles; but it will come from the immortals themselves. Mundane science neither has nor can have any data or sufficient basis. Her attempt to demonstrate a life beyond this would resemble the efforts of Archimedes, to find a spot outside of the earth on which to establish the machinery by which the globe could be lifted.

If, on the other hand, all the students and masters of science who have passed from earth are still in the full possession of their mental powers, and still inspired by the enthusiasm for science that possessed them here, they are not idle there. And it is reasonable to suppose that a chief field of investigation and discovery is the relations that exist between their world and ours, and a chief desire that of watching this plane of life with the glorious intelligence that they still have; and as they live, so shall we. Indeed, if we are to accept any fact in history or contemporary experience that is at all exceptional, we must admit that persons who have passed to the higher life have come back to this in every historic age and country, and still continue to come in rapidly increasing numbers.

Socrates, Plato, Julius Cæsar, Brutus, Zoroaster, Moses and all the Jewish prophets, closing with Jesus and his followers of the first century, all speak confidently of communions with those the world calls dead. Leaping across the dark centuries of Catholic rule, we come to Luther, who had his familiar. Then comes Wesley, who gives his unequalled testimony on the subject of communion with spirits. All these historic cases, however, pale before the testimonies of our own age. There are in this country at the present moment not less than one million of men and women of at least average intelligence and virtue, who calmly and positively affirm that a continued existence after death has been demonstrated to their entire satisfaction by spirits from the other side. These witnesses are to be found in every city, village and hamlet. They are our parents, companions, brothers, sisters, friends, and neighbors.

The testimony of this host of living witnesses is but hearsay, however, to him who has not enjoyed their opportunities, and, not being scientific demonstration to them, is not positive proof. This proof all will get, however, if they earnestly seek it.

B.

INTUITION AND SCIENCE.

Query—What is "Intuition?" Is there anything supernatural in nature? Is there any power of mind that transcends reason? No! You may believe in God and Immortality (as we all do); but when you say, "I know it," you are deceiving yourself.

There is enough sin to fight against in the world, there is enough to combat against, there are plenty of living, earnest problems that must be solved, and all the work that our hands can do, without trying to know what we never can know in this life. Do we not exercise a higher faith, when we say:

"We have but faith: we cannot know,
For knowledge is of things we see."

The Intuitionists seem to think it is very gloomy not to know these things; but they do not seem to consider that we seek truth, not comfort. "The world has been coddled long enough," says Mr Frothingham. It has been coddled too long. We want a faith that does not shrink from truth, however cold it may seem. Men and women! Stand up and open your eyes! Is there not plenty of work? Then up and at it! God and immortality can take care of themselves.

Ah! but I hear the Spiritualist utter his indignant protestations. "Here is our departed friend—rapping this table," he says; which of course proves that—is still alive. However, our friend—has never condescended to rap the table for me. He only does so when Spiritualists are present. So I have no proof for myself. I am content.

"Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait."

THE DOOR TO CERTAINTY.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y., April 17, 1871.

MR. ABBOT,

Dear Sir,—I find so much in THE INDEX to admire that I hope it will work its way to a constantly increasing destiny. In almost all the publications devoted to the building up of the many different forms of religious faith, such evidence only is sought as shall corroborate those special beliefs. They aim not so much to aid in the finding of truth, as to tell us what truth is; and as one mind cannot decide for another, it is seldom that any are benefited. The encouraging of individual thought is more important than any creed, unless, indeed, you can show us one containing all truth. If any human intelligence can tell us with certainty of the existence, character, and attributes of the Deity, he is wise as the Deity himself; but it seems to me all of this is not necessary in order to be assured of immortality. In your lecture in THE INDEX No. 63, you say truthfully that these are yet "open questions." To many at the present day a continuance of life beyond the grave, is not so. May it not be that nearer by you would be more successful? How sad it is that in all the long centuries of the past, the study of science has only made immortality more and more doubtful! And yet you hope it will finally demonstrate it. The testimony of those "gone before," and that which has satisfied so many millions, is not worthy of even a passing notice or a feather's weight. Science would never demonstrate to us that New Holland is inhabited, but intercourse with its people would. This intercourse you may say by many is doubted. Your hope is not in removing the doubts on this point.

We can only work and wait.

Yours truly,
P. THOMPSON.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50.

64-78

A Few More Agents Wanted For THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

A RARE OFFER.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE

Will be sent on trial the balance of this year (7 months) for

ONLY FIFTY CENTS.

It is an Original, Literary, and Progressive Monthly.

"It is the most charming, the most instructive, and in every way the most popular publication in the West."—Indiana Journal.

"I am perfectly delighted with it."—Olive Logan.

"It sparkles among other ladies' Magazines, like a real diamond among pinchbeck jewelry."—Illinois Statesman.

"It is a sensible woman's paper, and we hope there are sensible women enough to give it a wide circulation."—Advent Herald, Boston.

"It has the largest corps of regular contributors of any Western Magazine, and is really a most charming publication."—Country Gentleman.

Good Agents clear from $5.00 to $10.00 a day canvassing for it.

MRS. M. CORA BLAND,

Editor and Publisher, Indianapolis.

71-74.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WOOD & HOLBROOK'S PUBLICATIONS.
HERALD OF HEALTH.
Sixty Pages. $2.00 a Year. 20 Cts. a Number.
Three Months on Trial Twenty-five Cts.

$1 a Year to Clergymen, Teachers, and Invalids who request it. New subscribers who send $2 for 1871 will be entitled to a book of 300 pages and 100 Engravings, entitled PHYSICAL PERFECTION, or Hints towards Human Beauty, showing how to acquire and retain Bodily Symmetry, Health and Vigor, and to avoid the infirmities and deformities of age, worth $1.50. The Scientific American says, "The HERALD OF HEALTH contains more sensible articles than any monthly that comes to our sanctum."

PHYSICAL PERFECTION.—Containing Chapters on Structure of the Human Body; the Perfect Man and Woman; the Temperaments; Laws of Human Configuration; Embryology; Childhood; Effects of Mental Culture; Moral and Emotional Influences; Social Conditions and Occupations; Effects of Climate and Locality; Direct Physical Culture; Practical Hygiene; Womanhood; the Secret of Longevity; the Arts of Beauty; External Indications of Figure, etc., etc. Beautifully Illustrated with 100 Engravings, and handsomely bound. Price, by mail, $1.50.
This work has been through many editions, and has given great satisfaction to thousands. A copy is given free to subscribers to the HERALD OF HEALTH, who send $2 at once.

MINNESOTA AND ITS CLIMATE, as adapted to Consumptives, Invalids, and all who wish to make the State a Home. By Ledyard Bill, author of "A Winter in Florida." Price $1.25, post paid, by mail.

This book, while a godsend to invalids and consumptives, will be found equally interesting to sportsmen and settlers, who would find a home in this far-famed State. It contains a beautiful view of Minnehaha Falls, and also chapters on the climate of all those places which are most desirable as resorts for invalids, including Florida, Nassau, the Adirondacks, California, San Diego, Fayal, etc., etc.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL, AND PHYSICAL CULTURE; OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRUE LIVING. By Professor F. G. Welch, Superintendent in Yale College. It contains over 400 pages, and is beautifully bound. Price, by mail, $2.25.

This book is the most perfect Encyclopedia of Gymnastic exercises of the most approved method known. It tells in plain language how to do everything, from the building of a gymnasium and choosing apparatus to doing the exercises. The series of exercises with the Indian clubs alone, is the best ever published. Those who want a good work on gymnastic culture should not fail to get this one. Dr. Dio Lewis says, "This is an admirable guide to physical culture."

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS.—Hints on Getting Well and Keeping Well. By Mrs. E. B. Gleason, M. D.
Woman agents wanted everywhere. Thousands are being sold. Full contents and terms of agency sent on application. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This book is designed mainly for women, of all ages. It treats principally on the diseases of women, and includes chapters on Child Bearing and the Care of Children. Harper's Magazine, in reviewing the work, says:

"Mrs. Gleason is able to say something to wives and to mothers which no man could say. There can be no difference of opinion about the value of the practical suggestions she affords, which are characterized by sound philosophy and clear, good sterling common sense. We wish the chapter, 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract, and sent to every mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sayles, after reading it, says, "I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

No woman can read it without being made wiser and better, and without being better qualified for all the duties of life.

For any or all of the above works, address,
WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
67cove81 13 & 15 Laight St., New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING's Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Samaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science," a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAYER, LUCY STONE, and others.

THE GOLDEN RULE.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to Natural Religion or Rational Christianity.
Published at 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

L. SCOTT and J. L. HATCH, - - - - - EDITORS.
"THE GOLDEN RULE" will publish each week a thoroughly Radical Discourse by Rev. J. L. Hatch, and each number will contain an interesting story inculcating rational views of Religion. The first number contains an Historical Discourse on the "Life and Labors of Elder Jacob Knapp," delivered in the Olympic Theatre, Boston, Sunday evening, March 26. Terms, $2.00 a year in advance. Specimen copies mailed (post-paid) on the receipt of two three-cent stamps.
Address, "GOLDEN RULE,"
68-17 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

AN OLD AGENT WHO KNOWS, SAYS:
"I have never presented anything for sale that met with the approval of the entire reading community as nearly as does Henry Ward Beecher's CHRISTIAN UNION. Sorry I did not work for it sooner. Think it the best business for canvassers ever offered by any firm, to my knowledge." All of Harriet Beecher Stowe's great story, from Nov. 12, 1870, and superb $5 steel engraving GIVEN AWAY. Agents making money; subscription lists growing immensely. Address J. B. FORD & CO., 27 Park Place, New York. 73-74

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1150 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 78-98

SELL TREES. Nurserymen's and Dealer's Supplies. Price Lists, viz: No. 2, Nurserymen's; No. 3, Dealers'; No. 4, Local Canvassers'. Address W. F. HEIKES, Dayton, O. (Nursery established in 1822.) 73-76

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield Street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73ti

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. TOWN & Co., Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison St., Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73ti

INSTITUTE OF PRACTICAL CIVIL ENGINEERING, SURVEYING, AND DRAWING. Fits Students for R. R. Field-Work in Three to Six Months. Through Course One Year. For Circular address
A. VAN DER NAILLEN, Principal,
71-75. Room C, Reynolds' Block, Chicago.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed). The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 38yl or Cincinnati, O.

CHEAP PAINTING.
100 lbs. of the PECORA COMPANY'S COLORED PAINT will paint as much as 200 lbs. of Lead, and wear longer. For circulars, send ten cents to S. BOWEN, Manager, No. 150 North 4th St., Phila., Pa.
or New York.
65-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.
The Best in the Market.
One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.
Sample sent free on Application.
63-75. ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Bels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.
A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail.
Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular Price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.)
For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,
Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send or terms. 53t26

THE INDEX,
A Weekly Paper Devoted to
FREE RELIGION.
Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio.
TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

LECKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols. 6.00
MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols. 5.00
EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols. 5.00
WESSA'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes. 6.00
For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price. 2.00
LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price. 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price. 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOCK, with portrait, price. 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each. 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH. 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names, 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names, 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names, 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names, 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870
Containing the following
ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of
FIVE CENTS:

The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion, No. 1	1
What is Free Religion? No. 2	2
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 3	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, 4	4
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit, 5	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion, 6	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom, 7	7
Sunday Schools, 8	8
Friendship, 9	9
Grief and its Compensations, 11	11
The Hebrew Prophets, 12	12
Capital Punishment, 13	13
Human Ideals, 14	14
The Essence of Religion, 15	15
The Management of Children, 16	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D., 17	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune), 18	18
The Candle of the Lord, 19	19
Public Opinion, 20	20
Conscience, 21	21
The Pedigree of Man, 22	22
"Following Christ," 23	23
The Tongue, 24	24
The Golden Age, 25	25
What is Truth? 26	26
The Last Battle on the Creed Question, 27	27
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams, 28	28
The Sunday Question, 29	29
Motes and Beams, 30	30
The Dove's Departure, 31	31
The Bible in the Public Schools, 32	32
Religious Freedom, 33	33
A Plain Talk to Young Men, 34	34
Noise, 35	35
The Humility of Free Religion, 36	36
Chaos and Cosmos, 37	37
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt, 38	38
Religion and Spiritualism to Free Religion, 39	39
War and Free Religion, 40	40
Religious Revivals, 41	41
Mary and Martha, 42	42
The Ministry of Free Religion, 43	43
Success, 44	44
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness," 45	45
Spiritual Beauty, 46	46
The Book of Daniel, 47	47
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter, 48	48
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition, 49	49
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin, 50	50
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin, 51	51
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise, 52	52
Sunday—its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers, 53	53
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham, 54	54
Parties and Party Spirit, 55	55
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age, 56	56
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse, 57	57
Transient and Permanent, 58	58

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No 21.

TOLEDO, OHIO, MAY 27, 1871.

WHOLE No. 74.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VERA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE FAREWELLS OF JESUS.

[A Sermon by O. B. Frothingham.]

"I tell you truly, it is well for you that I am going away. If I go not away, the Comforter will not come to you."

JOHN, XVI, 7.

To the Spirit, then, Jesus commits the work of completing his faith. The Spirit will bring conviction to the world. The Spirit will guide unto all truth. The Spirit will show things to come. What this "Spirit" is, he does not say. It is a Spirit of Truth; it is a Comforter. It is his Spirit; he is to send it; it is to receive from him what it gives; it is to glorify him. But that it may come and do its work, it is necessary that he should retire.

It was a sad day, both for him and for his disciples, when Jesus said his farewell. They did not suppose that he ever could go away, but imagined he would be immortal on the earth. Where would be their God, when he was gone—their Providence—their Future—their faith in Heaven? They knew nothing; they had no independent beliefs, no self-sustaining will. Their minds were a mass of confusion; their hearts were a tumult of fears. They were a very simple company, who had never anticipated the necessity of believing for themselves, or standing on their own feet.

But their friend said he must go, and go he did. What was the effect? The effect was what it usually is when a truly great man goes away. We are often surprised at the different results of bereavement. Sometimes it leaves the lonely ones weak, and sometimes it makes them strong. Something depends on temperament, but much, I think, depends on the quality of the friend who has been taken away. If it is a friend who has been, very dear to us, but who has not greatly helped us,—who has absorbed us without nourishing us,—in whom we have lived but who has not imparted life to us,—then we drop down limp and laggard when he is gone. He takes us away, and leaves nothing behind. But if it be a friend whose solid grandeur was always before us as a stimulus and excitement, even though we did not understand it,—whose intercourse gave us noble life, though we did not comprehend it,—then his going away braces us; he comes back to us and is, if possible, more powerful in memory than he was in life. He rebukes our weakness; he shames our unbelief, and bids us be men and women.

So it was with these friends of Jesus. While he was with them, they depended on him too much. They lost their individuality in him. When he was gone, they depended on themselves. He revived within them and regenerated them. His words and tones reverberated all through their being. They carried him in their hearts, each one, and he grew and grew there, till their hearts were as full of him as their eyes had been before. How those men work now! How they pray! How they think! How they feel and purpose! They are not twelve men; they are twelve empires. Each was possessed by a spirit higher than his own, which became his own; and all made one body together in the same spirit. Then the beliefs which swayed the intellectual world for a thousand years began to germinate in these minds that had never thought. Then the hopes that thrilled the hearts of the Western peoples for a thousand years began to glow in these hearts that used to be so faint. Then the organizations which, under the tremendous name of the "Church," held dominion in Europe for a thousand years began to take shape under these weak hands. These simple, fearful men who dared not trust themselves from their master's side now sped away from home and country, and became centres of new communities in foreign cities. These cowards who ran away from their friend, when he was arrested, faced stoning and scourging and imprisonment in his mere name. The transfigured Jesus was more to them than the Jesus of flesh and blood. The Spirit of him came to them, when the body of him was gone. As an actual person with them, he overshadowed and impoverished them. As a soul within them, he gave them inspiration. If he had not gone away, the Comforter, this comforter who helps people comfort and sustain themselves, would never have come to them.

This experience has befallen Christendom, not once, but many times. Again and again the disciples have been bereft of the personal Jesus; again and again that bereavement has been their strength. Through a succession of departures of the Christ, the Christian spirit has been imparted.

For we are not to suppose that, when Jesus went away and left his friends alone on the earth, they thought of him as having deserted them forever and entirely. He had left their company; but they could not believe that he had abandoned them. Far enough from that. He was now, they said, at the right hand of God, watching them and ready to aid them; personally there in the highest heavens, within call and reach. To them he was in the place of God; to them he was God; "very God of very God" it was decided in the course of centuries that he was; a second person in the Godhead, that part of the Godhead which touched and had dealings with humanity. He was the heart of God; he was the God that felt, the God that had compassion, the God that sent the teaching, consoling, nerving Spirit to them. He was their God, the world's God, the church's God. They prayed to him, and were sure of answer; they believed in him, and were sure of deliverance. When they thought of Deity, their thoughts were warm. There was a home and a home-feeling in the skies. Their friend was up there. It was the infinite God himself, they said, who had been their friend, who had supped and slept under their roofs, and taken children in his arms.

This belief was the soul of the doctrine of the Trinity. Jesus was the God of Christendom; not the God of the universe, but the God of that little portion of the globe. We must do the doctrine of the Trinity the justice to admit that it made Deity a real, palpable, loving Being. It made him human. The deification of Jesus did that; and it was a great thing to do. I see not how it could have been effected in any other way; and it needed to be effected. Those were stern, stormy ages. Men sorely demanded a God, and God there was none for them. The skies were wintry; and Deity was a vanishing vapor in them. Science had not unfolded its noble charts of the globe and the heavens. Human society was restless and passionate, full of change and convulsion; intellectual apprehension was very feeble; and moral apprehension was feeble still. God must be a person, or nothing; an individual, or nothing; a real presence in rite or symbol, or nothing; a living man who could feel for them and be felt by them, or nothing. They must be conscious that his eye was on them full of tears, that his hand was ready to help them over the rough places, that his ear was within reach of their voices when they cried. It was a childish faith, but they were childish people, living in a childish world in a childish way.

Why could not the faith last forever? It was very dear and sweet. Must Jesus go away from the skies, break up the family circle of the Godhead, make Deity cold and distant and misty? A vast abstraction again, which no man could get at? Yes, it is expedient; he must go away. The reasons why he must go away are obvious. In the first place he was making God too familiar in the regards of mankind; he was changing the sentiment towards him into a sentimentalism which was exceedingly dishonoring to the infinite majesty of the Supreme. The glory of the eternal is his Unity; and that was becoming compromised by this second person, who halved his attributes and his dominion and broke him up into parts. The glory of the eternal is his Omnipresence; and that was compromised by this sociable domestic feature which was creeping in and making a few people composing a little family circle in heaven and earth feel as if they had a peculiar interest in his good will. The glory of God is his Justice; and this was weakening under the incessant dropping of tears that washed away the foundations of eternal Law. The glory of the eternal is his Spirituality; and this was fearfully damaged by all these real presences, which kept the Godhead within call of any ignorant priest. Jesus must go away from the Godhead, in order that God might be God.

But again, he could not be there longer without doing injustice to himself. Was his place there a fitting one? Did it belong to him? Was he really Deity? Then was he not really a man, with a career and a history? What was to be made of it? As soon as men began to read their Bibles, they discovered that Jesus was a man as they were; that he was hungry and thirsty; that he was lonely and sad, that he suffered and died; that he professes himself human in a hundred ways; that he avowed himself ignorant of some very important things; that he cherished some unfounded hopes in regard to his second coming to the earth; that he fell into some incidental errors; that he shrunk from the bitterness of death. Could this be a God? It must be a mistake, then, to say that he is one. Nay, it is a mistake that does him grave injustice; for it prevents our seeing how noble and sweet a man he was; it prevents our appreciating his lovely human traits; it makes him in fact an incomprehensible being. We do not know what we are reading, when we read about him. He must come down from that throne or lose his identity.

And then, too, for man's sake, he must come down. So long as he stays up there, he is not our brother but our King; we are not his friends, we are his subjects. In worshipping him we fall prostrate. It is a curious fact in history that, as Jesus went up, man went down; in proportion as he rose, they fell. The doctrine of Christ's divinity and the doctrine of man's depravity went hand in hand together. It could not be otherwise. Instead of feeling their likeness to him, and being ennobled thereby, they felt their unlikeness to him and were shamed thereby. They began to despise themselves in comparison with him, and beat their breasts before him, and say they were miserable sinners. Was this well? Was it well that they should disavow their own best human qualities because he possessed them? Was it well that they should be judging themselves by contrast with their own brother? Was it well that they should discharge themselves of all self-respect in order that he might be exalted? The belief that God was close at hand was a poor compensation for a disbelief in their own moral worth.

One by one these thoughts came upon men's minds, and it became evident that Jesus must go away once more in order that the Spirit might come.

But he does not go away entirely, after all. Half way down from his throne he stops, and takes his place among the angels. Now he is neither man nor Deity, but a being between, a mediator, who stands on the edge of Heaven and passes influences up and down,—keeps the line of communication unbroken. In this attitude men cling to him still with unabating eagerness. Thus, they say, we must have him; thus he is indispensable to us; we are willing to lose him from the Godhead, but we cannot let him go from the ranks of angels. He fills up the bleak space between us and the Deity, and that is what we want. He understands God, and he is in sympathy with us. We can go to him in our sorrow; we can feel him close at hand in our want; he spares us the trouble of reaching away up into the seventh heaven, when we are weak and need something. We are not troubled about his omnipresence, and we have his care.

A sweet faith this, and sweet has been its ministry to men and women. To many in our own day it is the sweetest faith there is; and they are sure they could not lose it without losing everything that gives them comfort and peace in the world. Many Unitarians cherish it devoutly, and one of their most powerful and large-minded men (Rev. J. F. Clarke,) has lately preached and printed an impressive sermon in advocacy of it.

But does Jesus hold this position towards his disciples without doing them harm? Granting all the service he has rendered there, is it best that he should remain there forever? May not his disciples suffer in their self-reliance from having him so near? Truly I think there is danger that they may. For "why a mediator at all?" cries the spirit in which we are born and nurtured. A mediator supposes division; but is not division healed? A mediator supposes dualism; but is not dualism done away by unity? A mediator supposes fear; but has not perfect love cast out fear? A mediator supposes a God afar off; but if we love one another, does not God dwell in us? Surely the Infinite Father needs no middle man to transact business with his child, seeing that his child is made in his own image, and that he lives in his child's heart! Surely the child needs no go-between to carry messages to its Father, seeing that he is already in communion with his Father. There needs no mediator between God and Nature. Why a mediator between God and the Soul? The sun lovingly meets the ground; why should not the Sun of Righteousness lovingly meet the spirit? The great mercy of the rain melts tenderly into the soil; why should anything stand between the heart of man and the dew of God's grace? Away, then, with all mediators! Away with the priest! Away with the guardian angel, and patron saint, and interceding virgin! Yes; let even the dear human Christ go away from his station midway between the heaven and the earth! It is better for us that he should do so. We must learn our own immediate relation with the Father; we must begin to trust in the virtue of our own humanity. We must accustom ourselves to the use of our own wings, out on the broad expanse of the air. We must prick up courage to ask for ourselves. If the Scripture calls them Gods to whom the Word of God came, shall we not dare to call ourselves Sons of God? Does not the Spirit bear witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God; and, if children, then heirs? Have we not received the spirit of adoption whereby we say "Abba, Father?" It is our privilege to commune with the Eternal face to face; for the Eternal face to face communes with us. There is no room for any stand-between or go-between.

And so, for a great many enlightened and earnest people, Jesus has said farewell and disappeared from the angelic band who threw their shining bridge over the gulf which separated the children from their Father. It was expedient for them that he should go away.

But this departure of Jesus which I have just described was not the last departure he was to take. Once more he was to stand before his disciples in a manner that made him the centre of their personal veneration. Behold him now, placed aloft in a shrine as the ideal of humanity, the individual centre of moral and spiritual power for the race, a vast figure standing on the ground but looming up, above all the centuries of human growth, casting his shadow far on in advance of all attained or visibly attainable progress; the incarnation of the human, the embodiment of all that the race dreams of, the fulfilment of all the prophecies of time, a being to be imitated, aspired after, and venerated.

Long has he occupied this position in the regards of his disciples. It has been a post of noblest service. For was not a standard like this needed? Is it not by multitudes needed now? Whether men despise themselves or exaggerate themselves, the danger is about equal that they will do themselves wrong. If they despise themselves, they do less than justice to their better nature. If they exaggerate themselves, they do more than justice to their worse. If left to choose their own ideals, they choose idols, which are ideals turned upside down. Who is the great man, the true man, the complete man? In ninety-nine cases out of every hundred they will say, the soldier is, or the banker, or the politician, or the thinker,—somebody who is great because he is big and bulky, and can make his fellows look small.

To plant Jesus at the head of a race as its king was a grand achievement. There could be no grander. To make him the normal man who placed purity, truth, mercy, compassion, humility, sweetness, aspiration, at the head of attainment, was a crowning victory. To make men believe that they ought to look up to him, if they would know what their capacities and glories and destinies were,—to him who just reversed their ordinary standards of character,—who said that their ostentatious greatness was littleness, their brute power weakness, their pompous wisdom foolishness, their pharisaic virtue vice, their self-seeking good evil,—to him who just turned their faces right about and bade them walk the other way, if they would find the kingdom,—to him who illustrated the beauty of sympathy and brotherly kindness, was a triumph which would alone fully justify the travail of the church. Such virtues as his were do not attract the vulgar admiration; they provoke the vulgar contempt rather. To set him upon a throne is what the mass of men certainly would never do for themselves.

We cannot be blind to certain dangers attendant on his being there. In the first place it is never well to have an ideal in the Past; to feel that the perfect man has been, and that the best we can do is to recover a lost image, to walk with our heads looking backwards over our shoulders. More than this. To ascribe all perfection to an individual is never safe, for, in order that he may be crowned, other individuals must be robbed of their jewels. Attention is turned away from other greatnesses, and injustice is done to other illustrations of glory. One thing is more injurious than copying a noble person, and that is believing that he is too transcendent to be copied; for if by copying another you narrow yourself, by saying that another is too great to be copied you hu-milate yourself. To say that Jesus exhausts the possibilities of humanity is to leave humanity in fact exhausted.

Jesus illustrated one type of character in a manner singularly beautiful and complete. He was the saint. The quality of self-surrender to the divine will rose in him to something more than heroism, and deepened in him to more than child-likeness. Neither in aspiration nor in trust can anything be added. But the saintly is but one element in manly character, though it be the sweetest; and the representative of one element alone is not entitled to stand as pattern of all. To make him the pattern of all is deeply injurious. In calling him the ideal man for all peoples and for all times, it has commonly been forgotten that a broad practical intelligence is one of the grand features of manhood, and this the manhood of our age and meridian possesses in a style superior to anything that was possible in his. It is forgotten that a scientific knowledge of social relations and laws is a grand feature of manly character, and this too was impossible at the time when he lived. It is forgotten that a trained and cultivated sympathy is a grand feature of manly character; and beautiful as his sympathy was in sentiment, it was necessarily imperfect in form. We have to interpret him spiritually and sentimentally. A literal fulfilment of his precepts would reduce the social world to confusion, nay, would make a social world impossible; for he eulogized poverty and discouraged marriage. Call Jesus the Saint, and you place before mankind a vision of enchanting and inspiring loveliness. Call him an ideal Man, and you set up an image that is somewhat wanting in the amplitude of our Western character, and has besides certain positive imperfections on the side of culture and will, to admire which would be dangerous, to copy which would be impossible. Jesus, who was in Judaea, could not live the life of any modern community. There would be no place for him. If he were very rich, he could withdraw himself from society, and devote himself, as a philanthropist, to the poor and the miserable. But with his livelihood to get with his principles, how could he maintain himself? In order that we may think of him as living, teaching, working among the men of this Western hemisphere, we must add to him qualities peculiar to the Western humanity. We must fill him out; supplement him, as it were, by the aid of our modern science and culture; balance his preponderating saintliness by a great weight of knowledge; and eke out his genius for religion by a genius for affairs.

But in this case it is not Jesus of Nazareth who is the ideal man; it is Jesus of Nazareth plus all that has been gained since he lived. It is a grand figure made up of a combination of the eastern and western genius. He is the world's ideal, not the Hebrew's; he is the Messiah of our anticipation, not the Messiah of the Jewish tradition.

Once more, then, it is expedient for us that Jesus should go away. It was well to worship him for all those ages; then it helped men to do so. It is not well now; for our worship cannot go out to him.

So many farewells has Jesus taken during the centuries; so many times has he left his friends alone; but so many times has he sent them the Spirit.

There is a general impression that, if Jesus goes away, religion goes away; heaven goes, and God goes; faith and hope and charity go; the very spirit of man goes. People say to us:—"Why, what have you left? You have taken Christ out of the Bible, out of the Godhead, out of the angelic company; you have been at work with your critical picks and shovels, your philosophical retorts, your historical acids; you have resolved the Christ's substance into gases, and now you have nothing but ideas!" Nothing but ideas! Nothing but truths! Nothing but principles! Nothing but naked laws of intelligence! Nothing but spirit! Nothing but God! Nothing but the power which creates and perpetually recreates! Nothing but the power which made Jesus what he was, which formed the creeds, gave the prophet his word, the hero his courage, the saint his devotion! Nothing but the power of Truth and Virtue, of Faith and Hope and Love, become so much the richer as the world has become older, and its experience richer! Nothing but this! Nothing but the utmost! Nothing but the fulness! Only all there is!

Each departure of Jesus has introduced the Spirit; the larger truth, the finer idea. He took away his presence; he left his Soul. His presence was a limitation; his Soul was a force. What have we been deprived of? Wherein are we the poorer? Wherein are we anything but the richer? Look at it for a moment. We have a glorified history. As we look back, our eye does not extend over an unrelieved flat, but the surface of the race is broken up by great mountain summits which draw the fruitfulness of the clouds. The personal grandeur and force of Jesus is there in its place, and there it is likely to stand; but it does not stand there alone, a solitary peak in the wilderness, shot up by some single volcanic eruption which did not break the ground in the neighborhood. He is there as one summit of a great chain of mountains, all belonging to the same system, and all made of the same granite, with the pebble stones that lie scattered about the plain, and with the foundations which support the verdure and the trees. He is no mount of prophecy, towering above a plain of clay; no hill of diamonds overtopping a level of limestone; but such as he is in his greatness, are all in their humbleness.

Jesus is no longer a person in the Godhead, but his merciful heart is there still. It will never be possible again to think of God as a cold abstraction. Reason about him as we may, strip off his personalities as we may, call him the Unknown, the Unknowable, the Spirit of the Universe, the organizing Force of the world, the unapproachable First Cause, still he will be warm to our feeling. He will always be the Father. We shall love him and be sure that he loves us, and the tokens of his love will be the ministers of our daily life.

Jesus has disappeared from the company of angels, but we need no angels; or rather all creatures have become angels. The spirits rise in ranks from the ground away up into eternity, and ministering spirits are innumerable. The ladder of Jacob is never drawn up into the skies.

As the Ideal of humanity, Jesus has departed. But was he not long enough in his place to make an indelible mark on the moral character of mankind? Shall we ever doubt now that purity, humility, truth, compassion, beneficence, self-forgetfulness, are supreme virtues in men and women? Shall we ever forget that saintliness is at the top of the world, and not at the bottom? Shall we ever cease to honor, in our thought at least, and more and more in our practice, the men who live and die for their kind? I cannot think we shall; and unless we do, what have we lost by an individual saint's retirement from a post he held so long? If the virtue of the bread has passed into our bodies, why complain that we have not still the loaf in the closet? When the scaffolding is taken down, it is a sign, not that the house has disappeared, but that it is ready for occupation.

I repeat, we have all the results of the previous faiths as a consequence of the passing away of the faiths themselves.

"One whisper of the Holy Ghost
The heedless world has never lost."

We think we have no faith, because we have no symbols. We think we are poor, because our gold is not buried in a pot in the cellar.

Why, never on this earth did people hold a faith so noble as ours. As a result of all the experiences of mankind thus far, we have faith in the rational possibilities of man. How can we help having it? Better than a Jesus at our side, teaching and consoling, telling us what we must believe, and putting into our mouths the words of prayer, is that magnificent reliance of modern men on the power of moral ideas. Something better it is than self-reliance; a reliance on something that is more than self, more than many selves; reliance on IDEAS, which takes up whole communities of men and put into individuals a heart greater than their own. We never doubt our power to organize commerce, direct trade, manage politics. We fall back on our human prerogative, when we reshape Constitutions and reconstruct Unions, and educate servile races for liberty, and substitute civilization for barbarism, and bring our scientific knowledge to bear on the healthy regulation of great cities, and beat back the pestilences which devastated the ancient world. Scores of great men in every line of effort have taught us that we may safely depend on ourselves, supplied with knowledge as we are now for all we need in our life's battle. Shall we doubt that we may equally depend on ourselves when we would pray and believe? Has experience enriched us for our outward life, and not for our inner? Has every kind of experience helped us except our moral experience? May we take ourselves for granted in art, science, literature, politics, trade, and when it comes to religion must we disavow ourselves entirely? Have all the deposits of the past ages enriched us except the spiritual deposits? May we take our rational powers for granted in every one of their practical applications, and then must we say that they have no validity whatever in themselves? If Jesus has passed into us, he is very much more ours than if he were moving among us.

What can any old-time creed teach us in regard to the Fatherhood of God? The sun shines on our fields; the rain falls on our farms; Sharon has not all the roses, nor the lakeside of Galilee all the lilies. The bob-o-link no more falls to the ground unnoticed than the nightingale of Damascus. Thousands and thousands of tender hearts interpret Providence lovingly. Keen philosophy, which is supposed to have never a heart in her bosom, talks about the order of the world, the nice adaptations of means to ends, the beneficent uses of pain, the stern, grand kindness of suffering and sorrow, the regenerating benignity of death, the touching economy of fear, disaster, defeat. None so tender now in his thought of God as the naturalist, the botanist, the chemist, the physicist. From their lips drop words as consoling as ever fell from the mouth of sage or saint. The Father writes his name for them on stones and leaves and feathers, on the wing of the butterfly, the scales of the fish. The beam of light, the drop of water, contain mysteries of heavenly benignity which Jesus may have had the heart to guess, but had not the eye to see.

God's continuous presence with men, his immediate contact with human ability, his cordial concurrence with human powers when they exert themselves for human weal,—can we doubt that any more? Can we doubt it who have seen how the tremendous battling of men against a political mischief which was in the way of their industries and economies proved to be the battling of God with them against enemies greater than they knew? Can we doubt it who see a new order which means peace, prosperity, law, education, justice, liberty, quietly coming in to supplant the old order which meant the reverse of all these?

Why is not all this evidence of the Living God as good as any? Aye, evidence of the indwelling God? If we may not believe in the soul by this time, Christendom has been to very little purpose. If Justice and Truth and Charity are not domesticated with us yet, something has been wrong in Christendom's way of bringing them in. Transubstantiation has been a prodigious failure, if in all these centuries it has not incorporated God with men, but has left us still dependent on a piece of bread for a taste of God. Is there no house behind the scaffolding, after all? Has the kernel of the nut rotted within the shell? Is Christendom a mask, when all is said, which must be kept up because there is no face behind it? Suppose, then, we pull it away.

The thing to do now is to use our faith. We have been talking about it long enough. Long enough have we been pulling it up by the roots to see how it was growing. There it is, full grown, with roots deep down in our experience, its branches loaded with fruit for our plucking and eating. No matter where it came from; no matter how it grew; no matter what chemical elements went into the soil that bears it. We cannot find them if we try; they have been absorbed, worked over, transformed numberless times. They have passed into souls, who have returned them to us with interest. They have nourished generations who have died and bequeathed them with their life.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

DOES THE CHURCH BELIEVE IN GOD?

The great want of today is to find God. Not only the heart longs for him, but the intellect seeks to rest in a central thought in which all the changing forms of life shall find place and meaning. The bewildered conscience, striving to find justice where wrong only appears, protesting against the wrongs which it cannot right, can find peace only in that belief. The at-one-ment (atonement), which the early church dreamed of in the sacrifice of Christ, expiating our sins and bringing together again the offended Deity and his sinning children, can only be found today in a scheme of the Universe which finds behind and in Nature one law, one idea, one meaning, one spirit whose victorious purpose includes and overcomes all sin and pain, as in music the minors are resolved in the general harmony.

To this idea of unity the world has very, very slowly grown. Like a child bewildered by the countless facts of life, it was unable at first to grasp or generalize them. In the old days of Fetichism, almost every natural object was adored as a divinity. Among the Greeks, the gods were as numberless as their hopes or fancies, and capricious as their will. The Egyptians, the Romans, all the Gentile nations, deified natural agencies, and had pantheons full of gods. The Jews, whose genius was essentially religious, were distinguished among the nations by their conception of Monotheism; and their constant falling back from that into the worship of idols, recorded in the Old Testament, which seems to so many mere stubborn wickedness, was in reality a natural backsliding from a thought in advance of the age, which the popular mind could not cleave to or understand.

But this one God of the Hebrews was not at all the God of today. He was only the god of the Jews; and the genuine Jew did not by any means desire that his knowledge or worship should be spread abroad in the earth. In those days religion was a part of politics. Each nation had its own religion and its own gods. To worship them was a part of the national customs and a sign of patriotism. The Jews differed in this,—that, while other nations had many gods, they had but one, who like a great Hebrew king should one day lead them to material success and national prosperity.

But a grand step forward was made in the Christian religion. Its glory was that it was not a national religion. Its God was not a god of the Greek, Roman or Hebrew, but belonged to humanity; and so foreign was the idea to anything then conceived of, that it was this very point which brought upon it the persecution of the Roman government, the taunts of the people. It was a religio illicita; no nation claimed it; and all who thus worshipped brought disrespect on the Roman gods and yet could not claim the tolerance extended to each national religion. This immense advance, a conception of one god for all the nations of the earth instead of separate gods for each one, could only be made in the fulness of time, and was not only a sign but a harbinger of the coming unity of the race. It was one of the things necessary to tearing down the partitions between different races and nationalities and helping forward the future of men. Only with a common Father could men be brothers. To be sure, Christianity did not long keep to Monotheism, but soon added the Son and the Holy Ghost; and the Christians, like the Jews of old, falling below a conception too hard for them, filled their churches with images of saints who formed a new pantheon.

The next great helper to this thought of unity has been Science, which the church has battled with year by year, and still looks upon with ill-disguised jealousy; Science, which, gradually enlarging its sphere, has found a constant law behind phenomena apparently the most capricious. This gradual taking possession of the different domains of life is well exemplified in Huxley's account of the different ways in which our forefathers regarded the great plague and the great fire of London. The plague they looked upon as a visitation of God, a thing they could neither prevent nor understand (for to say it was for their sins explained nothing, their sins being no worse than before or since). It was a part of the inscrutable will of God, which they must bow before. The fire was looked upon as the work of men's hands, a contingency to be provided against, a something palpable, falling within the reach of well-understood laws. But this immense field has now been taken possession of by science. The ignorant still talk of mysterious dispensations, but every intelligent person knows that plague and pestilence arise from causes as fixed as those of fires. It is thoroughly understood that one law governs all these facts; that one is no more capricious than the others. Science has unified the material universe, and is today making the form in which the thought of God will be moulded. For any real conception of unity we must look to that. It knows but one method and one end, and is showing a gradual evolution of all things by one plan. The most fruitful thought of the century is its grand but simple generalization that all forces, heat, light, electricity, etc., are but different modes of motion; and the star that shines in the highest heavens confesses itself allied to the leaf. This formula of science applied to religion finds in all theologies but different modes of motion of the human mind towards God or towards "perfection," and culminates in the Free Religion of today which acknowledges the Jew, the Mohammedan, and the Christian as of kin. And the same simple but grand thought applied to politics, recognizing the same essence in each individual, however modified by sex, rank or education, finds its logical ultimate in a free government and the brotherhood of man. It is no accident that makes contemporaneous the growth of Free Religion and the advance of woman suffrage, which is the last application of Republican principles; or that the same age brings us this generalization of science. All spring from the same root and blossom into the same unity.

The Christian Church is looked upon as the great custodian of the belief in God, a trustee to protect and defend the interest of the people in these ideas against the denials of Atheism, the doubts of Free Religion, and the silence of science. But I believe the church is today the great obstacle to that idea of unity which underlies the idea of God. It affirms God, but does not help to find him. So far from that, its fundamental idea must be outgrown before this unity can be apprehended. Christianity supposes a different law for the natural and supernatural. In the natural God's certain laws are acknowledged to rule. Seed time and harvest, sun and rain,—no man's prayers change these. In the supernatural, which they make contra-natural, uncertain caprice obtains, and God may be changed by our entreaties and supplications. The understanding can compass the one; faith and imagination are needed to lay hold of the other. And exactly as our forefathers failed even to guess at the unity of the material world, while they believed that part of its phenomena were governed by law and part by chance, so must we fail to find the higher unity in which the natural and spiritual inhere while we believe that different and contrary laws govern the two, to be reached by different methods and tested by different criteria.

Some third higher law would be needed to merge these two and show us one mind behind. It is not chiefly because the Christian is taught to find God between the pages of his Bible, and, failing to find him there, doubts his being altogether, nor that in the wrench with which his old beliefs go a painful reaction sets in. It is chiefly because the ideas of Theism and Christianity are radically different. Christianity acknowledges a duality in the universe. It finds there two laws (and fails to understand Law); two methods of working, two contrary wills. Its empty affirmations not only do not build up, they really tear down. Even Dr. Hedge, in his "Reason in Religion," seems to fall into this curious contradiction. In his Introduction, he declares that "the truths of religion are not laid hold of by scientific inquiry. Whoever would know of these things must arrive at them by a different way; he must follow the dictates of faith; he must obey the law written in the heart." In the very next essay he proves that natural and spiritual are one, different poles of the same thought, and deplores the fatal Manichæism which denies it.

Some day I think it must be acknowledged that there is no royal road to truth of any kind; but that all truth must be found, or at least verified, by the patient deductions of science. Only by a recognition of the fundamental unity which makes all truth one, can we get a conception of God. Just as the beautiful colors blend to form the pure white light by which we see, so must religion and science meet to point us to Him who is within, above and around us, "in whom we live and move and have our being."

ELIZABETH PECKHAM.

A RADICAL CURE.—Dr. Hammond prescribes iron and strychnine in certain doses as a cure for spiritualism. He scientifically demonstrates that the religious belief of several millions of intelligent human beings has sprung from and is based on a combination of sleight of hand and a bodily disease of an hysterical and cataleptical character. He can cure "mediums" of that condition of body which is supposed to be the result of communications with the spirits of dead people, by giving them the doses of iron and strychnine to which we have alluded; and thus begins the dissolution of one of the hugest hallucinations that ever deceived mankind.—Oneida Dispatch.

[We should suspect that strychnine would be an equally good remedy for materialism.—ED.]

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I am much pleased with your essays on 'The Warmth of Free Religion.' I think you have set the matter in its true light. I have read and heard much of its coldness, and the warmth of Christianity, but have never been able to conceive how actual faith in humanity could chill the heart, or eternal damnation warm any but the damned. It may be that a genuine orthodox faith would greatly sustain and cheer a mother's heart at the bedside of her dying, unrepentant son, or beside the worse than hopeless grave; but, if so, it must be on account of the miraculous 'change of heart' that we hear so much about, and by which we are supposed in some way to get rid of 'total depravity.' The reasons you give for publishing 'adverse criticisms' evince the genuine spirit of liberalism, a spirit which I have appreciated as the pre-eminent characteristic of THE INDEX. The bigotry of many radicals is no more pleasing than the orthodox sort, and comes with less grace too; and the manner in which some atheists exhibit their egotism by condescendingly attributing theism to imperfect intellectual development would be amusing, if it were not something else, and far otherwise."

—"I have read THE INDEX for the last two thirds of a year with much profit. I am a Spiritualist from conviction, produced by proof as demonstrative to my mind as that of a mathematical problem, but I find nothing to condemn in the utmost freedom of discussion. The world needs more light, and it is coming. The myths of an effete and soul-sickening theology are vanishing before the sunshine of enlightened reason. The shackles with which priestly intolerance has so long bound down humanity are breaking. Fact is supplanting fancy. Dogmatism is losing its authority. The needs of the human soul are no longer satisfied with the dry husks upon which it has so long famished. Keep the ball rolling, brother Abbot. You are doing more for humanity than a thousand pulpit parasites can undo."

—"About a year ago I spent a few days in Toledo, and was invited to attend your church and hear your sermon on the comparison of Jesus and Socrates. My friends asked how I liked Mr. Abbot and the sermon. I answered—'I think I should like Mr. Abbot better, had he offered a prayer and benediction, which he did not. I have been accustomed to hear both. As to the sermon, I am not prepared to think or believe as he does. I wish I had heard him on some other subject.' But I have grown more liberal since then, and think better of you. I have taken and read THE INDEX for the past six months, and I prize it much. I feel now that I would like to hear or read that sermon again. I will also enclose ten cents for a few copies of the 'Truths for the Times.' I have a few friends I would like to give them to. Will send for more after a time."

—"Please send me some copies of THE INDEX. I have never yet seen the paper, or any of its kind. I have held to Spiritualism a good many years, but it cannot constitute a religion. It is only a phenomenon—I am of the 'harmonical philosophy' persuasion—and am interested in the general liberal projects of the age."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—On Sunday evening, May 25, Mr. Abbot will repeat by special request his lecture of last Sunday on "Love and Justice, or the Christian and Radical Rules of Life," in the Hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block, Summit street. Door open at 7½ o'clock. Lecture to begin punctually at 8 o'clock.

RECEIVED.

THE METROPOLIS EXPLAINED AND ILLUSTRATED IN FAMILIAR FORM. With a Map. New York: Published by DEVLIN & Co., Grand Street and Broadway. 1871. 16mo, pp. 61. [Presented gratuitously to all who apply for it by mail or in person.]

BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS. A Lecture by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, read in Boston, January 8th, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 40.

AN ORATION ON THE LIFE AND SERVICES OF THOMAS PAINE, delivered by ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, at Fairbury, Ill., on the evening of January 10th, 1871. Peoria, Ill.: TRANSCRIPT BOOK AND JOB PRINT. 1871. pp. 41.

THE EGO AS A SELF-REGULATIVE. By PHILO MATTHEWS, P. O. Box 1462, New York. New York: 1869. pp. 22.

THE RADICAL. Published Monthly. June, 1871. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Bromfield St. 1871. Price $3.00 a Year. Single Numbers 30 cents.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD. A Monthly Magazine of General Literature and Science. June, 1871. New York: CATHOLIC PUBLICATION HOUSE, 9 Warren St. Price $5.00 a Year.

THE ART REVIEW. A Record of Art Progress in America, May, 1871. New York and Chicago: E. H. TRAPTON, Publisher and Proprietor, 39 Park Row, New York, and 115 Madison St., Chicago. $1.50 a Year. Single Copies 25 cents.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE SEA SHELL.

A darkness fell upon my book;
I turned, and, sick of life's words,
I fed my soul with song of birds,
And drank the music of the brook.

Yet was I as a sleeping man
Who dreams of bread and hungers still;
I missed the rich, the human thrill,
That once through every fibre ran.

I sighed, and knit my brows again,
And sought once more the Attic sage;
When, lo! a shell was on the page,
Smooth-lipped, with many a rainbow stain.

From out its convoluted halls
It breathed an echo of the sea,
A soft, imprisoned melody,
An airy captive of its walls.

Of waves that in the sunlight shine,
Of foam and salt sea-breeze it sang,
Of island palms, whose tops o'erhang
Long beaches washed by curling brine.

In the recesses of the groves,
The birds that swelled their little throats
With bursts of wild and tremulous notes,
Sang only of their own sweet loves.

The ripples that, as from a lyre,
Struck music from the pebbles cold,
And leaped to kiss again, but told
The story of their own desire.

But thou, sweet shell, that seemest thus
For tropic shores and skies to pine,
Singest a love that is not thine,
Most tender, shy, melodious.

For one whose little, timorous hand,
So gently laid thee on my book,
While I lay musing by the brook,
Whispered to thee her coy command.

Light as a fawn away she stole,
But bade thee voice to onward ear
The deep sea-swell that none may hear,
The mighty tide-wave of her soul.

1871.

ASTERISK.

The Index.

MAY 27, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for Single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the Subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital [Three Lectures]. 8. Lying Pretences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom, and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
For the INDEX Association.

TOLEDO, O., April, 1871.

We are not infrequently put to considerable trouble by receiving orders for books, tracts, &c., which are offered for sale by our advertisers. Please send direct to the latter. We do not, of course, keep everything advertised in our columns.

"THE HISTORICAL EXISTENCE OF JESUS."

One of our correspondents sends a communication with the above caption which will be found in another column. We make the following reply.

1. The fashion of regarding the four gospels as wilful fabrications of interested parties has never been in favor with scholars, nor that of regarding them as absolutely devoid of all historical value. It is not necessary, because they have been stripped of their supernatural character, to consider them as nothing but lies from beginning to end. The miracles are undoubtedly to be set aside as unhistorical; and it is no easy matter to say how much is true and how much is false of what remains. But the leading facts of the life of Jesus, his career as a religious reformer, the public claim made by him to the Messianic office, and his public execution by the Roman procurator, are as well established by the early literature of Christianity as are ninety-nine hundredths of the facts of ancient history by universally accepted pagan authorities. The extravagant suspicion which makes some believe that there never was such a man as Jesus, would, if turned against other personages of antiquity whose existence they never call in question, wonderfully abridge the labors of the historian. Archbishop Whately, in his very ingenious "Historic Doubts," satirizes (none too severely) the disbelief of the existence of Jesus by showing that nearly as good a case can be made out against the existence of Napoleon Bonaparte.

2. But the gospels are not the only testimony to the life and death of Jesus, though our correspondent is apparently unaware of this fact. There is no ancient historian of higher reputation than Tacitus, who, relating the persecution of the Christians by Nero, says explicitly:—"Christ, from whom the sect took its name, had been put to death in the reign of Tiberius by the procurator Pontius Pilate." [Auctor nominis ejus, Christus, Tiberio imperante, per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio affectus erat. ANNAL. XV, 44.]

The historian Gibbon, who will be suspected by no one of an undue bias in favor of Christianity, wrote as follows of this whole passage of Tacitus and the persecution he was describing:—"The most sceptical criticism is obliged to respect the truth of this extraordinary fact, and the integrity of this celebrated passage of Tacitus. The former is confirmed by the diligent and accurate Suetonius, who mentions the punishment which Nero inflicted on the Christians, a sect of men who had embraced a new and criminal superstition. The latter may be proved by the consent of the most ancient manuscripts; by the inimitable character of the style of Tacitus; by his reputation, which guarded his text from the interpolations of pious fraud; and by the purport of his narration, which accused the first Christians of the most atrocious crimes, without insinuating that they possessed any miraculous or even magical powers above the rest of mankind." [History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, II, 19.] It may show the degree of respect to which Tacitus is entitled, to quote the judgment passed upon his character by the English historian Froude, in his recent address to the University of St. Andrews:—"In Tacitus, Stoicism has left an eternal evidence how grand a creature man may be, though unassisted by conscious dependence on external spiritual help, through steady disdain of what is base, steady reverence for all that deserves to be revered, and inflexible integrity in word and deed."

3. There is no doubt that Jesus was indeed an "obscure person" in the eyes of the Roman government; nor is there anything "suspicious" in the silence of his contemporaries concerning him. Under the circumstances, it would have been remarkable if the doings of a Galilean peasant, executed for disturbing the public peace in a remote province, had created at the time even a ripple on the consciousness of the vast Roman Empire. Had it not been for Paul, he might never have been heard of. It is Christianity that gives importance to Jesus, not Jesus that gives importance to Christianity. It was the Messianic idea, dating long before his birth, that bore him into prominence before the world; and this would never have commanded the world's attention, if Paul by his genius and zeal had not raised it to the rank of a cosmopolitan religion. Hence we have no reason to expect more proofs of Jesus' existence than we have. But these are enough to set all reasonable doubt on the point at rest. Scepticism as to the bare fact of his life and death has nothing to show for itself, except an uncritical suspicion which, if applied elsewhere, would sweep all history into annihilation.

CHURCHES AND SCHOOL-HOUSES.

The Boston Watchman and Reflector (Baptist of the bluest orthodoxy) has the following:—

"The most elegant and sumptuous school-building in the country is said to be the High and Normal School-house for girls, recently erected in this city; but is it right to build so extravagantly and tax the people so heavily?"

There is perhaps too much tendency at present to expensiveness in architecture of all kinds, though it is doubtless a natural result of the increasing wealth of the country. But why did it not occur to the Watchman and Unreflector that extravagance in churches is far more prevalent than extravagance in school-houses, and needs a far sharper rebuke? The Baptist organ grumbles at generous outlays for education, but complacently contemplates the greater lavishness of expense for Christianity. Does the necessity of honoring religion require the building of temples to God as magnificent as those to Mammon? Why then object to honoring education in the same way?

The trouble is that, like all other sectarians, the Baptist paragraph-maker cares more for sectarian rivalries than for the intellectual culture of the whole people. The money it gladly sees applied to building gorgeous Baptist churches like that in Cambridge, so costly as to plunge societies into heavy debt and disable every poor man from taking a pew, is really raised by exciting the desire of outshining all the other sects. Souls could be "saved" as well in a barn as in a cathedral. According to the story, the "Savior" was born in a stable; but his followers prefer to be "born again" in a two hundred and fifty thousand dollar meeting-house.

The chief part of this expense is incurred for the sake of ostentation and fashionable eclat. But the money devoted to expensive school-houses is used mainly in securing greater convenience and comfort, very little being squandered on elaborate and luxurious ornamentation. Which object is worthier of a "free and intelligent people," the erection of costly churches or costly school-houses? The Watchman and Reflector, whose reflections are seldom of great value, answers this question by growling at the latter and tacitly acquiescing in the former object. But the real relative importance of honoring orthodoxy and honoring education will lead to a very different answer from the people, when it has become in truth "free and intelligent."

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

A correspondent makes the following inquiries:—

"1. Why are the birth and life, including of course the marvellous things performed, and the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, believed in by so many persons, some of whom are men and women of eminent learning and high culture?

2. What evidence is there outside of the Bible that underlies the faith of Christians?"

1. The causes are of course very various. But we think they would be mostly included under early education and the association of ideas. Taught from infancy to regard Christianity as the source of all the goodness in man, and to look upon doubt or disbelief as originating in a "wicked state of the heart," most people never use their minds on this as they do on other subjects. If they think at all, they do so under such a bias that they show little of the sagacity they manifest in business or social matters. Keen, practical men, and even highly educated scholars, believe in the miracles of the New Testament as unreflectingly as children believe in fairy stories, simply because the moral truths we all accept are indissolubly associated in their minds with these incredible marvels. Even investigations honestly undertaken but biased by previous belief end frequently in the mere confirmation of prejudice and preconception. The only radical cure for superstition is the scientific spirit. Yet not one man in a thousand has it. Until the idea of natural law is made the supreme principle of our thinking, the conceit of miracle in some form or other is sure to vitiate many of our results. Hence we must patiently work for the diffusion of the spirit of science, if we wish to see the injurious follies of the popular religion give place to sane and progressive principles.

2. If the second inquiry means—what are the alleged "evidences of Christianity" outside of the Bible?—Catholics would point to the history and traditions of their Church, and evangelical Protestants to what they call their "experiences of religion." If the inquiry means—what is the real evidential value of such "evidences?"—we should say none whatever. Science regards all phenomena and all events, all laws and all causes, as strictly natural; it therefore refuses to accept history, tradition, or testimony of any sort, as proof of the supernatural. And as to emotional religious experiences, they only prove man's capacity for such experiences—no more. The simple fact of their occurrence proves no particular theory of their cause,—any more than the simple burning of a house proves that John Brown set fire to it. The allegation of a supernatural cause for natural occurrences has no claim whatever upon the consideration of science. The "evidences of Christianity," whether as urged by Rome or Geneva, may satisfy one who is already convinced of their truth; but they are of little value to one who requires evidences that prove something.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston on the 1st and 2d of June.

A session for business (hearing of Reports, election of officers, &c.) will be held in Fraternity Hall on Thursday, June 1st, at three P. M.

On Friday, June 2d, there will be a general Convention with three sessions in Tremont Temple. Essays are expected from John Weiss on "The Attitude of Science toward Religion;" from Rabbi Wise, on "A Jew's View of Jesus;" and from O. B. Frothingham, on "The Existing Power of Superstition and Dogmatism;" and these will be the subjects for consideration at the several sessions. Other able and distinguished speakers will be present.

Let there be a good attendance of the constituents of the Association from the whole country.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

BREAD ALONE.

My friend Mr. Wasson, in the last Old and New, recurs to his favorite illustration, which he has before used vigorously against those of us who are insisting on the sympathy of religions. "What wheat is among the cereals, that is the Christ among the products of world-growth in religion." This is his summing-up, and he further cautions us not to try to "make something better than wheat, by compounding wheat, rye, maize, barley and oats," or in other words "not to try to arrive at a product better than the best in religion, by compounding the more noble with the less noble forms of spiritual growth."

The illustration is ingenious and well-put; it is so good that it holds water better than the argument of which it forms a part. I accept it, but it leads me out into opposite conclusions. This process of combining, which he deprecates, I approve; the variety of diet which he deprecates, we all follow; and if, by chance, we try his physiological method, I think we suffer for it. Every well-regulated breakfast-table may exhibit the five cereals which he thinks incompatible with each other; the cook combines them, at least to the extent of "thirds" bread; if she does not, the digestive organs do; nor do they shrink from adding the palatable buckwheat, which our friend's theological symbol ignores. Appetite and health demand precisely the variety he deprecates; and when we wish to punish a States-Prison convict or a naughty child, we do it by putting him on Mr. Wasson's regimen and giving him bread and water.

I am constrained, therefore, to think that the illustration disproves its application.

The man who insists on a single creed or symbol or example, and rejects all others, seems to me like those dyspeptics who weigh and analyze every morsel, and confine themselves to one ingredient and one rigid quantity. For some this may be needful, but I fancy that most persons will find more satisfaction in trusting their natural instincts, which point to a wider range. Hippocrates said—"The second best remedy is better than the best, if the patient likes it best." After too assiduous a devotion to superfine flour, whether in the form of hard bread or French rolls, I confess to a longing for the "less noble forms;" oatmeal and hominy become delicious; plain rye-and-Indian is inviting; and "because thou art virtuous, shall there be no more cakes"—of buckwheat?

And the natural appetite thus craves a spiritual variety, and always has had it. If Christianity is wheat, is Judaism rye, and are the Greek and Roman traditions oats and barley? That the oriental religions are Indian, is too plain to need mention. Now our civilization is a compound of these; we are nurtured by Moses as well as Jesus; we learn moral greatness from Plutarch as well as Paul. If this is already true, in spite of superstition, it will be more and more true hereafter, as superstition fades; whether we approve it or no, our children will sit down at a more abundant table than ours, and have a more healthy variety of food.

Then we shall learn of religions, what we have already learned of cereals, that though gradation is an important fact, variety is yet more important. The second best may have its special nutritive or curative qualities, which the very best may want. The third in rank may supply the defects of both its superiors. No religion, no food, no friend, combines everything; each may complete the other at some one point. When we feel that there is a slight excess of emphasis laid by Christianity upon the softer virtues, we turn to Stoicism as to a bracing air; when that air becomes too cold, we turn indoors once more. In the Jewish scriptures, the Deity is too human; in the Hindu sacred books, we find the sublime vastness we craved, and then gladly come back, at intervals, to the familiar and jealous Jehovah of the Psalms, loving, hating, cursing. In Jesus we find a more sympathetic element than in Socrates or even in Buddha; but the records of Jesus are unluckily entangled in a tiresome network of Messianic traditions and claims of personal precedence, from which the "Phædo" and the "Dhammapada" are free. It is useless to say, "Get the best"—as if a religion were a Webster's or Worcester's Dictionary, and you were allowed but one. We need them all; religions are but larger sects, and it needs the whole of them to bring out all the truth. A good loaf of wheaten bread is a delicious thing, no doubt; but it is written—"Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that cometh out of the mouth of God."

T. W. H.

A NEW STANDARD.

A daily paper, reporting recently a lecture on historical Christianity, said,—and this was all it said,—that the speaker laid down a new rule of evidence, namely, the knowledge of human nature. Precisely what the lecturer meant, was understood to mean, or charged with meaning, it would be hard to tell. Did he mean to say that a knowledge of human nature was equivalent to a knowledge of history; that it might supersede the use of critical research, or take the place of solid learning in language or literature? Did he mean to say that a knowledge of human nature could legitimate what a patient scholarship discredited, or rebut what intelligent students maintained? Did he mean to say that, by a knowledge of human nature, we might reconstruct on general principles the miraculous story of the New Testament, or the received traditions respecting the spread of the Gospel or the victories of the Church? It is difficult to suppose this, for the least thoughtful teacher must plainly enough perceive that, by this rule, every sect must justify itself. The Universalist and Unitarian are not alone in claiming the principles of human nature as authenticating their beliefs. The Calvinist unblushingly appeals to the facts of human nature in support of his frightful creed. The strong point of the "evangelical" is the conformity of his spiritual theories with the constitution of human nature. Romanist theologians make it their boast that, in the controversy between them and the Protestants, human nature is on their side. The impostors, fanatics, miracle-mongers, dealers in the preternatural, jugglers, and mountebanks are never without their argument drawn from the constitution of human nature. The old pagan religions could, as a last resort, fall back on the wisdom of consulting human nature, and adapting themselves to human nature. If each one is permitted to read human nature as he pleases (and he must be allowed to do so because "human nature" has never been and never can be scientifically explained), then the standard is simply the individual's whim, prejudice, or fancy, as in fact it is.

Still, it is quite possible that our lecturer may have taken the above mentioned extraordinary position. Intelligent men will sometimes suffer their fancy to cloud their reason. An acquaintance of mine insists that the text of the "Three Witnesses" must be genuine because it expresses a truth in his system of philosophy. What could old Porson do against the nature of things? So our lecturer on historical Christianity may have succeeded in so far forgetting the claims of accurate knowledge, as to imagine that his mind was identical with that of the Omniscient, and that his glance into the depths of his own disturbed consciousness was a glance into the secret being of universal man. No matter whether he fell into this mistake or not, let us give him the benefit of the doubt.

I took up my pen, not to expose any individual's foolishness, but to call attention to a certain a priori method of treating historical and speculative matters, which is much in vogue among Christians of the sentimental school. They are strenuous in declaring what human nature needs. Find what human nature needs, and you will find what human nature must believe. The law of demand and supply will be found to work here with as much precision as in trade and finance. Human nature will insist on having what it requires, and what is repugnant to its appetite it will reject. True. But how shall we discover what human nature needs? If we consult experience, we shall conclude that it needs very singular and sometimes very unpalatable food. Outside of Christendom it seems to need a very varied assortment of idolatries and superstitions, highly spiced dishes of fancy-worship made up of reptiles, animals, and devils. Inside of Christendom a strong craving after Romanism, winking pictures, doll Christs, broaden gods and magical holy water evinces something that looks like a need of mummery and charlatanism.

Protestant human nature needs pungent condiments in the shape of spiritual revivals, spicy courses of depravity and hell-fire, dishes of damnation seasoned with "awful mirth." Are these artificial or acquired tastes? What then are healthy tastes, and how are such to be acquired? Can it be assumed that people need what they do not ask for? Do they testify their need of baptism by neglecting it, or of communion by staying away from it? Is their hunger for Unitarianism manifest in the repugnance that is generally expressed towards it, and in the fidelity with which the crowds pass by its door? Taking appetite as a test of need, the orthodox sects have the argument, and the "liberals" must give it up.

If it be said that people at large do not know what they need, and are yet to be instructed, who shall so fitly instruct them as those who have gained their confidence by meeting the greatest number of actual wants? For a few rather unsuccessful caterers in spiritual food to say that people ought to need what they have to supply is in a degree rash. As no need can be met until it takes the form of a desire, and the desire has yet to be created, much preliminary work must be done before the education of the proper needs can be commenced.

Say that existing spiritual tastes are artificial, what then? Can anybody mention a simple, genuine, unperverted taste that is shared by men universally, or by the overwhelming majority of men, and which it is quite necessary to supply? Is it possible to think of any system of faiths or of any single article of faith, which is wholly indispensable to human welfare or happiness? Can we affirm of any particular doctrine of religion that it must be true because the heart of man absolutely needs it, and cannot be calm and happy without it?

The rationalists dispense with many beliefs which their conservative friends insist on as primary and cardinal, but they get on perfectly well without them; they are conscious of no lack, are tormented by no unsatisfied hunger of soul, but live serenely and sweetly on food the conservative knows not of. The larger portion of the human race lives quite satisfactorily to itself without any faith whatever in Christ, or any love of Jesus. The Jews furnish examples of religious fidelity, and the most liberal Christian tempts them in vain. There are many thousands of unbelievers among the Americans who make no sign of distress.

Is the belief in a "personal" God held to be essential? But there are the millions of Buddhism who rejoice in not having it. There are the mystics, and the transcendentalists, and spiritualists, and pantheists, and materialists, and unbelievers of diverse names, who discard it. These have thought they discovered their human nature required another sort of Infinite Being.

We cannot even allege the belief in personal immortality as primary and requisite. Millions of mankind do not entertain it. It is by no means universal. The desire for it is confined to a portion of the race; a large portion, it is true, but still a portion. The extent of the faith is not commensurate with the human heart.

The truth is that this talk about the principles of human nature, the needs and requirements of human nature, is an impertinence. It is more than suspected that theologians and divines have done a good deal to manufacture spiritual wants for the sake of supplying them. Having wares, they wanted a market. They had exported or manufactured goods at great expense, and must be at pains to create a demand for them. Of course nobody can do without what they find it necessary to sell.

Human nature has not fully declared itself yet; has not found utterance, or worked out its claims. The history of facts and opinions tells what people have desired hitherto, but makes no record of what they desire at present, and gives no hint of what they will desire in the time to come. The business of honest teachers consists in finding the truth as fast as they can, and in communicating it as fast as found, trusting that, if human nature needs anything, it needs that more than any fancy bread of our baking.

O. B. F.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

NEW YORK, May 12, 1871.

No change in this city is more observable, through all the year, than that of "anniversary week." Many seek to interpret the cause, but fail to apprehend it.

The last vital religion that celebrated itself here, and on this week, was Anti-Slavery. And now its glory has departed with the ancient "Broadway Tabernacle," where, in the years of its freshness and power, it was wont to congregate.

Three days were required for its observances, during which all its sessions were thronged.

Sometimes its meetings were mobbed most fiercely: more than once, broken up! Once the Tabernacle was set on fire directly under the platform. I happened to discover it myself, while curiously exploring the labyrinthine recesses of the basement story. It was in the morning of the first day of the gathering. The people were pouring in, and the fire and the fuel were increasing together. In half an hour more, the sacrifice of burnt-offering would have begun. Without creating any alarm, I called the janitor, and we put out the fire. I remember the indifference with which the janitor received my tidings that a fire was burning under the platform. I hoped he did not know it before I told him.

When the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 was enacted, we ourselves actually made New York too hot to hold us, with our fiery denunciations of it and the powers that enacted and executed it. And for two years we held the anniversaries elsewhere; one year in Syracuse, the other in Rochester.

There was no lack of interest nor of eloquence in the anniversary week of those days—"Holy Week" the New York Herald called it, with its characteristic derision.

In 1840, Hon. James G. Birney, of Kentucky, a ruling Presbyterian elder as well as a State Judge, and high in social position, wrote a book, or tract rather, entitled "The Church the Bulwark of American Slavery." Two or three years later, Mr. Stephen S. Foster published another, and much larger, called "The Brotherhood of Thieves: or a True Picture of the American Church and Clergy." Another, and still larger, succeeded a few years later, under the title of "The Church as it is: the Forlorn Hope of Slavery." It was never doubted that all three sustained well their title pages as they went on to the close.

So, you see, we kept the Church busy defending herself and her great national Juggernaut, Slavery; until at length the Rebellion broke out, and Northern Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, and the rest, had to march South and butcher in battle the very baptized brethren of the same faith with whom they had so long, at a common board, drunk the sacramental wine!

Is it any wonder that the anniversaries of such a religion are dead?

And now the Anti-Slavery mission has culminated in a victory over its terrible foe, and its altars are also cold beneath their own ashes; as why should they not be, when their warfare and worship are ended in victory?

But where now is the New York anniversary of the Free Religious movement? Never was such a demonstration so needed. Never could it have been so gloriously sustained as now. Never.

Its Phillips, its Lucretia Mott, its Abby Kelley, its Lydia Maria Child, its Gerrit Smith, its Burleighs, its Nathaniel Peabody Rogers, bravest of all, are only waiting till the Garrison call them. Let the trumpet sound.

Anniversary week must be born again. And its beauty and power shall be as never before. The glory of the latter temple may and shall exceed that of the former.

Garrison was but a Moses to the Messiah that is to be. His was a dispensation culminating in blood and battle. Let us hasten to inaugurate the Era of Peace and good will, to women and men.

PARKER PILLSBURY.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

HISTORICAL EXISTENCE OF JESUS.

MR. ABBOT:—You seem to treat with contempt "the doubts sometimes expressed as to the historical existence of Jesus," characterizing them as "scepticism without any argument." Perhaps you are unaware, as most people are, that all the proofs relied upon by Christians of the existence of Jesus, outside of the New Testament, have been demolished. I do not say that Jesus did not exist, but it is a suspicious circumstance that no record was ever produced of his crucifixion, either by the early fathers or by Constantine, the first royal pagan convert, who delivered an oration before the council of Nicea, less than 300 years after the supposed event, on the evidences of the Christian religion. If such a person was crucified, it would seem that he was so obscure that the Roman government did not deem the event worthy of record in its archives.

W. H. B.

[Nothing is further from our purpose than to treat any honest opinion with "contempt," and if we seemed to do so in the paragraph referred to in THE INDEX, No. 69, we sincerely apologize for it. Our criticism on the substance of the above article will be found in the editorial columns.—ED.]

"FREE MEDICINE" AGAIN.

MT. PLEASANT, IOWA, May 6, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—In THE INDEX of April 29, you publish a letter with the above heading, and although you reply fairly and quite fully to many of the positions taken by the writer, there still appears to me to be a very general and incorrect impression that "Free Medicine is a particular application of Free Religion." There is as much difference between theology and medicine as there is between belief and actual knowledge. All who have informed themselves on the subject know that two and two make four, that two positives repel each other, or that two similar objects cannot occupy the same space at the same time. Belief has nothing to do with this. When we inform ourselves in reference to the principles, we cannot help believing. If, then, similars are cured by similars, as Homœopaths know to be the case, contraries cannot be cured by contraries. If in a thousand instances we prescribe a remedy in disease from which amelioration and recovery follow, we are as certain this was brought about by the remedy as we are that nourishing diet sustains animal life, or that poisons destroy it.

If a committee of men in whose judgment and honesty we had full confidence were, like the San Domingo Commissioners, to visit Heaven, and give us a full report of the kingdom, where it is, what it is, and the exact way to get there, we should then have very little chance for diversity of beliefs in regard to it, but rather the same knowledge we now have of San Domingo. And until this is done, there never can be any similarity between sects in medicine and in theology.

But to some of the points in the letter. The writer seems desirous of making the impression that he is opposed to intolerance in medicine, and yet in the very outset he exhibits an intolerant spirit by speaking of his own school as the "regular or rational physicians," implying that those who do not accord with his way of thinking are irrational. He says:—"Allopathy, Homœopathy, &c., are systems, and are all wrong;" that the name Allopath was coined by the Homœopaths, but has never been accepted by the regular physicians; that they do not practise Allopathy or any other pathy. From this we are apt to infer that they have no medical principles at all, or that there are as many theories amongst them as there are practitioners; that when called to the bedside of the sick they have no science or system to govern them, nothing but a kind of empirical or experiment practice, rather hazardous, we should think, for the patient. But let us see as to the name. Renouard says in his history of medicine (Allopathic): "There are but three ways that remedies can act—by Antipathy, Homœopathy, and by some virtue which may be neither Antipathic nor Homœopathic, but only different, that is to say, Allopathic." This author, it seems, has accepted the name; but perhaps they are as eclectic in names as they are in remedies. His comparison of the pension surgeon discharged for being an Homœopathist by Dr. Van Aernam with a member of the school board, was far-fetched and has no similarity whatever. Dr. Spooner's office was not to grant certificates to applicants to practise medicine, to make prescriptions, or even to give medical advice; in short, medicine had nothing to do with it, nothing but a mere matter of diagnosis in reference to the physical disabilities of the applicant, which any well educated physician could easily make. But we are told that Dr. Spooner was not removed because he was an Homœopathist, but because "Dr. Van Aernam deemed the progress of true medicine would be obstructed by the recognition in any way of a sectarian." Here is the correspondence:—

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, }
WASHINGTON, D. C. May 25, 1870. }

DR. STILLMAN SPOONER, Oneida, New York:

Sir,—It is my intention to issue a revised list of Pension Examining Surgeons about the commencement of the fiscal year. You will therefore be pleased to fill out the enclosed personal report and return the same to this office. The interests of the service demand that this list should be absolutely correct; consequently a failure on your part to reply hereto within ten days will be regarded as a refusal to act, and a successor will be immediately appointed. Where did you graduate? When did you graduate? What is your present school of practice, Allopathic, Homœopathic, Hydropathic, or Eclectic?

H. VAN AERNAM, Commissioner.

This is Dr. Spooner's reply:

I graduated in 1832, at Fairfield, Herkimer Co., N. Y. I practised twenty years in the Allopathic school; since in the Homœopathic.

STILLMAN SPOONER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 20, 1870.

Sir,—It is deemed necessary that all Examining Surgeons for the Bureau should belong to one school and adopt one theory of medicine. This appears necessary for the sake of unity and harmony. As you do not belong to the school of medicine recognized by the Bureau, you are requested to withdraw your name from the list of Examining Surgeons; and accept my thanks for services already rendered.

Your obedient servant,

H. VAN AERNAM, Commissioner.

Now who exhibited here the greater degree of bigotry and intolerance, Dr. Spooner, who was willing to act in concert with Dr. Van Aernam, or Dr. Van Aernam, who was determined he should not, and whose course has been endorsed by medical societies and physicians of his school all over the country, the writer amongst the number? He says this was through sympathy for Van Aernam, on account of the misrepresentations to which he has been subjected; but they will now have a still wider field for their sympathy, since, thanks to the justice of the appointing power at Washington, he himself has been removed for his intolerance, and another physician appointed in his stead. Whether his successor will exhibit a more liberal spirit remains to be seen.

But the writer says:—"If, in the constant search for truth, the rational physicians find it in the system of Homœopathy, they will become Homœopaths." But when will this search ever be directed in the right spirit to Homœopathy? When Catholics all become Protestants, and Protestants become Free Religionists, probably; for should this search be made, the truth would be found right there, although we are told: "One after another, as these various systems have been suggested, have they been impartially investigated by careful, intelligent physicians; not one of them but has been found false."

Now this is blank assertion without proof. No physician ever impartially and fully investigated Homœopathy who did not become fully convinced of its truth, and, after once becoming thus convinced, no one has ever abandoned it. No geologist ever renounced geology, no chemist ever renounced chemistry. The unbelievers are those who know nothing of these sciences, or at least, know so little that it

"—intoxicates the brain.

But drinking deeply sobers them again."

A belief, therefore, in Homœopathy grows out of a knowledge of Nature's laws, as a belief in any other science, and has an unchangeable basis, not chimerical or traditional, but a verity.

The writer also says all sects in medicine are in chains. But what does he know practically of any other school except the one to which he himself belongs? As well might he say all mathematicians are in chains; but there is no escape from the chains which science throws around those who make themselves familiar with her laws. No belief is required; it is knowledge. In this respect there is not, and can never be, any similarity between medicine and theology, which has for its foundation belief only.

C. PEARSON, M. D.

[Dr. Pearson entirely misconceives the meaning of our statement that "Free Medicine is a particular application of Free Religion." We said nothing about "belief," and drew no parallel between medicine and "theology." Freedom from blind devotion to a sect is a fundamental principle of Free Religion; and this principle should be applied as strictly in medicine as theology. If Free Religion were a mere bundle of "beliefs," Dr. Pearson's protest would have some relevancy; but since it means essentially, on its intellectual side, devotion to truth in the spirit of science, without bigoted adherence to any sect or party or creed, whether in medicine or theology or politics or anything else, this protest is misdirected. Our statement is not in the least affected by it.

Further, if the modestly expressed conviction of the truth of the "Old School" of medicine is intolerance in Dr. —, the intenser conviction of the truth of Homœopathy which pervades the above article is certainly intolerance in Dr. Pearson. But we saw nothing intolerant in the letter criticised. On the contrary, it made no such extravagant claims for the "Old School" as Dr. Pearson makes for the Homœopathic School. It recognized the limitation of medical knowledge, and regarded medicine only as an "imperfect science,"—which it most assuredly is. Any sect, whether in theology or medicine, which conceives itself to have the absolute truth, is narrow and dogmatic; and it is the interest of Science, and therefore of Free Religion, to get rid of this narrowness and dogmatism as soon as possible.

Dr. Pearson, however, has proved to our entire satisfaction that Dr. Van Aernam pursued a very intolerant and proscriptive policy; nor do we see that the correspondence above given admits of any other interpretation. It is the very quintessence of sectarianism to say that all United States surgeons must "belong to one school and adopt one theory of medicine." This plea of the necessity of "unity and harmony" is the old plea of the Roman Catholic Church, which has always been urged in defence of its great historic crimes against science and free thought. The burning of Giordano Bruno, the persecution of Galileo, and the dismissal of Dr. Spooner, all rest on this hateful assumption of the right to enforce uniformity of opinion and practice for the sake of "unity." We only hope that, if Homœopaths ever gain the ascendancy, they will be guilty of no such abuse of power. But of this we feel by no means sure. They will be in great danger of it, unless they learn that the absolute truth in medicine is too vast to be all embraced within the limits of the Homœopathic theory.—ED.]

The Homœopaths will memorialize Congress to pass a law directing the Commissioner of Pensions to license examining surgeons who belong to their school of practice; but this will be opposed by the medical departments of the army and navy, who are of the Allopathic school. What business has government to discriminate between "schools" in medicine or theology? The idea is absurd. The test wanted is the education necessary to qualify the examiner for his position, not what method he uses in treating diseases!—Seaside Oracle.

THE WRONG WAY.—Then he took up another long list of pastors and churches, asking prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Some of them said that a year ago they had sent in similar requests, and great revivals of religion were bestowed in answer to prayer. One comes all the way from Allahabad, India, from a lady missionary, asking special prayer for the conversion of two very prominent and promising Hindus, whose influence is great among their countrymen. One, a judge, thoroughly honest, is anxious for discussion; "But I do not," she says, "take that way to answer him."—N. Y. Observer.

[No—discussion is not the way into the church, but out of it.—ED.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,

And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of

FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fulness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fulness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant Imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

O

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific process. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

O

Hoofland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

F

Yours, truly, GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON, Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, April 23d, 1866.

I consider "Hoofland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect, JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD, Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS, Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y., Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 23d, 1869.

I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD, Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hoofland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

N

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARCK, ESQ., Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hoofland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r. (Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hoofland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hoofland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hoofland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1 50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7 50.

Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere. 24-cowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

AN OLD AGENT WHO KNOWS, SAYS:

"I have never presented anything for sale that met with the approval of the entire reading community as nearly as does Henry Ward Beecher's CHRISTIAN UNION. Sorry I did not work for it sooner. Think it the best business for canvassers ever offered by any firm, to my knowledge." All of Harriet Beecher Stowe's great story, from Nov. 12, 1870, and superb $5 steel engraving GIVEN AWAY. Agents making money; subscription lists growing immensely. Address J. B. FORD & CO., 27 Park Place, New York. 73-74

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98

SELL TREES. Nurserymen's and Dealer's Supplies. Price Lists, viz: No. 2, Nurserymen's; No. 3, Dealers'; No. 4, Local Canvassers'. Address W. F. HEIKES, Dayton, O. (Nursery established in 1822.) 73-76

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield Street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tt

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. TOWN, 4, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison St., Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tt

INSTITUTE OF PRACTICAL CIVIL ENGINEERING, SURVEYING, AND DRAWING, Fits Students for R. R. Field-Work in Three to Six Months. Through Course One Year. For Circular address A. VAN DER NAILLEN, Principal, Room C, Reynolds' Block, Chicago. 71-75.

WANTED.—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., 3 Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 38yt

or Cincinnati, O.

CHEAP PAINTING.—100 lbs. of the PECORA COMPANY'S COLORED PAINT will paint as much as 200 lbs. of Lead, and wear longer. For circulars, send ten cents to S. BOWEN, Manager, No. 150 North 4th St., Phila., Pa.

POST LEAD. or New York. 65-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75. ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

SERMONS By Rev. O. B. Frothingham.

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian? Taking God's Name in Vain. The Issue with Superstition. Infernal and Celestial Love. The Sin Against the Holy Ghost. Pilate and Jesus. The Dying and the Living God. The Foes of Society. The Living Spring of Water. Elective Affinity. Religious Irreligion. Experience and Hope. The Radical Belief. The Eternal Gospel.

DAVID G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place, New York 49t3]

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50. 64-78

A Few More Agents Wanted For THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

A RARE OFFER.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE

Will be sent on trial the balance of this year (7 months) for ONLY FIFTY CENTS.

It is an Original, Literary, and Progressive Monthly.

"It is the most charming, the most instructive, and in every way the most popular publication in the West."—Indiana Journal.

"I am perfectly delighted with it."—Olive Logan.

"It sparkles among other ladies' Magazines, like a real diamond among pinchbeck jewelry."—Illinois Statesman.

"It is a sensible woman's paper, and we hope there are sensible women enough to give it a wide circulation."—Advent Herald, Boston.

"It has the largest corps of regular contributors of any Western Magazine, and is really a most charming publication."—Country Gentleman.

Good Agents clear from $5.00 to $10.00 a day canvassing for it.

MRS. M. CORA BLAND, Editor and Publisher, Indianapolis. 71-74.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio. TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause to represent to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octavo Melodeons (price $65.) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

Lecky's History of European Morals, 2 vols. 6.00

Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00

Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols. 5.00

Weiss's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes. 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price. $2.00

Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price. 2.00

Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price. 2.00

Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOYT, with portrait, price. 2.00

Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each. 2.00

On the Heights, AVERBACH. 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks

For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, LOCK BOX 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,	1
What is Free Religion?	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones,	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions,	5
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,	7
Sunday Schools,	8
Friendship,	9
Grief and its Compensations,	11
The Hebrew Prophets,	12
Capital Punishment,	13
Human Ideals,	14
The Essence of Religion,	15
The Management of Children,	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),	17
The Candle of the Lord,	18
Public Opinion,	19
Conscience,	20
The Pedigree of Man,	21
"Following Christ,"	22
The Tongue,	23
The Golden Age,	24
What is Truth?	25
The Last Battle on the Great Question,	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,	27
The Sunday Question,	28
Motes and Beams,	29
The Dove's Departure,	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,	31
Religious Freedom,	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,	33
Noise,	34
The Humility of Free Religion,	35
Chaos and Cosmos,	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,	38
War and Free Religion,	39
Religious Revivals,	40
Mary and Martha,	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,	42
Success,	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,"	44
Spiritual Beauty,	45
The Book of Daniel,	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development, W. J. Potter,	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana, J. O. Martin,	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense, Isaac M. Wise,	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses, Thomas Vickers,	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,	49
Parties and Party Spirit,	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,	52
Transient and Permanent,	53

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No 22.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JUNE 3, 1871.

WHOLE No. 75.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE BATTLE FOR FREE EDUCATION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, May 14, 1871.]

"Every one here present must have become familiar in late years with the change of tone throughout Europe and America on the subject of Calvinism. After being accepted for two centuries in all Protestant countries as the final account of the relations between man and his Maker, it has come to be regarded by liberal thinkers as a system of belief incredible in itself, dishonoring to its object, and as intolerable as it has been itself intolerant."

JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE: Calvinism—An Address delivered at St. Andrews, p. 4.

"The precious Apis, for all its godhood, was led with a halter before the Persian King, and stabbed in the sight of the world by Persian steel. 'Profane!' exclaimed the priests, as pious persons, on like occasions, have exclaimed a thousand times; 'these Puritans have no reverence for holy things.' Rather is it because they do reverence things that deserve reverence that they loathe and abhor the counterfeit. What does an ascertained imposture deserve but to be denied, exposed, insulted, trampled under foot, danced upon, if nothing less will serve, till the very geese take courage, and venture to hiss derision?"

Ibid, p. 25.

One of these "ascertained impostures" or "phantasms" is the pretension that the Bible is the "Word of God." It is a book like all other books, containing many noble truths that are imperishable, and also containing many hurtful errors that are perishing before our very eyes. So far from being the "Word of God" in any special or peculiar sense, it is the word of man; and unless man's words are God's words, it is not the "Word of God" at all. Taken upon its intrinsic worth as a product of human minds and human hearts, I find in it much to venerate and much to love; but when thrust upon me by ignorant men who know nothing of its true origin or history, and held up before me with the command to fall down and worship it, I see that it needs "to be denied, exposed, insulted, trampled under foot." Nothing short of this vigorous treatment will convince the multitude that, like the frogs in the fable, they are stupidly worshipping a log as their king.

But, although the pretence that the Bible is an infallible divine book has become an "ascertained imposture" among all persons who are respectably informed on the subject, there is no lack of persons who vociferously insist, not only on the privilege of being imposed upon, but also on the privilege of imposing upon the rest of the world. They are clamorous for the right of forcing their own ignorance upon everybody else, as if it were the supreme wisdom. They demand that the Bible they worship shall have the place of honor everywhere, and that all the children of the nation shall be obliged to pay it homage. They demand that it shall be publicly recognized in this manner by the entire community as the fountain-head of divine truth, the source of good morals, and the safeguard of civilization. Freedom to think, to act, to worship as they please, is not enough; they insist that all mankind shall think, act, and worship in the same way, and to this end endeavor to drown the demand for an impartial administration of the school funds by exclamations of horror at the proposal to exclude the Bible from the public schools.

A semi-incoherent cry of this sort found expression a few days ago in the columns of one of our daily papers. A Presbyterian clergyman of this city printed a sermon on the subject, so feeble that it deserves no reply; nor would it receive one, were it not that the author has made himself the spokesman of the public reverence for an "ascertained imposture." The sermon does not contain enough argument even to be complimented as sophistical. Correct its misrepresentations and misstatements, and nothing is left of it. Its only importance consists in the fact that it represents a somewhat wide-spread public prejudice, and puts into words, perhaps as lucid as could be expected, the vague, crude objections in the popular mind to an act of simple justice. If the reasons for proposing the exclusion of the Bible from the schools were once understood, these objections would vanish; but the chaotic state of Mr. McCracken's mind makes him a fair exponent of the minds of the Bible-worshipping public. The result of the late municipal election, following the publication of a similar production by Mr. McCracken, may have flattered him into the belief that he was not only an exponent, but also a real leader of public opinion; and this belief may have tempted him to repeat the experiment at the still more recent election for school directors. But the issue of this election has undoubtedly undeceived him. Next spring it is likely that a delegation of fellow-believers will wait upon him with a particular request not to preach on the elections till after they have passed safely by. To the result of this last election, so contrary to his desire, he may be justly regarded as having contributed in no small degree; and in this fact may be perceived a deserved rebuke for an attempt at clerical dictation in political affairs.

Of course there was no impropriety in Mr. McCracken's stating, as publicly as he pleased, his opinions concerning public affairs. He had the same right to do this which every man has in a free country. But his way of doing it was such as to give just offence to all those whose opinions he was opposing, and to mortify all of his own party who esteem good manners. I propose this evening to comment upon a few of his statements, and then, since I find no arguments of any force in his sermon, to pass on to the main question.

The sermon opens with a comparison so arrogant and insulting that no one but an orthodox minister could be guilty of it. The text was as follows:—"But know this, that, if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up." In the use made of this text, the "house" is our common school system, the "good man" is the orthodox portion of the community, and the "thief" is the body of liberals in general. The orthodox believers are assumed to be the friends of the school system, and the liberals are assumed to be its enemies. Thus we find in the sermon the following courteous statement:—"In Cincinnati, the house-master was watching, and when the thief came and said—'Let me take your house. Let me break it all up, and make it over, and live in it myself,'—the good man of Cincinnati just took the thief and pitched him out of the window, first in the court of law, and second in the school election, and he is lying still where he was pitched out, in the gutter and in the mud." Mr. McCracken then inquires—"Is there no fool skulking near the house here?"—and proceeds to point out as such the persons who composed the Adams Street Park meeting last summer.

In other words Mr. McCracken's strongest argument consists in calling the liberals of this country "thieves" and "fools." Considering that no one who expects to be recognized as a gentleman ever stoops to such vulgar abuse as this, I should be inclined to say that these words were errors of the press, if there had not been abundant time and opportunity to correct them by a note of explanation. But nearly a week has elapsed, and no such correction has been made. I have no choice, therefore, but to regard these epithets as deliberately applied by Mr. McCracken to all those who desire to see the Bible excluded from the public schools. If he can afford to put himself outside the pale of decent society by employing the scurrilous language of rowdies and blackguards, he himself will be the loser, not the liberals. I shall certainly not imitate him.

In this comparison, however, of the orthodox to the house-master and the liberals to the thief that would rob him of his property, the overbearing temper of orthodoxy itself is made manifest. Do the liberals pay no school-taxes? Do they send no children to the schools? Have they any less right than the orthodox to a voice in their management? By what right do Bible-worshippers arrogate to themselves the proprietorship of institutions supported by money collected from all classes of the people, including Jews, Catholics, and liberals of every kind? Do they expect that the liberals will always consent to be stigmatized as "thieves," and deprived of all right to share the control of schools built and maintained in large measure by their money? If one partner in a business firm were to claim exclusive ownership of the firm's common property, and, in the insolent language of Mr. McCracken, were to "pitch" the other partner "out of the window" as a "thief," the police court would very soon convince him that, while this conduct might be strictly evangelical, it was none the less outrageous and illegal. In the enforced leisure of the common jail, he would learn that one partner in a firm has no right to appropriate what is not his. If the orthodox party should really undertake to act on Mr. McCracken's suggestion, and assume control of the common schools, the charge of "thievery" would lie, not against the liberals, but against themselves. If theft be the wrongful appropriation of other people's property, which party would be guilty of it, the liberals who claim only a fair share of power in the management of the public funds, or the orthodox who declare that the whole is theirs and proceed to "pitch out of the window" the liberals who deny this? Whatever may have been the case in Cincinnati, it is pretty plain from the school election just held here that the "pitching out of the window" has befallen the opposite party in Toledo. The liberals have, it seems, "watched the house" to some purpose.

But leaving to the courts the task of settling the question whether the public schools belong to the whole community, or, as Mr. McCracken claims, to the orthodox portion of it alone, I pass to the statement that "the professed demand of the liberals is not their real demand." This false statement is based on the supposed impossibility of maintaining schools without religious instruction of some sort, and the consequent certainty that the liberals would insist on teaching their own views of religion in them.

Now it is not surprising that one whose whole business it is to thrust his dogmas forward on every possible occasion should fail to understand the spirit and purpose of those who desire their children to be educated in positive knowledge alone. It is incredible to him that a liberal teacher should give a lesson in geography or arithmetic or chemistry, without slyly insinuating something or other about religion too. This is the orthodox practice; why must it not be the liberal practice also? This is the inference drawn by Mr. McCracken. He accordingly proceeds to show the absurdity of "Free Religion" by arguing that it makes every man a God to himself! I shall not now pause to correct his gross misrepresentations on this subject. There are two things it never pays to combat—dense ignorance and wilful blindness. Which of these two is the root of Mr. McCracken's travesty of Free Religion, is quite unimportant to determine; for the whole discussion is aside from the real issue. The liberals want education and nothing else in the public schools. It would be as improper for me to teach my views of religion there as for Mr. McCracken to teach his. The Catholics, the Protestants, the Jews, the Chinese when they get here, the Spiritualists, the Materialists, the believers and unbelievers of every name, nation, and shade of opinion, have equally a right to have their opinions respected in our common schools; and the whole object of the movement for the exclusion of the Bible from them has no other object, professed or suppressed, than that of securing a practical recognition of these equal rights. Teachers and pupils alike should have absolute freedom to enjoy their private beliefs unmolested. The only objection that a true liberal could have to Christian teachers is that most of them, like Mr. McCracken, are unable to keep their hands off the beliefs of other people. I would as soon vote for a Christian as a non-Christian teacher, if I were sure of their equally respecting the opinions of their pupils. The principle that liberals defend in this matter is that the common schools are built and supported for secular education alone, and that it is a perversion of school funds to permit their appropriation, directly or indirectly, to any other object. All the assertions of the sermon to the contrary notwithstanding, nothing is simpler or easier than to conduct the schools in strict accordance with this principle.

There is, however, some reason for the fear felt by the orthodox of a purely secular education. Science does most unmistakably contradict the teachings of the Bible and of Christianity. They know this, at least the wiser ones among them. But what will they do about it? The only way to protect the Bible as an infallible book is, not to have it read ten minutes a day in the schools, but to prevent all instruction that contradicts it. Suppress all instruction in history and geology and astronomy and the other sciences altogether, or there is no safety for the Bible. This is the clean issue—Education or Christianity, one or the other. In the long run it comes to that. Now the liberals say, "We must have education at all events," the Catholics say, "We must have Christianity at all events," the Protestants say, "We must have a little of both." But sooner or later the Protestants, who are now walking a tight rope, will come to the ground on one side or the other. They will be compelled to join the Catholics or the liberals—to give up Education altogether for the sake of Christianity, or to give up Christianity altogether for the sake of Education. It may be a long time before this issue is clearly seen; but it is the real one, and will grow clearer and clearer as the years go on. A dim presentiment rather than an intelligent comprehension of it is at the bottom of this controversy about the Bible in the schools. As a matter of fact, the Bible will eventually push all real education out of them, or be itself pushed out. The liberals of the country prefer the latter alternative; and if intelligence gets the victory, as it undoubtedly will in the end, the liberals will gain the day despite all opposition.

Having established to his own satisfaction that all schools must teach religion, Mr. McCracken declares that the State must decide what this religion shall be; and he comes to the conclusion that, Ohio being a Christian State, the religion taught in our schools must be Bible Christianity. In other words, Bible Christianity is the established State religion of Ohio. Taking no notice of the incidental misrepresentations of Free Religion, or the unscrupulous insinuations against those who are more or less identified with it before the public, I shall now take up the main question—have we an established religion? On the answer to this question depends the legality or the illegality of Bible-reading in the schools.

The claim that this is a Christian country is so often made that it passes unchallenged with multitudes of persons. I deny that the claim is true.

In the first place, it is not true that the majority of the American people are Christians, or can be called so by Mr. McCracken. The total number of Protestant church members in 1867, according to their own estimates, was 6,396,110. This includes fifty-one sects, many of which the Presbyterians would not for a moment consent to call Christians at all. The number of Catholics I do not know, though it can hardly equal that of the Protestants. But calling the two numbers equal, we should then have 12,792,220. In round numbers, thirteen millions include all whom Mr. McCracken could call by the Christian name. Now in the same year the total population of the country was 36,743,198. That is, four years ago, only about one-third of the American people were Christians by the Presbyterian test of Christianity.

Furthermore, the average annual increase of our population from 1840 to 1867 was 728,509. But the annual average increase of Protestant church membership during the same period was only 134,802. Allowing an equal increase to the Roman Catholics, the total annual increase in the entire Christian church was 268,604,—only a trifle over one-third of the annual increase of the population. If these rates continue unchanged, in the year 1900 there will be in this country over sixty millions of people, of whom less than twenty-two millions will belong to the Christian Church. So far as numbers go, therefore, no Presbyterian minister can honestly call this a Christian country.

But suppose we turn from the question of comparative statistics, at the best an uncertain mode of arguing on these matters, and inquire into the character of American institutions. Is ours a Christian government?

On this point every candid man, I care not what his theology may be, must answer emphatically no. There is and can be no established religion, Christian or otherwise, in the United States. The very first amendment to the United States Constitution expressly declares:—"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Furthermore in a treaty with Tripoli, concluded by the administration of George Washington, Nov. 4, 1796, it is again expressly declared:—"The government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian Religion." In the face of these clear and unmistakable declarations, it is impossible to maintain that the United States government is in any sense a Christian one.

Perhaps, however, Ohio is a Christian State. How is that?

It is true that in a few of the States, as Pennsylvania and New York, Christianity has been declared part of the common law. But the contrary is true in the State of Ohio. The seventh section of the Bill of Rights in the new Constitution of Ohio provides:—"No person shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or maintain any form of worship, against his consent; and no preference shall be given, by law, to any religious society; nor shall any interference with the rights of conscience be permitted." Moreover, in the famous case of Bloom vs. Richards, Judge Thurman, of the Ohio Supreme Court, ruled as follows:—"Christianity is a part of the common law of England, but under the provisions of our Constitution neither Christianity nor any other system of religion is a part of the law of this State." Two years later, in the case of McGatrick vs. Wasson, the same Court substantially re-affirmed this principle as follows:—"The principles upon which our [Sunday] statute rests are wholly secular, and they are none the less so because they may happen to concur with the dictates of religion. . . . Unless, then, we keep constantly in mind that the act rests upon public policy alone, we shall be in great danger of giving it a wrong construction; and instead of reading it in the light of the Constitution, which prohibits all religious tests and preferences, find ourselves led away from its meaning, by the influence of our own peculiar theological tenets."

From these extracts nothing can be clearer than that the State of Ohio supports no church, establishes no form of religion, and has no "religious character." It is no more Christian than Pagan. When, therefore, Mr. McCracken says—"It is true of Ohio, as Judge Duncan of Pennsylvania decided for that great State, that 'Christianity is a part of the common law of the land,'"—he betrays the most complete ignorance on the subject. If his word is to be taken as law, we must conclude that the Supreme Court of Ohio will henceforth hold its sessions in the First Presbyterian Church of Toledo, and that all the other judges have resigned in favor of Mr. McCracken.

But though admitting that the State of Ohio is not a Christian State, and cannot favor the Christian religion any more than any other, it may be said that Boards of Education have no authority to prohibit Bible-reading in the schools, or to interfere in the matter at all. In fact, I find Mr. McCracken advancing the following astounding view:—"The law at present forbids a School Board to prevent any teacher from reading the Bible, praying, and singing hymns. Whether this decision shall stand is a question now before the Supreme Court on an appeal from Cincinnati."

Is it possible that Mr. McCracken can be ignorant that the decision he refers to was made by the Superior Court of Cincinnati, a municipal and not a State Court? It seems so. That decision has no more binding force in Toledo than it has in Shanghai. There is no such law whatever as Mr. McCracken alleges, so far as I can discover. The Board of Education has full and perfect power to prohibit Bible-reading in the schools; and no statute can be cited forbidding them to do so. Otherwise there would have been no occasion to apply for a special injunction in the Cincinnati case.

So far from merely endeavoring to prove that the Board of Education have a right to prohibit Bible-reading in the schools, I take much more radical ground, and maintain that they have no right to permit it. Bible-reading in the schools is an act of religious worship; it is moreover an act of Protestant worship, since the Catholics as such conscientiously object to it; and it is therefore an act of sectarian worship, since in the eye of the law Protestants, as opposed to Catholics, are nothing but a sect or class of the population. Bible-reading in the schools, consequently, can be and is neither more nor less than a usurpation of power by one sect over another—a perversion of the school funds to the support of sectarian worship. The school-taxes are not voluntary, but enforced on all classes of the people; and if they are thus perverted, or allowed by the Board of Education to be thus perverted, to the support of sectarian worship, then I maintain that the rights of the Catholics, Jews, and all other non-Protestant parties in the community, are trampled under foot. In other words, Bible-reading in the schools is an outrage against justice and equal rights, which the Board of Education ought not to tolerate for a day, but ought to suppress at once without any petition or any statute conferring special powers for that purpose.

That this is the ground for liberals to take,—that they ought to demand the IMMEDIATE ABOLITION of such Bible-reading as a violation of existing law, as an illegal and unjust encroachment of a part of the community on the equal rights of another part,—seems to me so clear as to be almost self-evident. The second section of the sixth article of the Ohio State Constitution is as follows: "The General Assembly shall make such provision, by taxation or otherwise, as, with the income arising from the school trust fund, will secure a thorough and efficient system of common schools throughout the State; but no religious or other sects shall ever have any exclusive right to, or control of, any part of the school funds of this State." This section plainly forbids the control over the school funds now exerted by Protestant Boards of Education, in maintaining Protestant and therefore sectarian worship in our common schools. The permission of Bible-reading as a common school religious exercise, is thus plainly a VIOLATION OF THE OHIO CONSTITUTION.

Again, the seventh section of the Bill of Rights, which I have already quoted, declares that "no person shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, against his consent." In virtue of this law, any Catholic, Jew, so-called "infidel," or any other person, might justly refuse to pay his school-tax, on the ground that by the practice of Bible-reading, the schools are made "places of worship," and that he is therefore legally freed from all obligation to pay such tax.

In every point of view, the permission of Bible-reading, not its prohibition, is the violation of law; and I for one hereby enter an earnest, serious, and emphatic protest against the longer continuance of this illegal and unjust permission. Bible-reading in the schools is a manifest transgression of that equality of religious rights which is one of the most noble features of our government; and as such it ought to cease, to cease at once, and to cease forever.

To some persons this whole question of Bible-reading in the schools seems of trivial importance. They do not perceive that the danger now threatening our school-system from this very cause is great and real. A feeling of soreness and disaffection exists among the Catholics on this subject sufficiently strong to make them support expensive schools of their own, in addition to the school-taxes they are obliged to pay. You may call this feeling unreasonable, if you please; I think it otherwise. But it exists, and is spreading. The only way to meet it and remove all just cause for it, is to make our schools no more Protestant than Catholic, but absolutely impartial and free. While many Catholics would be still discontented, since they themselves want control of the schools, many others, the liberal portion of the Catholic body, would be contented, seeing that they had fair play. During the late school election a discussion arose on the street about this Bible-in-schools question. One gentleman argued that the Bible should be taken out of the schools in order that Catholics, Jews, and all, might have and enjoy equal privileges. On hearing this, an Irishman stepped up, and asked eagerly, "Have ye got any tickets?" "Yes; how many do you want?" The Irishman turned round to count his companions. "One, two, three, four, five, six, seven. Give me seven!" And off they went together to vote the radical ticket.

This illustrates the influence that simple justice has on the minds of men. The Bible question is simply a question of justice—that is all. The Irishmen knew what fair play meant; and that satisfied them. If we allow this grievance to remain rankling and festering in the minds of our whole Catholic population, and thus alienate them more and more from our free school system; if we give them a plausible pretext for demanding a division of our school funds, because we insist on making our public schools Protestant in character,—we shall sow the seeds of a terrible struggle by-and-by on this question of free education. It is every way better to meet it now. Take out the Bible from the schools; make them free to all, with favors to none; and then we can make common cause with all who are content with equal rights and impartial justice. Whoever wants more than this,—whoever insists on having the control of the public schools, or, failing in this, demands a division of the school funds, must be sternly opposed as an enemy to republican institutions and the welfare of the commonwealth. But we cannot fight these ruinous claims, unless we carry out faithfully our own professions of impartiality, and abolish Bible-reading in our schools. Once do this, and we shall have nothing to fear. "Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just."

I will close with an extract from the Chicago Advance, a Congregationalist paper, which advocates the exclusion of the Bible from the schools, and thus rebukes the folly of all who oppose this just reform:—

"In India, as in Great Britain and America, there is much discussion over the relation of the public school system to religion. As Hinduism is the religious faith of nineteen-twentieths of the people, a proposition has been made in certain quarters to have selections from the Shasters—the sacred books, or Bible, of the Hindus—read in all the government schools. This is claimed as the right of the people, whose wish should not be set aside to gratify a very small Christian fraction, and as the right of conscience, moreover, of the native population, which should not be overruled by those who have within a generation or two introduced Christianity from abroad. We are a little curious to know how this claim will be met by those who believe that a Protestant majority has a right to vote the Bible into American public schools against the remembrance of a Romish or a Rationalist (tax-paying minority, under a Constitution which knows no religious distinctions. A consistent logic would seem to require that they should advise their few Christian brethren in India to agree to the proposed Shaster-reading in the government schools of that country. It will hardly do to deny, as a civil right, to the majority advocates of one Bible, what is claimed for the majority advocates of another Bible. Justice cannot change, however many oceans it may cross."

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

SHALL THE BIBLE BE EXCLUDED?—THE QUESTION DISCUSSED BY A PRESBYTERIAN PASTOR.

[From the Toledo Blade of May 8.]

Last evening Rev. H. M. McCracken, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, preached a carefully written discourse upon the question of excluding the Bible from the Public Schools, as set forth in the petition at the meeting of citizens in the Adams Street Grove last Summer. He selected as his text:—

MATT. 24:43.—"But know this,—that if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up."

The good man did not know, he did not watch; his house was broken up, and he was deeply guilty therefore.

We mustn't be misled by the sound of the phrase "the good man of the house," nor have our minds taken thereby from his culpability. The Greek word is simply "house master." He wasn't a good man—not so much, however, for not knowing as for not watching.

The house, of which I am to speak this evening, is our City and State, or more particularly our City and State Common School. The good man of the house is every citizen that has the care of it. The thief is the man that comes in and desires to break it all up. In what watch or what year he will come in Toledo, I do not know; but when it does happen, it is likely to be at the school election. The nearness of this upon next Tuesday, for at least a portion of the city, suggests to me to speak of this "House" of ours, and of the call there is to watch. I know that it was a grander breaking up than the School System which Christ meant when he spoke that parable, but it also includes fairly every minor catastrophe that threatens us. The lesson enforced by the parable bears equally upon all of them. It is to watch.

In New York city, the House master was not watching, and the thieves have taken possession of his house. They have a large part at least of the Common School Money and Common School System, and are giving it a direction which the proprietors profoundly deplore.

In Cincinnati, the House master was watching; and when the thief came, and said,—"Let me take your house. Let me break it all up and make it over and live in it myself," the good man of Cincinnati just took the thief and pitched him out of the window, first in the court of law, and second in the school election, and he is lying still where he was pitched out, in the gutter and in the mud.

Is there no fool skulking near the House here? If there is not, you would not be to blame for not watching. Rather I would be to blame for sounding the faintest echo of alarm. But that there are those in Toledo who wait carefully to break up the common school, as at present administered, is known to you all. We will be blind, if we shut our eyes to the dangers that have appeared the past year.

Let me call to your mind the demands that were made in the grove meeting at the end of the Adams Street Railway, on a certain Sabbath which you recollect. The first speaker, a gentleman who is known as the leader of free religion among us, stated as his beau-ideal of a school one "from which religion is entirely excluded." This he declared was what would satisfy "liberals."

The next speaker, a citizen then holding a prominent position, "objected to having a religious book in the schools." He "would not have a superintendent that would teach the children that the infidels are not as good as anybody else."

The third orator, or rather oratrix, "urged in the main the theories advanced by the preceding speakers."

Two gentlemen of foreign birth followed, the former of whom would "exclude the Bible from the schools, as the 'source of controversy';" the latter as a book "than which no book in the world was less fit to be a school book."

These demands were afterwards put in the shape of a petition, of which the drift may be gathered from a sentence or two which I quote:—

"We petition the Board of Education to discontinue the reading of the Bible, singing of hymns, offering of prayer, and all other exercises of a religious character from the public schools of our city."

"Because it is a plain violation of a fundamental principle of republican government to permit public religious worship or instruction in any national, State or municipal institution."

The demand, then, is plain that the common school be emptied of religion, that the State instruction have no religious character, that it be perfectly neutral between Christianity and Romanism, or Christianity and Infidelity.

1. The first proposition I offer is that their professed demand is not their real demand. A school (devoid of religious instruction) is an impossibility. To demand this is to demand something beyond, or else is to demand an absurdity.

Far as modern discovery has progressed, it has found no way of running a school by mechanism. It must be done by a human being, and human beings, however they may angrily or complacently deny it, have every one of them a religion. They are either true religionists, receiving God in Christ; false religionists, with God in Mohammed, Buddha, Joe Smith; or free religionists, with every man his own God, and the God of as many others besides as he can get to believe in him. The common consent of mankind divides and always will divide the entire race into religious classes, and leave not a single person out.

The definition I have rendered of "Free Religion" is gathered from its own organ, published in this city. While professing abhorrence to creeds, it has published recently a creed (which it calls a synopsis) with two and thirty articles, beating the Episcopalians only eight, and the Presbyterian Confession only one, in the number of its chapters. The name of God does not occur in them, save in reference to the Deity of Christianity. Free Religion is "Organized Faith in Man." It holds that "the human race ought to be a religious unit, based on faith in human nature;" that we ought to delight in Universal Nature and add to other emotions the deeper reverence of worship. It goes on to say that "the Unity of the Universe is repeated in the Unity of a single person." If all this means anything, it means that both faith and worship are to be concentrated, every man's upon himself. Free Religion has a God, then, every man his own God, to be believed in and worshipped.

Not only has every man a religion, but he cannot possibly associate with others, and not breathe it into them.

I don't believe there is one in a thousand that could thus exert nothing save pure intellectual power, apart from morals or religion. It would be more easily done by a book. Yet apart from pure mathematics and grammar, and perhaps a spelling-book, every school book that ever I saw, even my Webster's Dictionary, taught both morals and religion.

The only way, then, to empty the common school of Christian instruction is to empty it of Christian teachers.

Suppose that the demand to empty the Toledo schools of Christianity, and of a Superintendent that teaches either by word or action that "infidels are not as good as anybody else," is accorded, what then?

I'll tell you what will happen to this House of ours. There will come along this spirit that calls itself the spirit of Free Religion, "and when he is come to the House, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished." Then "goeth he and taking with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there." There is Spiritualism in one room; Darwinism in another; Communism, Comtism, Materialism, Sensualism and Blank Atheism in others; they enter into the common schools and dwell there, and the latter state of that house, I need not tell you, is worse than the first.

There are more sects to this religion that says—"Every man his own God," than to any other, but they work kindly together, and they all come under one general denomination. They all cry for "secularization." "No dogma!" Suppose I were to give a weekly lesson in the High School on the "doctrines of grace," as expressed in the shorter catechism. They would raise the cry of "bigotry!" the yell of "Union of Church and State!" But put Darwinism in a school book, denying man's Creator; that is no dogma; that is "secular science." Put Pantheism in a reader, Emerson's poetry for example, supposing it readable; that is no dogma; that is "literature." Let the school history say that Christianity was established according to Gibbon; that is philosophy.

You see what a falsehood is this plea of neutrality! What a sham is this so-called perfect secularity! They make this their proposed demand, but their real demand is to dogmatize for their own religion. They deceive themselves, I believe, with their own words. Daniel Webster, in his argument on the Girard will case, said,—"It is all idle, it is mockery and insult to common sense to maintain that a school for the instruction of youth from which Christian instruction by Christian teachers is sedulously shut out, is not deistical and infidel in its purpose and its tendency." Those who want Christianity out, want Free Religion in, and they force the question on us.

2. Here comes a second proposition. The community or the State, which is an aggregation of communities, must decide the religious direction or bias of its own teaching.

From the axioms already laid down, it follows that every State, made up of individuals, must possess a religious character. This is a very different thing from a State undertaking to establish and support a church. Many persons believing (as I also do most firmly) that the State should let the Church alone, think that this implies that the State can not and should not have religious character. It does not imply this at all. The church has a well known object, to convert men to love God and yield to Christ and attain to eternal life. The State has nothing to do with eternal life, and must let the church entirely alone. But the State has to do with temporal life, and it is as impossible, as it is inexpedient, to deal with men as to their temporal welfare and not give this work of the State a religious character.

False religionists in Turkey give the legislative, judicial, and executive action of Turkey a Mohammedan character. The Koran is a part of the common law of the land. Free religionists in Paris just now give free religious coloring to their actions. "Every man his own God," is the common law of that city. Christian religionists in Ohio have from the very beginning entamped a Christian character upon the government of our State.

It is true of Ohio, as Judge Duncan of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania decided for that great State, that "Christianity is a part of the common law of the land."

The Lunatic Asylum and other State institutions have Christian work [worship?] every week. The deaf and dumb pupils to the number of several hundred are taught the Christian faith. A question proposed to a little deaf and dumb boy was "Who made you?" None will say it is not a good question. The little fellow takes the chalk and writes upon the black-board,—"God created man in His own image." But if we "secularize" this asylum, that is, introduce the faith of free religion, the scholar must answer in the language of the thirty-two articles,—"The origin of the human race is one, in virtue of a common descent from inferior types of being." Man, as Darwin says, was made of a monkey, "pointed-eared, arboreal and hairy," in his own image; but by "natural selection" (which means judicious marrying) he has grown out of it.

3. Right here on the word conscience, the objector makes a point. "It is a violation of the rights of conscience to give any religious character to the public teaching."

Evidently the makers of our Constitution did not think so, else they wouldn't have put rights of conscience and religion in the same sentence. They thought that they could cherish both religion and rights of conscience. On what principle? On this, that the welfare of the State and the highest freedom of its subjects being the chief end, when the individual conscience or rights of a minority come in conflict therewith, they must give way. Upon what other ground does the State disregard the Quaker conscience, and make him pay war taxes?

But there is another aspect of the conscience question. If the teaching of Christianity goes out, the doctrine of the false God, or "every man his own God," comes in. What then about the rights of conscience? We have in this State of Ohio over 20,000 teachers, nearly a million scholars, and over three millions annual outlay, of which it is estimated that over three-fourths is paid by the supporters of Bible Christianity. Now the point is, what class of consciences shall rule in this matter? If Christian teaching goes out, some other teaching must come in, and then my conscience will be violated.

4. This brings me to—to what extent may a religious character be given the school instruction? In answer I offer this fourth proposition:—

The degree of religious characterization to be given public instruction in any community is for the people to decide, subject—first, to State law; second, to their own views of expediency.

The law at present forbids a School Board to prevent any teacher from reading the Bible, praying, and singing hymns. Whether this decision shall stand, is a question now before the Supreme Court, on an appeal from Cincinnati. Even if it fails, it does not follow that the Board can listen to the demand of the Adams street petitioners, or forbid every kind of religious teaching.

The question remains, how far can the Christian majority of a city or a Board proceed in giving a Christian character to the public teaching?

Not so far, answers the State, as to interfere with rights of conscience. They must be regarded to the utmost degree possible.

In Toledo, our watchword will be, our common school as it is. More are gathered into this House of ours in proportion to the enrollment than in any other of the five large cities of the State. Over six thousand children were in its walls the last year with nearly one hundred teachers. This House of ours is worth watching.

I rely upon the people to say "Hands off." I rely upon you to watch whom you put in charge of the House as members of the Board, and that they are in accord with the sentiment of the State of Ohio.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I take this opportunity to thank you for your endeavor to publish and sustain a journal of 'Free Thought'—a journal that shall be a medium through which the pretensions of all religions (so called) shall be philosophically and severely, yet courteously, examined. To sustain you in the position you have taken you will require what Mr. Collyer calls 'true grit.' Time alone will determine whether you are fortified with sufficient 'grit' to suffer the apathy of friends, and the fierce opposition of enemies; for enemies you will necessarily make, however courteously or fairly you may state your position on questions such as you will be constantly obliged to discuss. If the friends of free thought can once be organized, they will undoubtedly be a power in the land; and the best means for preparing the basis for organization seems to me to be through such journals as THE INDEX."

—"I enclose two dollars as my subscription for the next year's INDEX, and with it I send my best wishes for a 'Happy New Year' to it and yourself. Indeed I consider the one almost synonymous with the other. I most heartily congratulate you on the established success of your experiment. I think it must have far exceeded your most sanguine expectations. I am surprised and delighted to know that the sentiments which have called forth such full and ready responses as have appeared in your paper are so widespread. It really does seem to indicate a speedy breaking up of the old, crystallized superstition which has so long held human reason in abeyance. I am sure you are entitled to the gratification of feeling that you have afforded relief and comfort to many minds and hearts."

—"Through the kindness of a friend, I first became a reader of THE INDEX. I like the broad foundation upon which it rests, also the tone and spirit of its teachings. But planting itself outside the Bible and Christianity seemed really too radical. Yet (true to my motto 'prove all things') I have read the paper carefully, and with increasing interest, and find its teachings in harmony with my highest convictions of truth. Much which I had deemed cruel and unjust, in the old theology, had long since dropped out of my creed, and leaving in their stead a broader sympathy for humanity, and an unshaken faith in nature, and nature's God. THE INDEX has a mission. May its success be grand and glorious."

—"I am but seventeen years old, but, in the depths of orthodox Connecticut, have always been a Rationalist, since I have been able to think for myself. I am with THE INDEX heart and soul, and wish it success in its fight against the blasphemous dogmas that have fooled the world so long. The work of demolition is the work of organization too, and I think the signs of the times grow more and more encouraging in every way. From the only sermon I have heard from Mr. Frothingham, in Lyric Hall, I consider him the foremost man of the times."

—"I herein renew my subscription to your noble little sheet. My California brother wrote me in reply on receiving the copies you sent him—'So far as I have had time to examine, I am well pleased with the tone and complexion of the paper, and will take some little pains to bring it into notice here.' Alluding to the above copies, 'I think I shall take pleasure in reading them, and perhaps will subscribe.' I hope he has done so, and also influenced others as he promised."

—"I am rejoiced to have a bound volume of THE INDEX. It is a valuable addition to our library. I have been all my life collecting historical works, and THE INDEX is the exponent of the great religious revolution now in progress, and to which so many people are blind. I like the getting up of the first volume of THE INDEX very much."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RECEIVED.

COMFORT AND INSPIRATION. A Sermon by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, March 19, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 23.

HOME AND HEALTH. A Monthly Magazine devoted to Health and the Home Circle. W. R. DE PUX & BROTHER, Publishers, 805 Broadway, New York. May, 1871. $1.50 a Year.

PETERS' MUSICAL MONTHLY. June, 1871. J. L. PETERS, Publisher, 529 Broadway, New York. Price $3.00 a Year.

"ADVERTISE YOUR BUSINESS." Catalogue of Wm. J. Carlton's Lists of Advertising Mediums. Wm. J. CARLTON, Advertising Agent, 39 Park Row, New York.

Poetry.

RETROSPECT:

PROLOGUE TO A COLLEGE POEM.

When, clambering up some mountain high
Whose summit seems to pierce the sky,
Wearied and faint with toilsome pains,
Its loftiest peak the pilgrim gains,
Eager he scans the landscape o'er,
In loveliness spread out before;
And, kindling at the glorious sight,
His spirit drinks untold delight.
But, satisfied at length, he fain
Would trace the narrow path again,
Which led him from the fields below
Up to the mountain's lofty brow;
And as its mazy course he sees,
Now partly hidden by the trees,
Now winding through some secret glen,
And now o'er barren rocks again,
Absorbed in calm and pleasing thought,
Its roughness he remembers not,
But faithful calls to mind once more
Each beauty he had viewed before.

Thus would I cast a lingering glance behind,
As on the mountain's top we pause awhile,
And trace again the devious steps that wind
Through wood and dale for many a weary mile;
To paint a few fair scenes my muse would try,
But, as she backward casts her thoughtful eye,
The rough, unlovely wastes shall all forgotten lie.

1857.

ASTERISK.

The Index.

JUNE 3, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for Single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the Subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [Three Lectures.] 8. Lying Pretences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom, and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
For the INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO, O., April, 1871.

The "Waterloo [N. Y.] Yearly Meeting of the Friends of Human Progress" will be held on June 9th, 10th, and 11th. William J. Potter, Charles L. Remond, Anna M. Middlebrook, Elizabeth M. Powell, and George W. Taylor, will be among the speakers.

The "Nineteenth Yearly Meeting of Progressive Friends" will be held at Longwood, Pa., on June 8th, 9th, and 10th. Among the speakers will be Wm. L. Garrison, John W. Chadwick, and Celia Burleigh.

We regret that we cannot accept the courteous invitations to attend these meetings, being obliged to forego even the Annual Convention of the Free Religious Association, the first we have missed. But this is fortunately our own loss alone.

In answer to inquiries we would say that three hundred copies of THE INDEX are laid aside every week in our office, for binding at the end of the year.

THE LEAVEN WORKING.

In THE INDEX No. 31 is contained an account of a public meeting held in this city last July, the purpose of which was to protest against Bible-reading, and so forth, in the public schools. A petition to the Board of Education, requesting the passage of regulations which should put an end to this practice, was subsequently adopted by the persons who were chiefly interested in this meeting; but from various causes it was finally decided to take no further steps in this direction for the time being. But the seed thus sown has already borne fruit. Public attention was awakened to the subject; and at the late school election on May 9, the Young Men's Christian Association and their sympathizers made open and strenuous efforts to elect new members to the Board of Education pledged to retain the Bible in the schools. As stated a fortnight ago, the result of the election (which, we are informed, called out by far the largest number of votes ever cast at a school election in this city) was a decided victory for the liberal cause.

On the Sunday before this election a sermon was preached by a Presbyterian clergyman of the place, which will be found on our third page. We are sorry that the narrowness of our space obliges us to put it in smaller type than the reply which precedes, both reprinted from the Toledo Blade; but we make what amends we can by "leading" as much of it as possible, and trust that our readers will peruse it before beginning our lecture. By this course they will be enabled at once to correct any injustice into which we may have unintentionally fallen. Our strictures will be seen to be severe; but if they are undeserved, the reader will perceive the fact, and form an independent judgment of his own. So far as possible, we always wish in such cases to place all the data for a just judgment side by side.

The petition above referred to, and partially quoted in the sermon, is here appended in full, although already printed in THE INDEX No. 33:—

PETITION.

To the Board of Education of the City of Toledo:—

We, the undersigned, inhabitants of Toledo, respectfully petition the Board of Education to pass regulations discontinuing the reading of the Bible, singing of hymns, offering of prayer, and all other exercises of a religious character, in the public schools of this city.

For this request we would assign the following reason:—

1. Because universal education is the only guarantee of universal freedom; and the preservation and improvement of our common school system is the only means of ensuring universal education.

2. Because the preservation of our common school system requires the removal of every just cause of disaffection towards it.

3. Because the public schools are supported by taxes levied upon the entire community, no exemption being made on account of any religious opinions; and it is manifestly unjust that money thus raised should be used, directly or indirectly, to propagate the sectarian opinions of a part of the community.

4. Because the public schools are not a fit place for religious worship or instruction. The school funds are raised avowedly for educational purposes alone, and it is manifestly improper that they should be diverted to religious purposes.

5. Because the utter separation of Church and State is a fundamental principle of republican government; and it is a plain violation of this principle to permit public religious worship or instruction in any national, state, or municipal institution.

6. Because the reading of the Bible without note or comment is a peculiarity of Protestant Christian worship; and, when practised in the public schools, it makes them Protestant Christian schools to that extent.

7. Because the Protestant Christian character thus given to the public schools is as truly a just cause of grievance to all who are not Protestant Christians, as the Catholic Christian character which would be given to them by the daily practice of saying mass would be a just cause of grievance to all who are not Catholic Christians.

8. Because the present Protestant character of our public schools affords a plausible pretext for the dangerous demand of the Catholics for a division of the school funds; and the only way to avoid the obligation of complying with this demand is to make the schools neither Protestant nor Catholic, but purely secular.

9. Because it is essential to the very existence of our common school system, that it should scrupulously respect the equal rights of all classes of the community, and should cease to manifest the partiality which it now does manifest to Protestant Christians.

P. S. Since the sermon on our third page and the above were put in type, Mr. McCracken has reprinted the former in full in the Toledo Blade, correcting typographical errors. We are glad to say that the word "fool" should have been "foe," and that the reason for its being left uncorrected was the author's absence from the city during the succeeding week. This fact should somewhat modify what we have said, though the comparison of the liberals to the "thief," which was the chief reason for criticism, still remains.

By an oversight we much regret the list of articles in the June Radical was omitted from our last week's paper. This is an admirable number of a magazine that grows better as it grows older, and deserves the support of every thoughtful liberal in the land. We say thoughtful liberal—for the unreflecting liberals (there are too many of this class) will take little interest in such a masterpiece of strong, masculine thought as Mr. Potter's lecture. Yet every one interested in the bearings of science on the belief in immortality should read it; and there are many such, we know, among our subscribers. Mr. Chadwick's chat about his Pagan friends is delightful. Col. Higginson gives a fine selection of passages from Buddha's "Path of Virtue," interspersed with appreciative comments; and as we have been reading this book in course for several weeks at our Sunday meetings (a better Bible we cannot find), we cannot forbear quoting his closing paragraph, every word of which we echo:—

"If we had been brought up to hear these eloquent passages read at family prayers by our parents, had learned them by heart for our Sunday School lesson, had heard them recited in liturgies, intoned in chants, would they touch us more or less than when they come to us thus freshly, just brought from an unknown language and a far-off land? It would depend very much on our temperament. Some are more impressed by that which is old; others by that which is new. But, old or new, beauty is beauty, the sublime is the sublime. 'What finds me,' said Coleridge, 'at a greater depth than usual, that for me is inspired.' I do not envy that man who does not find the depth of his soul stirred by a book like this."

But here is the list:—

THE RADICAL: CONTENTS FOR JUNE.—Immortality in the Light of Science. W. J. Potter. Four White Lilies: Anna C. Brackett. Natural Selection in regard to Man: J. Stahl Patterson. My Pagan Friends: J. Chadwick. The Buddhist "Path of Virtue": T. W. Higginson. Seven Years: C. A. Barber. The Radical Club. Song of the Spirits that lull Faust to sleep. Notes: Editor.

The Toledo Democrat, of May 20, has the following paragraph in an editorial article:—

"The evil effects of sectarian intermeddling with the school management to secure the teaching of their peculiar speculative notions of theology and religion—from purely selfish motives—is becoming so great that immediate action on the part of the friends of the cause of universal education must be had or the whole system will crumble and decay. That such an exhibition of ill-natured bigotry and intolerance as Mr. McCracken's sermon—published in the Blade—should receive the sanction of a respectable minority of even his own congregation, is cause for painful foreboding. No one can object to the teaching of the exact sciences in our school, but a minority cannot be found in any county of the State that will favor the teaching of any one of the many speculative theories. All that the schools are designed for, is to fit the pupil for research. They are not academies to aid discovery, nor are they to assist in establishing either side of any disputed question. They have an ample field for usefulness in imparting a knowledge of mathematics, and the known laws of language, natural philosophy and chemistry."

SOUTHERN RECONSTRUCTION.

Among the reports of Ku-Klux outrages and of the generally unsatisfactory condition of Southern society, it is pleasant to hear of some points where attempts are being made at the problem of reconstruction with assured promise of success. Such an attempt is that near Fortress Monroe, under the management of Gen. S. C. Armstrong, where a "Normal and Agricultural Institute" has been established for the instruction of young men and women of the colored race. The special feature of this Institute is that it is an Industrial as well as Literary School. There is a farm of one hundred and twenty-five acres, which is wholly cultivated by the labor of the male students. And the young women are instructed in every kind of domestic industry. A clothing establishment for the manufacture of men's and women's garments is also connected with the Institute. The design is to prepare the students not only to become teachers of schools but to be instructors of their race, wherever they may settle, in the arts of civilized life and in habits of good citizenship. The course of instruction does not ape a college curriculum, but is adapted to the needs of practical life.

And whatever question there may be as to the success of institutions elsewhere that have attempted to combine physical and mental labor, the three years' experiment there at Hampton has certainly resulted as advantageously as its friends expected. One excellent result is that it helps counteract the idea, which very many of the negroes naturally have, that physical labor, owing to its having been a badge of slavery, is degrading and still a mark of servility. Those who go out from the Institute are eagerly sought and are put at once into places of trust and influence. Thus far, indeed, it has been found difficult for the schools to keep them as teachers; for, on account of their superior knowledge of affairs, they are very apt to be elected to public office,—are made town commissioners, or sent to the Legislature, perhaps. And so they everywhere become efficient helpers in the work of civil and social reconstruction.

Gen. Armstrong, who conceived the idea of the Institute when acting as agent of the Freedmen's Bureau at Hampton, and who is still its inspiring genius, is the son of an American Missionary at the Sandwich Islands. To his father, perhaps, more than to any other is due the system of schools which have marked the missionary operations at the Sandwich Islands with exceptional success. And the son evidently has the same idea,—that education must be the basis of all real social and religious progress. Though he is connected with the "Evangelical" denominations, he does not appear to lay very much stress upon the "Evangelical" dogmas; and though his Institute is (or has been) nominally under the auspices of the American Missionary Association, he designs that it shall be unsectarian in its instruction. When the General was asked about the religious teaching of the Institute (and this was in a mixed company of Orthodox and Liberal persons), he replied: "We don't think it needful to say anything about doctrines; the colored people are thoroughly posted on them already; hell-fire is their special delight and the staple of their religious talk; the 'revival' is chronic among them,—it is the easiest thing in the world to start one; but I shouldn't think my hen-roost any safer during a 'revival' than any other time; they don't generally connect religion with morality. Therefore the special aim of our religious teaching is to show that the religion which is worth anything must appear in good character and life."

We find little to complain of in that sort of "Evangelical" teaching. We wish the South, aye, the North too, were full of it. But how many earnest workers like Gen. Armstrong, and how many years of such work it must take, to eradicate the false views of religion which prevail not alone among the colored people, but which they through many generations have been trustfully imbibing from their "Christian" masters! Religion needs to be reconstructed in the South, among the whites as well as among the blacks, before we shall have a solid social and civil reconstruction; and Gen. Armstrong, at the Hampton Institute, has begun at the right end by teaching that religion, to be worth anything, must show itself in practical virtue.

W. J. P.

CAN SCIENCE FIND GOD?

Mr. Abbot, in his Horticultural Hall address in Boston, says that "Science alone must give the final reply to our anxious and earnest questions" about God and immortality; and adds, that he is "convinced that the final answer of science will but deepen, fortify, and exalt our human faith in God as intelligent, self-conscious Being," and that he "trusts that it will strengthen, purify and elevate our human hope of immortality as continued individual existence." This is certainly a cheerful prophecy to one who believes and wants to believe the "great verities." It would have been more satisfactory, however, if he had told us upon what grounds he rests his prophecy. Certainly he does not argue from the signs of the times, for according to him—"the progress of physical science has called the faith of mankind in God and Immortality into grave and most painful doubt;" while the intuitive school which merely asserts God "begs the question" and "takes for granted the very truth to be discovered." The question which naturally suggests itself is, what reason has Mr. Abbot for his lively hope of the good time coming? and also, since he believes in God as "intelligent self-conscious Being," how is it that his science, or scientific method, which he believes in applying, has reached that truth? If Mr. Abbot believes that science must give the final reply, what science, we would ask, gives his present reply, that God is and is self-conscious?

I can understand how science can give us a "knowledge of phenomena,—their resemblances, co-existences and successions;" how science can give the order and laws of God; but how science can give God, I cannot conceive. Can you see him at the end of the telescope or at the bottom of the microscope? Can you extract from your retort a few grains or specks of spirit, or catch a little bit of the hidden life of God between your pincers?

If you could, you would call it carbonate of lime, protoplasm, or some other matter "of the earth, earthy." It seems to me that the scientific method of investigation has never reached and never can reach God, and that the final reply of science will be—"law I know, but as to God I know him not."

Mr. Abbot says he believes that "science will but deepen, fortify and exalt our faith in God as intelligent, self-conscious Being." How does science give "faith?" Faith in God may come with science, but, strictly speaking, does it come from science? I think that science gives neither the idea of God nor the feeling of faith in God. But we have this idea, and so do almost all of our scientific men, if we may judge from their language. They speak of the "Creator," the "Great First Cause," the "Infinite," the "Absolute," "God," "Deity," "Infinite Being," and use other expressions which betray a belief in a Supreme Power, an "unseen Pilot," as Emerson calls him. How do they get this idea? Just as the meanest child of God gets it—by intuition. It comes—that is all we can say; comes without science and with science, but not from science. That is my belief, so that, according to Mr. Abbot, I suppose I am one of the aristocratic intuitionists. I cannot help it; I have the idea of God; I cannot see how science can give it; something does give it, for I have it; that something I call intuition, for the want of a better name. Mr. Abbot says that "the Intuitionist theory is a marvellous labor-saving machine, doing the work of consolation for human hearts without taxing the powers of the human brain." That is true,—it is a labor-saving machine, in full harmony with this age that believes in labor-saving machines. I grant it is the short-cut theory, but indolence is pardonable for taking the short-cut way when it is the only apparent way.

Again, Mr. Abbot thinks that "it lies in the inevitable logic of the Intuitionist theory to refuse fellowship on equal terms to all atheists and materialists;"—that we must claim to belong to a "spiritual aristocracy," as we assume to have an intuitive faculty which they do not possess. Very well; if we affirm we have what atheists have not, do they not affirm to have what we have not? If we have an intuitive faculty, which they disclaim for themselves, they also claim a superior reason and logical faculty, and therefore claim, it may be said to belong to a profound logical aristocracy. As for a spirit of pride and contempt, I confess I have seen it quite as often manifested by those who assert themselves atheists as by the intuitionists. The former class are not unfrequently given to boasting of their superior reason; are not over-sensitive, and will not be kept awake o' nights by the wounds of a sensitive nature or the fear of being spiritually ostracised. They ask no sympathy, and scorn your contempt. They are sufficiently pachydermatous to get through this world, though they are pronounced "spiritually legless."

But who are the avowed atheists? Dr. Maudsley says,—"There is hardly one, if indeed there be even one, eminent scientific inquirer, who has denied the existence of God, while there is notably more than one who has evinced a childlike simplicity of faith." If you mean by atheism, not a disbelief, but a non-belief in God, then it is possible that there are some atheists among eminent men; but it is easy to show from various passages in the works of the ablest philosophers and scientists of the present day that they do believe in a Supreme Power, or else they say not what they mean and mean not what they say. I might quote from Owen, Lyell, Huxley, Darwin, Agassiz, Maudsley, Spencer, Mill, De Morgan, and others to prove this, if necessary. These men are sceptical, as many great thinkers are; but it is not these great men, but little men with a little knowledge, a dangerous thing, who are the avowed atheists of the day—men who are not known and never will be known outside the limits of their own town. I do not believe that scientific men are generally hostile to theism. I think they generally accept it, not because they are scientists, but because they are men, with human hearts. I cannot see how scientific tools and methods can ever prove or disprove the existence of God. When they attempt it, I am ready to reply like the "Spirit of Denial" in Thorndale. "I believe," Seckendorf would sometimes say, "I believe in God till your philosophers bring me a demonstration of his existence." "And then?" I said. "And then—I do not believe in the demonstration."

W. H. S.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

On the Darwinian principle, how is it that some tribes of the animal world are gregarious and others are not? Man, most malignantly of all, runs to flocks and herds. And so the perpetual cry to the unorganized religionist is, "What will you give us instead of our present church, or churches?" To most a question not easily answered.

For everybody must belong to something or to somebody. Not to be of a party in politics is a reproach; to be out of a church is to be "out of Christ;" not to be at least of some sect is to be an infidel. Even the Southern slaves used to taunt free negroes as having no master; and Carlyle somewhere speaks of "a negro gone masterless," as the unluckiest of beings.

Creeping on all fours is not confined to babes in robes, or swaddling clothes. What are called men are mostly still prone on the ground. Some young animals do not open their eyes till nine or more days old. How many human beings there are who seem never to open theirs, at any attainable age!

Individual, personal freedom, in politics, in religion, in social life, is not yet known as a discovery, still less as an enjoyed reality. We count men numerically only. A nation half Catos would not be so great as one half Catilines, unless it were also greater in multitude. So a church of twelve members, with every one a "John the beloved disciple," would not be so great as one of a hundred, though every tenth man were a Judas Iscariot.

A man asked me yesterday,—"How large is your church?" I answered,—"Just large enough to hold me." "Why," said he, "I should not like to join such a church as that." "No," said I, "nor need you; but would you not like to be such a church?" He asked—"How?"

Just there is the difficulty. How to be anything but what we are, and have been for ages!

A party, or a church, is a body of persons who all agree to think alike. Of course, agreement is impossible but on one condition; and that is that none shall really think at all. All come up, or rather go down, to just the same dead level. There is a picture of a heathen temple where the head of the god sitting on his throne touches the top. Let him attempt to rise, and he unroofs the building. So the sects, sitting in their sanctuaries, touch the very ridge-pole. Let a member attempt to grow taller, and it costs him his head, or the church its roof. Indeed, it has been known to cost both.

How shall we ever convince men and women that they, individually and separately, are of "more value than many sparrows"—not to say, than many sects or parties, or all churches, all governments?

I can answer the question—"What will you give us instead?" in works better than in words. I was six months in Salem, commencing last September. My weekly lecture was poor, O I know too well how poor! But to my attentive, ever wide-awake congregation, it did at least keep that question fully answered.

Most of the free religionists everywhere were ten or twenty years ago living, working abolitionists. To preach deliverance to the captives, and to practise what they preached, was their religion—their work and worship. They wished, they needed no other. What they now do, or should do, is to transfer their energies, grown strong by use, to the work of emancipating the millions of victims now held under the not less terrible thralldom of sect and party, social and political as well as religious; but pre-eminently religious.

And what these victims need to learn is that they, like the Southern freedmen and women, can just as well work and worship by and for themselves, individually and separately, as under masters and overseers. And a great deal better.

The lord of the lash has disappeared from the cotton field. He must be hunted from his last hiding-place; for in the pulpit he is the same direful divinity with vesture only changed.

The slave is delivered from the rice swamp, and is slowly working his way to nobler conditions in at least a "Promised Land" of Freedom. By the same instrumentalities is Liberty to be proclaimed on the spiritual plantation; and in both instances the "what instead" shall be Freedom instead of Slavery.

Can THE INDEX make room for one more word, and that a mere suggestion? The country teems with multitudes who are tired of the old chaff and husks, shells and bones of the past. But they dare not turn from the old feeding-troughs and flesh-pots, empty though they be and have long been, until they see at least a reasonable prospect that their last state shall not be worse than the first. In that one consideration, let THE INDEX and all workers in this mighty vineyard behold what should constitute a most important part of the work in hand.

P. P.

"We Germans," said Strauss in the preface to his "New Life of Jesus," "can be politically free only in proportion as we have made ourselves spiritually, morally, and religiously free." This truth is a universal one. The American theory of free government can never be faithfully carried out, so long as the American people are sunk in orthodox superstition. Of this, Bible-reading in our schools is simply one illustration.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

A RADICAL ON MARTYRDOM.

I think the readers of THE INDEX will be interested in a little dinner-table episode that fell under my observation the other day. My friend H. had been speaking of the Protestant martyrs in the time of "Bloody Mary's" reign. E. expressed great admiration for their heroism and constancy.

H. said:—"Certainly, they were very brave, and it was consistent with their religion to die for it, but I do not think any sensible person would consent to be burned for the sake of his creed now."

E.—"I should, rather than recant. Wouldn't you?"

H.—"Not I."

E.—"I don't think much of your creed, then."

H.—"Neither do I. I am a Radical."

E.—"Do you mean to say you would recant then, to escape death?"

H.—"If I thought it likely that I should be burned, I think I should leave." (Laughter from some Christians.)

E.—"Well, just suppose you could not get away; you were bound to the stake, and your inquisitors say to you,—'Renounce your creed, and accept ours.' What would you say, if you knew death to be the only alternative?"

H.—"I think I should say, in effect, 'Gentlemen, you are impertinent. I cannot do your first bidding, as I have no creed, but I am willing to do the reasonable thing, and I will accept your creed if you will let me go.' When I got well out of hearing, I should say,—'But it does move.' I think I could do more good by living than by dying, and I am willing to lie in a good cause, believing that the end justifies the means. I am not 'prepared to die' for the sake of all the words in the dictionary. I am not a coward, but the age of creeds is past."

E.—"No one can argue with you, for you've no creed, and one cannot tell where you stand."

H.—"Exactly. I do not fix the laws of the Universe, but I try to act well my part."

E. here "changed the subject." H.'s radicalism left him no ground for any argument except abuse, which he is too gentlemanly to use. I was reminded of In Memoriam:

"Perplexed in faith, but pure in deeds,
At last he beat his music out."

W. H. D.

[Radicalism might, we think, have had a more high-minded representative.—Ed.]

NAME OR NICKNAME?

DUNKIRK, N. Y., 20 May, 1871.

DEAR INDEX:—I hasten to proclaim my ready acceptance of the views of your correspondent as expressed in the first extract under "Voices from the People" in the issue No. 73, May 20.

He says we should not try to vindicate ourselves against the charge of being infidels, but that we should allow, or even profess, that we are. That hits the right nail on the head; it will take the wind out of the sails of the enemies of mental freedom, and remove an obstacle that lies in the way of freedom's progress.

Before I left Ireland, I had heard—actually heard—that there were infidels in America. Now there were none of America's curiosities which I, when I landed, was more desirous to see than an infidel. So, before being in the country long, a friend, knowing my wishes, and having quite an opinion of my controversial ability, took me to the house of an infidel. I found to my inexpressible surprise that the infidel was a man, nothing short of it—and even a gentleman! Devil a horn was on his head, nor did he a tail unfold. I was nonplussed.

"Why, sir," said I, "you must be a Christian, and a good Catholic?" "I am neither," was the reply. Then, after a display of respectful phrases disavowing the intention of imputing anything tending, in him, to infidelity, I said: "And, sir, what may I be allowed to call you?" "An infidel, my friend; I am an infidel."

Here the interview ended. I wasn't prepared. I wanted to—go home—home for something I thought I forgot.

Let us then by all means accept the name. The bad moral secondary meaning which has been linked with it will soon drop off, and the gentlemen who apply this term to us because we refuse to adore, any longer, a God which priests created, will lose their best weapon of offence, and free religion will progress.

"Tis the devil," said the priests, when Luther gave an account of the indulgences different from that of Tetzel. "Concedo," says Luther; "and now the coast is clear for your answer to the devil's argument." This proved somewhat more troublesome to the priests than the cry of "devil."

Since Luther's time, the devil has grown beautifully less, inasmuch as that he is now little more than a shadow. A substitute was needed, and so infidel has come upon the carpet. Let us accept the name, and be proud that by unflinching FIDELITY to Nature and Reason we have earned a title which makes clearer our stand against fraud and falsehood.

J. T. BLAKENEY.

[Both the above article and the extract referred to lay altogether too much stress upon a supposed political advantage to be derived from voluntary acceptance of the name "infidel." It is thought that the enemy is confounded by the boldness and dash which are manifested by such a course. But suppose in a dispute an antagonist gets angry and exclaims—"Sir, you are a liar and a knave!" It would undoubtedly confound him, and very effectually spike his cannon, were the person addressed to reply coolly—"You are correct; I am a liar and a knave." Yet what man who respects himself would make such an admission merely for the sake of getting the victory in an argument? This case is precisely similar in kind, though more offensive in degree, to the case of a bigot who cries—"Infidel, infidel!" Instead of admitting his indirect accusation of moral delinquency, or sticking the epithet defiantly in our hat like a cockade or party badge, we choose to turn our back upon him, and go quietly about our own business. Our correspondents consider chiefly the controversial opportunity offered; we consider solely the actual meaning intended to be conveyed by the word, and the truthfulness or untruthfulness of the charge thus made. With entire respect for their opinion in the matter, we see less and less reason for changing our own.—ED.]

THE RADICALISM OF JESUS.

PARA, BRAZIL, March 2, 1871.

Temporarily a resident of a far distant region, I have perused with much interest a few back numbers of THE INDEX which a friend kindly sent me. Reflecting upon their contents, I am again reminded of a frequent tendency of radical writers by which they do not limit their denials to what we consider the unfounded claims in behalf of Jesus, or at all events by which they pass over certain marked qualities which must be conceded to him, even when he is regarded from a strictly humanitarian standpoint. Perhaps this is a natural result; it certainly is a frequent one. In the impetuous recoil from one extreme, people are apt to rush into the other; and in this particular case the earnest denial of unreasonable claims in his behalf seems to have been followed by an oversight of excellences which in another would probably have received marked consideration. In regard to what we consider one of these omissions, one to which it seems singular that radical writers should have made so little reference, we will with your permission offer a few thoughts. We refer to his position as a radical reformer, and one whom, when all the circumstances are considered, we must admit to have been one of the most thorough and outspoken known to history. His unequalled reverence and spirituality of belief seem to have partially concealed this other trait, which was a no less marked characteristic. It was, however, this, more than all else, which so shortened his mission, and caused his so early death. Little cared the Scribes and Pharisees that he spent his time teaching love to God and to man, or that he exhibited in himself the truest life of which we have any record. These in themselves would not have given them a moment's uneasiness. So far he was to them only an enthusiast, on whom it was not worth while to waste a passing thought. But, when he criticised their deeds in such plain language; when he publicly stigmatized their righteousness as formal, hollow, and worthless, demanding something far higher and better of his followers; when he called them hypocrites, who devoured widows' houses; when he declared that they made their proselytes ten times more the child of hell than themselves, the respectable doctors of divinity, the revered and pious teachers of society who omitted no tithe of Jewish ceremony, the influential conservators of law and order, the upholders of their ancient constitution; and, above all, when he consigned their sacred Temple and its observances to future oblivion, both of which they believed had received the direct consecration of Jehovah,—their indignation and wrath knew no restraint. Who was Jesus, to doubt what they considered most sacred? Who was he, who intentionally and repeatedly violated their Sabbath, denying their observance of it and declaring it made solely for the service of man? Had he no reverence for institutions hoary with age, no regard for hallowed associations? Was he wiser than they all, the man unlearned in letters whose origin was so humble, the companion of publicans, sinners and outcasts? Never must such a blasphemer of sacred things be permitted to go free, scattering such pestilential heresies among the ignorant people. We moderns cannot probably fully understand the horror with which many a conservative Jew must have heard some of the rebukes of Jesus. Our habits and modes of thought are different, and we have nothing which stands in the same relation to ourselves as did their history and religious observances to them. There seems to be no good reason for supposing that the Jewish leaders or people were then much worse, morally, than the people of the present day. The new doctrines of Jesus destroyed many things which the orthodox Jew held most sacred; it also placed the despised Gentile on the same footing as those who had always considered themselves the specially chosen people of God. No doubt many honestly believed that the effect of the new teaching would be the confusion of all correct views of right and wrong, and the annihilation of all true religious belief. We all remember with what misconception and bitterness the doctrine of a higher law was assailed only a few years ago among us, and this after all had to do only with a political document of comparatively recent date. Caiaphas declared that it was better that one man should die, than that the nation should perish. How many in this country would have rejoiced to have had Mr. Garrison, or Mr. Phillips, or Sumner, suffer the extreme penalty of our law? Yet these very persons honestly regard Caiaphas and the leaders of the Jews with horror, not seeing how completely they themselves occupied a similar position, and manifested the same spirit. Then, as now, the aid of the secular power was sought to crush heresy, because in all ages men have doubted either the power of truth to vindicate itself or the capacity of human nature to perceive and to acknowledge it. In this regard, the superiority of the faith of Jesus is marked and singular. Believing human nature to be the creation of God, he could not doubt its capacity to recognize and to accept truth when it was presented. Consider to what feeble hands his message was entrusted. The ignorant fishermen, the despised tax-gatherers, the abandoned of either sex, were those to whom he commended those high spiritual truths which the world does not yet fully appreciate. By whom before were such called the light of the world, or exhorted to become perfect? Leaving no written word, requiring no creed, establishing no rite, his faith in God and in the human nature which He gave to man, was such that he freely committed to these the truth, certain that it would eventually defeat all opposition and overcome all obstacles. The radical character of the reform he inaugurated, the most radical one ever attempted grew out of this supreme faith, and it would seem, that the world should have learned from it that there is no essential antagonism between the most radical views and a deeply reverential spirit. Here, however, men seem determined to be blind, and to insist that moral dishonesty must be at the foundation of all theological doubt. From some obliquity of mind we generally find it much easier to be patient with those who believe more than we do, than with those who believe less. He is a rare person, who can treat both classes with uniform respect and unalloyed sweetness. In view, however, of the great progress that has been made in liberality of belief within the last fifty years, we may hope for more of this spirit, so desirable for all parties, and that by slow degrees, perhaps, but still surely, mankind will come to the conviction that sincerity of belief is the essential point, and that harmony of purpose and aims does not necessarily conflict with the most diverse speculative opinions.

S. H. A.

A VINDICATION OF MR. SUMNER.

PLYMOUTH, WIS., April 30, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:—I solicit a corner in your paper to express an opinion; for, humble as I am, I too have an opinion. I am a Radical Republican—I am one of the original members of the present Republican party! I was a member of the Convention when that party was organized in this State. Previous to that I was a freesoiler. I never followed any political leader merely because he held accidental power and had his hands full of patronage. I consider the use of the Republican party to be to secure man's natural, political, religious, and social rights.

Charles Sumner is one of our greatest statesmen. In the arena of our national politics none stands higher. In all his public acts (save his vote on the Alaska treaty) I have been forced to commend and admire him. Against his private moral character I have never heard a word breathed. Beyond this, the public have no right to inquire. It is none of our business whether he is socially agreeable or not. Gen. Grant and Mr. Sumner do not like each other, and some of your correspondents seem to think this an unpardonable offence on the part of the Senator.

The friends of the President saw fit to deprive the nation of his great services as Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and to put in his place a person of very inferior abilities, and one whose honesty is not above suspicion. This was done publicly and avowedly because Sumner was not socially on friendly terms with the President.

Senator Howe proclaimed this in the Senate of the United States, and in his letter to the Golden Age. In the letter he was distinct in showing that the President had no official business with the Committee on Foreign Relations—that his public acts and relations were with the Senate through its President. In this he was right. Mr. Crane seems to charge Mr. Sumner with "impugning the motives" of the President, as Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations!

However Mr. Sumner's speech in the Senate, after he was displaced from his chairmanship, may be construed, I have yet to learn that in that Committee he ever breathed aught against the President's motives. I do not believe he did. If he did, we have Senator Howe's authority for saying that the President had no business with that committee. Why, then, should he or his friends ask that a man pleasing to him sit there? Gen. Grant once held a position under President Johnson, and held it, too, after he became displeasing to the President, and refused to vacate his place, though Mr. Johnson proved by all his cabinet that he agreed to do so upon the happening of a certain contingency, which actually did happen.

We all commended Gen. Grant for that, and yet now, when in Johnson's seat he (or his friends for him) displace a useful public servant from a position with which the President has no official or other business, I am astonished to find Republicans applauding!

But Mr. Crane says:—"The recommendations of the Executive are always entitled by other departments of the government to a careful, candid and respectful consideration." Very well. Strike always from the sentence and insert usually, and I fully agree with your correspondent.

But the President's recommendation in the shape of a treaty with the government de jure or de facto, I do not know which, of San Domingo was sent to the Senate over a year ago, and did receive a "respectful consideration;" and after its virtual rejection, it was only "respectful" for the President to submit, and drop his favorite project. Instead of this, he persevered in his course and employed the navy of the United States, as Mr. Sumner has fully shown, without any constitutional or legal authority whatever, to sustain the government of President Baez till the annexation of that country to ours could be perfected.

No matter what the ostensible cause of Mr. Sumner's removal was, minds impartial and non-partizan will not fail to see that his opposition to the San Domingo treaty was the real cause of the great wrong done to the public by putting Simon Cameron at the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations, at this particular time, when a very important treaty with one of the first powers of the earth is likely to engage its attention, in the place of the most eminent statesman of the country.

The danger to all free governments is the encroachments of Executive power, and when a President of the United States can find the means of having a great statesman, because he is not on agreeable social terms with him, displaced from an important position in another department of the government than his own, and have a little man put in his place whose social tastes are more congenial, it is time for all lovers of liberty to watch.

EDW. M. MACGRAW.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY.

A religion of humanity is the greatest need of the times. A revival preacher, a professedly educated and Christian man, recently said in a discourse that a horse thief had a better chance of gaining heaven than a man of high moral principles. Such a religion, founded, as it professedly is, on the assumed doctrine of the total depravity of man, is no longer of any significance to enlightened, thinking people. The sooner we ignore the doctrines and name of such a religion, the more rapid will be our progress in all that pertains to the welfare and improvement of humanity. It is time to teach a religion that recognizes man as a child of God; that makes character fundamental; that bases improvement on self-culture; that shows suffering to be the legitimate issue of wrong-doing; that points to personal effort as the only means of overcoming the consequences of violated law; that says—"you must sow good seed, if you would reap good fruits;" that requires devotion to truth and rewards every man for his own earnest effort.

We are glad Free Religion does not bind to creed or dogma, nor promise to reward any man by imputing to him the righteousness of another. It is a religion of manhood, a religion of reason. Hence it is acceptable to thousands who are no longer content to feed on the withered husks of orthodoxy. It recognizes a universal element in all religions, and is therefore a religion of humanity. It does not rest satisfied with present attainments, but strikes boldly out in search of more truth and invites investigation and criticism. Nothing is too sacred to be investigated; indeed, investigation is the sacred right of all. Free Religion invites it, as the only means of detecting error and discovering truth. Any system that fears investigation and ignores reason cuts off all means of healthy growth, and must sooner or later yield its place to a more vigorous and vital system.

Now we want to awaken a spirit of investigation among the people that shall culminate in the rejection of authority such as the church has used, and that shall learn to decide all questions by weight of evidence. Conscience, honor, moral principle, noble aspiration, devotion to truth, work for humanity, intelligence, pass for nothing with the church, unless the authority of her religion be recognized and obeyed. She says:—"Receive my doctrine, or go down to the depths of dark despair." Here is tyranny on the one part and slavery on the other. Nothing of freedom, nothing of humanity is found. Under such conditions there can be no healthy growth, because there can be no vigorous exercise of the faculties. Freedom will induce thought; and thought will lead to culture, aspiration, and earnest work. But for freedom, we should not have THE INDEX and the other noble workers that are striving to lead others to the serene heights where reason can have her perfect work. There are many who have never felt the inspiration that freedom brings, who would gladly read the publications of the free party, if the friends who have them would hand them around. This seems the most effectual way of reaching those who are ready, but never have had the opportunity to investigate the claims of Free Religion. Where the light of the new dispensation shines, there horse-thieves will not be considered the most available candidates for the heavenly state. People will gradually learn to restrain and govern their passions, and to cultivate and improve the higher faculties, when they know they must suffer the full consequences of their misdeeds.

T. K. P.

"No ADMITTANCE!"—Mr. Curtis has given his "Charles Dickens" in Music Hall, and finding himself in the city where ministers so foolishly disputed each other as to the future destiny of Mr. Dickens, had much to say concerning "ecclesiasticism," which he labored to show was the worst ism we have to fear. He took special occasion to hit the Baptists, in what he considered their (at present) sensitive point,—the communion question. I have seen no allusion to Mr. Curtis's hit in the newspapers, but it was the most decided and direct thrust at a particular sect that the writer ever heard on any occasion. He related the story of a church-member, who, being a stranger in a certain place, went into a certain church on the Sabbath day, and remained after sermon at communion service. The deacons looked uneasily at him and at one another, and finally went to the stranger, and in a whisper accosted him thus:—"Perhaps you—you—are—are—not aware—but—but this is a so and so church." "Yes," mildly returned the stranger, "I am aware of it." "Well," rejoined the deacons, "we—we-do not expect—eh—that—any—will partake except those who belong to a—so and so church." "Oh," said the stranger, taking his hat, "I thought this was a Christian church, and that you were celebrating the Lord's Supper; but if this is a private entertainment, I beg your pardon for intruding, and will retire." Those who ever heard Mr. Curtis lecture can imagine how he would relate this little parable; and what do you think, Mr. Editor? a grave and stately gentleman, looking very much like Dr. Rollin H. Neale, sat in his accustomed place at Music Hall lectures, at the speaker's left hand.—Watchman and Reflector.

A letter recently passed through the New York P. O., addressed as follows:

Bostmaster, blesse to sent him strait,
Ben-syl-vany is der staight;
Olt Venango, dat's their gounty,
Vere oit bours out mit Hefen's pounty;
Franklin, she's der gounty seat,
Der Bost Office on Liberdty shreet;
Sharly Taylor, he's der man;
Send dis yust so quick you can.

A pompous individual walked up to the office of the Stockton House, Cape May, one day last week, and with considerable flourish signed the book, and exclaimed, "I'm Lieutenant Governor of —." "That doesn't make any difference," says the polite clerk, "you will be treated just as well as the others."—Exchange.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE,
BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,
Forwarded free for twenty cents.

D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98

SELL TREES. Nurserymen's and Dealer's Supplies. Price Lists, viz: No. 2, Nurserymen's; No. 3, Dealers'; No. 4, Local Canvassers'. Address W. F. HEIKES, Dayton, O. (Nursery established in 1822.) 73-77

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $2.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield Street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73ti

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. TOWNE, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison St., Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73if

INSTITUTE OF PRACTICAL CIVIL ENGINEERING, SURVEYING, AND DRAWING, Fits Students for R. R. Field-Work in Three to Six Months. Through Course One Year. For Circular address

A. VAN DER NAILLEN, Principal,
Room C, Reynolds' Block, Chicago.
71-75.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed). The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 38yl

A Few More Agents Wanted For
THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD
A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.
The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

69-75. ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WOOD & HOLBROOK'S PUBLICATIONS.

HERALD OF HEALTH.

Sixty Pages. $2.00 a Year. 20 Cts. a Number.

Three Months on Trial Twenty-five Cts.

$1 a Year to Clergymen, Teachers, and Invalids who request it. New subscribers who send $2 for 1871 will be entitled to a book of 300 pages and 100 Engravings, entitled PHYSICAL PERFECTION, or Hints towards Human Beauty, showing how to acquire and retain Bodily Symmetry, Health and Vigor, and to avoid the infirmities and deformities of age, worth $1.50. The Scientific American says, "The HERALD OF HEALTH contains more sensible articles than any monthly that comes to our sanctum."

ALSO—

PHYSICAL PERFECTION.—Containing Chapters on Structure of the Human Body; the Perfect Man and Woman; the Temperaments; Laws of Human Configuration; Embryology; Childhood; Effects of Mental Culture; Moral and Emotional Influences; Social Conditions and Occupations; Effects of Climate and Locality; Direct Physical Culture; Practical Hygiene; Womanhood; the Secret of Longevity; the Arts of Beauty; External Indications of Figure, etc., etc. Beautifully Illustrated with 100 Engravings, and handsomely bound. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This work has been through many editions, and has given great satisfaction to thousands. A copy is given free to subscribers to the HERALD OF HEALTH, who send $2 at once.

MINNESOTA AND ITS CLIMATE, as adapted to Consumptives, Invalids, and all who wish to make the State a Home. By Lyndal Bill, author of "A Winter in Florida." Price $1.25, post paid, by mail.

This book, while a godsend to invalids and consumptives, will be found equally interesting to sportsmen and settlers, who would find a home in this far-famed State. It contains a beautiful view of Minnehaha Falls, and also chapters on the climate of all those places which are most desirable as resorts for invalids, including Florida, Nassau, the Adirondacks, California, San Diego, Fayal, etc., etc.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL, AND PHYSICAL CULTURE; OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRUE LIVING. By Professor F. G. Welch, Superintendent in Yale College. It contains over 400 pages, and is beautifully bound. Price, by mail, $2.25.

This book is the most perfect Encyclopedia of Gymnastic exercises of the most approved method known. It tells in plain language how to do everything from the building of a gymnasium and choosing apparatus to doing the exercises. The series of exercises with the Indian clubs alone, is the best ever published. Those who want a good work on gymnastic culture should not fail to get this one. Dr. Dio Lewis says, "This is an admirable guide to physical culture."

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS.—Hints on Getting Well and Keeping Well. By Mrs. E. B. Gleason, M. D.

Woman agents wanted everywhere. Thousands are being sold. Full contents and terms of agency sent on application. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This book is designed mainly for women, of all ages. It treats principally on the diseases of women, and includes chapters on Child Bearing, and the Care of Children. Harper's Magazine, in reviewing the work, says:

"Mrs. Gleason is able to say something to wives and to mothers which no man could say. There can be no difference of opinion about the value of the practical suggestions she affords, which are characterized by sound philosophy and clear, good sterling common sense. We wish the chapter, 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract, and sent to every mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sayles, after reading it, says, "I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

No woman can read it without being made wiser and better, and without being better qualified for all the duties of life. For any or all of the above works, address,

WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
67coowSt 13 & 15 Laight St., New York.

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50.
64-78

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).

I am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?

The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.

The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.

God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.

Infidelity: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.

Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.

Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.

Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.

What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.

Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.

Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.

The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.

Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.

Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.

"It Injures our Business?" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?

Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.

These four for 10 cents. Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE, 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65.) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

LECKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols. 6.00

MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00

EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols. 5.00

WEISS'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes. 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price. 2.00

LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price. 2.00

Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price. 2.00

Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price. 2.00

Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each. 2.00

On the Heights, AUERBACH. 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names, 50 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 50 Names, 25 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 25 Names, 15 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 10 Names, 5 Dollars in Greenbacks

For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,	1
What is Free Religion?	2
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, 4	4
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,	7
Sunday Schools,	8
Friendship,	9
Grief and its Compensations,	11
The Hebrew Prophets,	12
Capital Punishment,	13
Human Ideals,	14
The Essence of Religion,	15
The Management of Children,	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),	17
The Candle of the Lord,	18
Public Opinion,	19
Conscience,	20
The Pedigree of Man,	21
"Following Christ,"	22
The Tongue,	23
The Golden Age,	24
What is Truth?	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,	27
The Sunday Question,	28
Motes and Beams,	29
The Dove's Departure,	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,	31
Religious Freedom,	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,	33
Noise,	34
The Humility of Free Religion,	35
Chaos and Cosmos,	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,	38
War and Free Religion,	39
Religious Revivals,	40
Mary and Martha,	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,	42
Success,	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,"	44
Spiritual Beauty,	45
The Book of Daniel,	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter,	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers,	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,	49
Parties and Party Spirit,	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,	52
Transient and Permanent,	53

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No 23.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JUNE 10, 1871.

WHOLE No. 76.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

RELIGIOUS CURIOSITIES OF LONDON.

THE SOCIETY OF RELIGIOUS RATIONALISTS.

[London Correspondence of the Dundee (Scotland) Advertiser.]

It is obvious that the title I have chosen for this sketch requires explanation. "Who are the Religious Rationalists?" some will say; and others, I doubt not, will be ready to exclaim "Religious Rationalists, forsooth! It is a contradiction in terms." But many of your older readers will be familiar with the name of the founder of this Society, the late W. J. Fox, of Finsbury, although few may be acquainted with his life and works. It is about fifty years since Mr. Fox began his ministrations as pastor of a congregation of free thinkers in South Place Chapel, Finsbury, and this connection was maintained until his death, nearly forty years after. During the American war, Mr. Moncure D. Conway, a gentleman who had acquired some celebrity in the United States by his zealous, outspoken, and self-sacrificing advocacy of the abolition of slavery, came over to London, and was permanently installed as Mr. Fox's successor. Since his arrival in this country, Mr. Conway has gained a fair literary reputation by his contributions on American questions to Fraser's Magazine and the Fortnightly Review. It was a charming, idyllic picture of Emerson and the little society that greatest of American philosophers has gathered round him at the village of Concord, published several years ago in the former of these periodicals, that made me acquainted with Mr. Conway; and I have read everything which has appeared with his name appended to it ever since. The interest thus excited naturally led me to visit the South Place Chapel, where Mr. Conway preaches every Sunday forenoon.

I believe the Society of Religious Rationalists has prospered under Mr. Conway's care; I know that the congregation is warmly attached to him. Last Sunday forenoon there were upwards of three hundred persons present in South Place Chapel, and everything about the place betokened prosperity and increase. The walls were freshly painted, the pews were scrupulously clean, the gasolier was highly polished, the pulpit was free from all taint of dust, and the flock had an independent, well-pleased expression in their faces. I have often remarked that congregations have characteristic physiognomies, but I never saw the common likeness so strikingly displayed as it is in the sanctuary at South Place. Men, women, and children all have an earnest, intellectual look. There is a total absence of stiffness or formality, and, though all are serious, no one is solemn or sedate. Before Mr. Conway makes his appearance, friends lean over the high pews and chat with each other in a free and easy, unconstrained manner; and the beadle, or pew-opener, talks to his acquaintances as he shows them to their seats, without lowering his voice below the ordinary conversational pitch. The latter official seems to add to his other functions that of colporteur to the Society, and drives quite a brisk trade in hymn-books and printed sermons while the congregation is gathering and dispersing.

After finishing my survey of the chapel and congregation, I employed the rest of the interval that remained before the time fixed for the commencement of the service in turning over the book of Hymns obligingly handed to me by the beadle. I found this a very pleasant occupation. The Hymn Book used by Mr. Conway's congregation admirably illustrates the eclecticism of the body. Besides paraphrases of a few passages of Scripture, it contains verses from German, English, and American poets, and even Ossian and Hafiz are made contributors to its pages. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, and Pope; Wordsworth, Byron, and Shelley; Goethe and Schiller; Tennyson and Browning; Longfellow, Bryant, and J. A. Dorgan are among the principal authors from whose works the collection has been compiled. I may mention that some of the spirited but uncouth metres of Thomas Carlyle also find a place in this Hymn Book. The list of the composers whose music is married to the immortal verse of these great poets includes Beethoven, Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Sebastian Bach, Spohr, Gluck, Hummel, and others of less note.

The service in South Place Chapel is both attractive and impressive, although neither very elaborate nor very imposing. Every portion is well performed. The singing is led by a highly trained choir, which comprises several voices of very good quality, and an organ, played with great taste and feeling. Mr. Conway's reading is effective and reverent, and his style of address is remarkably forcible and telling. He speaks with a marked American accent, but this only seems to heighten the effect of his natural eloquence. The congregation listened throughout with the most marked attention—eye and ear being equally on the qui vive—and now and then respond by a half-suppressed bustling movement to the hits the preacher makes in the course of his sermon. Some of the older members of the Society even occasionally manifest their approbation by emitting semi-articulate sounds, and by gesticulating in a rather energetic style. Nevertheless there is no fault to find with their behaviour on the score of decorum—their demonstrations are obviously sincere and respectful.

Mr. Conway is apparently upwards of forty years of age, and is rather over the average height. His long, black, lanky locks frame in a forehead bearing evident traces of hard thinking and some sorrowful experiences, but neither notably broad nor high. His whiskers, moustache, and beard preserve a natural rugged picturesqueness of outline, only to be seen on men who have early forsworn the use of razor and scissors. His flowing beard has begun to assume that nondescript, whitey-brown hue, not unfrequently to be met with in sallow-complexioned, middle-aged gentlemen. In certain temperatures his nose, which is large and somewhat podgy, manifests a tendency to become rose-colored, a peculiarity that medical men would probably connect with indigestion and a rather sluggish circulation. His pale, soft, flabby cheeks are marked with deep lines, the lower extremities of which run into, and hide themselves in, the bushy moustache and beard. But the moment that Mr. Conway rises to speak, a smile of subtilty and sweetness diffuses itself over every feature, rendering further analysis of his face impossible and, at the same time, unnecessary. That smile, one feels at once, would tell us more about the man if we could get to know it well, than all the other elements of his countenance. In this case, at all events, I should be inclined to modify the celebrated axiom of Buffon, and say, "The smile—that is the man." A hearty, sincere, and unreserved smile is perhaps quite as rare and quite as significant a phenomenon as that true ringing "peal of laughter" which Thomas Carlyle rightly considers an infallible index of strength and nobility of character. Most people can only smile with their mouth, and some, we all know, with but one side of their mouth at a time. Mr. Conway is one of the few who can smile all over—freely, fully, without hesitation or arriere-pensee. Moreover, this smile is as different in kind as it is in scope and degree from that we are accustomed to see. It is the ecstatic smile of a devotee and seems altogether out of place in our matter-of-fact latitude. The Brahmin who daily nourishes his soul by fervently contemplating the ineffable perfection of Brahma, and longing for re-absorption in the general soul, must surely have much the same smile as this! But the smile of the Brahmin would be more restricted in range, more fixed, and less mobile. Indeed, in capacity for expressing the most widely different feelings with exactitude and delicacy—in passion and in pathos—I have seen no smile that can be compared to Mr. Conway's.

Two sets of influences have combined to form Mr. Conway's mind and character. These are his extraordinary life experiences and the teachers from whom he draws his inspiration. The son of a planter and slave-owner, Moncure D. Conway was born near a small town named Falmouth, in Virginia. In early life he was a firm believer in the characteristic institution of the Southern States, and at one time acted as the Secretary of a Secession Club. It was only after he had officiated some years as a Methodist preacher that he was converted by a Quaker to abolition principles. Whenever his eyes were opened to the iniquities of slavery, he renounced his position in the Methodist Church, and betook himself to the Divinity College at Cambridge, Massachusetts. After he graduated at Cambridge in 1854, Mr. Conway returned to his home in Virginia, but only to find that his reputation as a friend of the slave had preceded him. He was confronted on his arrival by a band of his old school companions, who told him they only abstained from tarring and feathering him out of respect for his father and mother. He had accordingly to leave Virginia and wander forth penniless and almost friendless. But he abated no jot of his sympathy for the slave, and, when the American war broke out, Mr. Conway assisted about forty of his father's negroes out of the reach of the Southerners, and found work for them in Ohio, where they still remain in freedom and comfort. The effect of such a career on a man's character could not fail to be great. It is to be seen in Mr. Conway's manner as well as in the attitude of his mind. At Cambridge, as a matter of course, Mr. Conway felt the influence of Emerson, and when he went to Boston a few years later, and sat under Theodore Parker, his education was nearly completed. To understand his theological position, it is only necessary to remember that his spiritual progenitors are Carlyle, Emerson, and Parker. The doctrines Mr. Conway preaches are the logical outcome of their teaching. In South Place Chapel, on Sunday mornings, the philosophy of Carlyle and Emerson is practically applied and enforced by an eloquent and zealous disciple. Even the curious mixture of mysticism and shrewdness to be observed in Mr. Conway is characteristic also of at least one of his teachers—of Emerson. It struck me that the words which Theodore Parker spoke one day, when he was wandering in a wood near Boston with Mr. Conway, fell into an ear which was prepared to hear him. "There is a miracle sense in us," said the great American preacher, "which should be respected. At present, men feed the mystic part of them with fables, as a man who cannot get bread will eat grass rather than starve; but when men have grown so far as to see God in that flower, to love Him in that sky, to read his Scripture in their own hearts, Nature will rise up as a miraculous dawn over man, and the legendary watch fires of the Church will sink into ashes."

It was said of Theodore Parker,—"His hearers don't know on the Sunday beforehand if in that day's discourse they'll be Bibled or Korand." Mr. Conway's hearers are in no better a position in this respect. Last Sunday the South Place congregation was treated to several passages from the writings of Confucius and Emerson, as well as from the Old and New Testament. A few weeks since, I am informed, Mr. Conway read some of those remarkable prophecies penned by Heinrich Heine nearly forty years ago. The Vedas, the Bhagavad Gita, the Mahabharata, the Vishnu Purana, frequently supply food for reflection to Mr. Conway's flock. I noticed on Sunday that Mr. Conway's selection was excellently adapted to the illustration of the theme of his discourse. The maxims of Confucius were particularly apposite, and especially those which referred to a contemporary of high character "who made water-courses for the people"—I presume a sort of scavenger or crossing-sweeper of the period.

There are two prayers or utterances introduced into the service, which merit a word or two of description. You have probably heard of a worthy who was in the habit of going into the middle of the road and easing his mind by "swearing at large," whenever anything occurred that was peculiarly disagreeable to him. I was reminded of him when I heard and saw Mr. Conway standing erect, with eyes wide open, pouring into the vastness of space his fervent hope or belief that, somehow or other, all was well. The ground Mr. Conway occupies when he makes his petition, like that of the candidate for the American Presidency, of whom Mr. Hosea Biglow speaks, is distinctly promiscuous—it is “pretty generally all round.” After prayer to the immensities and eternities, the organ plays a soft soothing symphony in accord with the feelings produced by the assurances just uttered. This was followed on Sunday last by the performance by the choir of a piece of concerted music, set to the translation Carlyle has given us of a couplet of Goethe's:—

“Like to a star that maketh no haste, that taketh no rest,
Be each one fulfilling his God-given best.”

This recalled the spirit from its soaring in the sky, and fitly heralded a sermon on “Hindrances to Character,” of a thoroughly practical kind. I can only indicate the principal heads of this discourse. After clearly defining and illustrating the meaning of the word character, Mr. Conway proceeded to remark that the hindrances or obstacles to its development were not innate, but arose from the conditions of society, from human institutions. All that was called “the world” was hostile to character. Churches, creeds, and institutions were all arranged at a time when men were less enlightened than they now are, and each had a standard it was committed to maintain intact, although men might have outgrown it. The commercial standard of the age was “to get on.” A man might come up to that standard who had almost entirely renounced reason and conscience. Then, as to the worldly standard of religion, every one of us is by turns tempted and tortured to give up nineteenth century light for that of the first century. Here, Mr. Voysey was eulogized. Any one who had failed to understand the power of the institutions of the past to drag the minds of men down to their own standard had only to look at the addresses of some of the candidates for the London School Board. Not six of them had the bravery to say that there is better teaching for the children than that which is to be found in the Bible. No scientific man believed that the world was made in six days, but science itself was cowed. The existence of a hereditary aristocracy was one of the local hindrances to character. It set up a fictitious standard of human worth. How pernicious this influence might become was seen in the prevalence of servility and snobbery. The standard of character was perverted when man bowed to rank and title. We must all seek to derive our life direct and fresh from God, and base our self-respect on a sincere desire to think and do our best. The sin of dogmatism and creeds was in this, they destroyed character.

At the close of the sermon, Mr. Conway announced that a meeting of the Society would be held on Wednesday night, to give any lady or gentleman an opportunity of asking explanations in regard to his withdrawal from the Committee of the Theistic Union Association. I attended that meeting, and found that an important effort had been made, at the time of Babu Keshub Chunder Sen's visit to this country, to form a union between the Theistic Church in England and the Brahmo-Somaj, or Church of the One God, in India. But I must defer my account of the proceedings till another day.

THE RELIGIOUS RATIONALISTS IN CONVOCA- TION.

[London Correspondence of the Dundee Advertiser.]

I informed you at the close of my last communication that, at the time of Babu Keshub Chunder Sen's visit to this country, a Committee was appointed for the purpose of organizing an Association for the promotion of a union between the Theistic Churches of England and India. That Committee has held several meetings, but is not yet in a position to lay any definite proposal before the public. The movement for Theistic union has attracted little attention among us, but I believe it has excited widespread interest in India. As a sign of the times, however, it is not without significance, although it cannot be regarded as a movement of any great immediate importance. Those who take delight in watching the steady progress of that mighty aspiration after association and unity, which is a distinguishing characteristic of the age we live in, will doubtless see cause for rejoicing that this feeling has begun to operate on the hitherto disconnected and unorganized bodies of men who call themselves Theists. The opponents of Theism have often complained that every individual Theist has to be fought with separately; if this movement should prove successful, that difficulty would be overcome. Those who fear, on the other hand, that the formation of a Theistic Union would increase the power and prestige of the Theists, may find comfort in the remoteness of the prospect of its being achieved. At present there is division in the camp, and the differences that have arisen are not likely to be easily and satisfactorily settled for some time to come. This much was made apparent by the proceedings at the meeting in South Place Chapel last Wednesday night.

Nearly one hundred persons responded to Mr. Conway's invitation to a Conference on the rupture that has taken place between himself and the Committee of the Association for the Promotion of Theistic Union, about one-third of whom were ladies of various ages, from sixteen to sixty. Elderly and middle-aged gentlemen were largely in the majority, and there were no very young lads present. On the motion of Mr. Conway, one of the elders took the chair, and briefly announced the object for which the meeting was assembled, adding that an opportunity would be afforded of questioning Mr. Conway in regard to any other part of his teaching and action, as their pastor, on which explanation might be desired. Do you think this system of interpellating the pastor could be extended with advantage? It would be considered a startling innovation in most Churches, no doubt, but it might benefit both pastor and people if properly carried out. The privilege was certainly not abused in South Place Chapel on Wednesday night, for the speakers only referred to Mr. Conway's services in order to praise them, and to express their high respect and esteem for their pastor.

Had Mr. Conway convoked his congregation for the express purpose of discussing and defining the religious principles and discipline of the Society of Religious Rationalists, that object could not have been better accomplished than it was on Wednesday night. The question submitted to the meeting was admirably adapted to bring their peculiar religious position into clear and bold relief. Mr. Conway explained that he had considered himself in conscience bound to withdraw his countenance from the Committee for Theistic Union, because a majority of the members of that Committee had resolved on basing their organization upon a creed. This creed simply expressed a belief in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man—two doctrines which he dearly prized—but he objected on principle to all creeds. He could not acknowledge any bond of union that would separate him from those who honestly doubted one or both of these doctrines. However firmly convinced he might be of the truth and vital importance of any dogma, he would consider it a sin to sanction any act that would, directly or indirectly, tend to impose his belief on others. No social stigma should be attached to any man on account of his religious opinions. The step he had taken was in harmony with the traditions of South Place Chapel. And he had called them together to learn whether they approved or disapproved of his conduct in reference to the Committee for Theistic Union.

An elderly gentleman then rose, on the invitation of the Chairman, and addressed the congregation. He also would think it wrong to impose his belief on any man, but he thought it absolutely necessary that they should adopt some declaration or proposition as a foundation for this Society; and he thought they would all agree to the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. He had failed to appreciate the objections Mr. Conway had expressed from the pulpit, on several Sundays, against the proposal of the majority of the Committee. In his opinion, they were finical and unsubstantial. No practical action could be taken, if this spirit prevailed among them. He regretted that Mr. Conway had withdrawn from the Committee on such grounds, as he thought that a very hopeful movement might thereby be checked and hindered. Their pastor, in his opinion, had committed a mistake.

A French gentleman, apparently between sixty and seventy years of age, who was referred to as one of the leaders of the Theistic party in France, thought that the views of the last speaker could be reconciled with those expressed by Mr. Conway. He also considered it necessary that they should possess something like a standard, a starting place, or a rallying point, and he thought that this standard should be as general and comprehensive as possible. In passing through Tours lately, he had visited the statue erected in that town to the great French philosopher Descartes, and had read the inscription engraven thereon—cogito, ergo sum. Descartes felt the necessity for a starting point, a proposition, to furnish a beginning and a foundation for his system of metaphysics, and, like a wise man, he sought out the smallest basis and beginning that could be found. The speaker thought the Religious Rationalists should imitate this example. There was a school in France that had formulated a complete scheme of morality having no reference whatever to a God. These men could not agree to the creed of the Theistic Union. He thought it would answer all useful purposes, if they called themselves Lovers of Truth. Pascal had beautifully said, “Hold fast to truth, for truth is—God.” All who wished to work for mankind would willingly acknowledge themselves lovers of truth. This old gentleman labored under a disadvantage, owing to his imperfect knowledge of the English language, but he spoke with great energy and feeling, although not with any strict sequence of thought.

A middle-aged gentleman now rose, and said he often felt that it would be an advantage, if he could return a definite answer to the question that was frequently put to him—“What are you? What opinions do you profess?” He was answered, immediately on sitting down, by another middle-aged gentleman, that he was probably mistaken in thinking that would be an advantage. In his opinion, their position was logically unassailable so long as they did not commit themselves to any set of opinions. (This remark raised a slight laugh among the Religious Rationalists, caused apparently by the naïve manner rather than the substance of the statement.) A great and good man had said, in a moment of blind enthusiasm, “I and my Father are One,” and they all knew what error and mischief that hyperbolic expression had occasioned. Before he could give his consent even to the adoption of a creed setting forth the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, he would require some time to consider what consequences might ensue, although he firmly believed both doctrines. It was difficult to say what might be done with that seemingly innocent declaration in the future. As far as the brotherhood of man was concerned, he would like to have that brotherhood strictly defined before he joined some men he knew. He could understand the value of machinery for any practical purpose such as education, but he did not see what use they had for a creed. He would object to a creed, if it was only a method of saying, “See how much more liberal I am than my neighbor!”

There was no question about changing their name. The fact was, they had not got a name. At one time they had been called Freethinkers, and he didn't know exactly what they were called now. For his part, he very cordially approved the course Mr. Conway had taken.

A young man, about five and twenty years of age, who spoke under considerable nervous excitement, here said that, unlike the rest of the speakers, he deeply regretted he could not honestly subscribe to the creed adopted by the Committee. Although he clung to the doctrine of the brotherhood of man with all the tenacity of his soul, the facts of life prevented him from believing in the Fatherhood of God. This had been the cause of anxious concern to him. He had been brought up in what is called a religious home, but what he saw in the world around him had shaken his faith in the Providence of God. He had tried to overcome this feeling, but he could not. By accident he had wandered into Mr. Conway's church one Sunday morning, and heard a doctrine preached that seemed exactly suited to his condition. He had attended regularly ever since, and felt that he had derived great benefit, although he was still in a painfully unsettled state. A creed that proclaimed the Fatherhood of God must necessarily prevent him from becoming a member of the Theistic Union. He was an honest and earnest seeker after truth, and if he were to be excluded from their fellowship because he was unable to accept the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God, he would feel that an injury had been inflicted upon him.

Another young man about the same age then rose to support Mr. Conway's views on the question of creeds. He spoke with intense fervor, but said nothing that had not been stated by previous speakers. He quoted Mr. Carlyle, and thought the opinions of that great writer furnished a complete and satisfactory settlement of the point in dispute. It was not so much the beliefs a man held, as his honesty and faithfulness, that showed what manner of man he was. How could any creed test the honesty of a man?

The next speaker was a woman, apparently little over twenty years of age, who spoke with much modesty and self-possession, and who exhibited quite unusual reasoning power and skill in debate. She began by stating that she had not had the advantage of being brought up in a religious home, like some of the speakers who had preceded her; nevertheless, she was glad to say she had come to believe in the brotherhood of man, and to rely on the Fatherhood of God. She had passed through various phases of doubt before she had reached her present state, and experienced obloquy and social persecution on account of her religious opinions. She was even now regarded with suspicion by some of her companions, because she expressed opinions on religious questions differing from those held by the mass of society. It behooved them to be very careful lest they should sanction any step that might lead to the infliction of similar evils to those they had all suffered, in consequence of their disagreement with the popular theology. The adoption of such a creed as that of the Theistic Union might produce no mischief at the present time, when they were in the minority, but she believed the time would come when they would be strong. Then this innocent-looking creed might be made as powerful an instrument of persecution as any that had preceded it. There was more implied in the Fatherhood of God than they might all be ready to admit. The personality of God was assumed in this declaration; and that was a difficult question to some people. After all, to proclaim the Fatherhood of God was merely to state a mode of conceiving His existence and relation towards us. We could not be sure that this conception, grand and glorious though it was, would be the best and truest conception of God that humanity would ever attain. It was evidently only a partial conception. Those who accepted the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God could hardly rest content with that. If God was the Father of the human race, He must be much more. History showed that man had made progress in the past in regard to theological doctrines, and she believed he would make progress in the future. A creed once adopted could not be changed, could not be improved; that was the great objection she had to a creed. It would ill become them to fix down the faith of the generations that were to succeed them to the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. She thoroughly approved of the step Mr. Conway had taken, and the grounds on which he based his resolution.

Other speakers took part in the discussion after this lady sat down, but their remarks were mainly repetitions of those made by one or other of the speakers who had previously spoken. The elderly gentleman who had opposed Mr. Conway thought that they ran a risk of refining themselves out of existence altogether. Notwithstanding all that had been said, he still considered it necessary that they should adopt some standard, and he could not appreciate the objections that had been brought against the creed of the Theistic Union. No bond of union could be found that would not exclude some people.

Mr. Conway then summed up the debate, and suggested that it might be resumed if the Committee of the congregation could make arrangements for another meeting. He would like to hear his people express their opinions on religious questions more frequently than they had hitherto done, as he felt that he would thereby be better enabled to meet their special needs and difficulties. The principal motive that had actuated him in withdrawing from the Committee for Theistic Union was sympathy for those who were in the position of the young man who had confessed his inability to accept the doctrine of the Father-erhood of God. No one then, he was sure, thought the worse of this young man for the doubts he had avowed; and for his own part, it was the doubting, sceptical class to whom he wished specially to appeal. He felt that an intellectual creed was impossible and undesirable, but it might not be impossible to raise a standard round which truth-seekers might gather. He would propose a league of men and women who submitted their thoughts and actions to the tribunal of reason. He would prefer, the title Rationalists to that of Lovers of Truth. Every one professed to be a lover of truth, but all did not acknowledge the supremacy of reason and conscience over all other powers. If they had possessed an organization, they might have done some good just now in connection with the election of the London School Board. He would contrive to get another meeting arranged for the consideration of the best means of combining their forces. The solitary advocate of the creed of the Theistic Union then fired off a parting shot, and the assembly dissolved. Strange to say, this sturdy supporter of the Creed principle intimated that he was not even prepared to say that he was a Rationalist; he would like to think over that even!

It would be comparatively easy to turn into ridicule the proceedings of the Society of Religious Rationalists at South Place Chapel last Wednesday night. Their efforts after unity seem as hopeless as an attempt to make a rope out of sand. But the unmistakable earnestness and the elevated sentiments of each and all of the speakers at that meeting deserve to be noted, as well as their anomalous theological position. For my part, I feel a sincere respect and a warm sympathy for them, and I cannot doubt that many of your readers will share these feelings with me. An account of the shape the controversy on Creeds has assumed at South Place, Finsbury, ought to prove interesting and instructive to those in Scotland who for several years past have been agitating the question whether the principle of Creeds is sound and expedient.

WARMING THE COCKLES OF THE HEART.

[By Miss Alcott.]

Sitting in a station the other day, I had a little sermon preached to me in the way I like; and I'll report it for your benefit, because it taught one of the beautiful lessons which we all should learn, and taught it in such a natural, simple way, that no one could forget it. It was a bleak, snowy day; the train was late; the ladies-room dark and smoky; and the dozen women, old and young, who sat waiting impatiently all looked cross, low-spirited, or stupid. I felt all three; and thought, as I looked around, that my fellow-beings were a very unamiable and uninteresting set.

Just then, a forlorn old woman, shaking with palsy, came in with a basket of little wares for sale, and went about mutely offering them to the sitters. Nobody bought anything, and the poor old soul stood blinking at the door a minute, as if reluctant to go out into the bitter storm again. She turned presently, and poked about the room, as if trying to find something; and then a pale lady in black, who lay as if asleep, on a sofa, opened her eyes, saw the old woman, and instantly asked, in a kind tone, "Have you lost anything, ma'am?"

"No, dear. I'm a-looking for the heatin'-place, to have a warm 'fore I goes out agin. My eyes is poor, and I don't seem to find the furnace nowhere."

"Here it is;" and the lady led her to the steam radiator, placed a chair, and showed her how to warm her feet.

"Well, now, ain't that nice?" said the old woman, spreading her ragged mittens to dry. "Thanky, dear; this is proper comfortable, ain't it? I'm most froze to-day, bein' lame and wimby; and not sellin' much makes me sort of down-hearted."

The lady smiled, went to the counter, bought a cup of tea and some sort of food, carried it herself to the old woman, and said, as respectfully and kindly as if the poor soul had been dressed in silk and fur, "Won't you have a cup of hot tea? It's very comforting such a day as this."

"Sakes alive! Do they give tea to this depot?" cried the old lady, in a tone of innocent surprise, that made a smile go round the room, touching the glumest face like a streak of sunshine. "Well, now, this is jest lovely," added the old lady, sipping away with a relish. "This does warm the cockles of my heart."

While she refreshed herself, telling her story meanwhile, the lady looked over the poor little wares in the basket, bought soap and pins, shoe-strings and tape, and cheered the old soul by paying well for them.

As I watched her doing this, I thought what a sweet face she had, though I'd considered her rather plain before. I felt dreadfully ashamed of myself, that I had grimly shaken my head when the basket was offered to me; and, as I saw a look of interest, sympathy, kindness, come into the dismal faces all round me, I did wish that that I had been the magician who had called it out. It was only a kind word and a friendly act; but somehow it brightened that dingy room wonderfully. It changed the faces of a dozen women; and, I think, touched a dozen hearts, for I saw many eyes follow the plain, pale lady, with sudden respect; and when the old woman, with many thanks, got up to go, several persons beckoned to her, and bought something, as if they wanted to repair their first negligence.

Old beggar-women are not romantic; neither are cups of tea, boot-lacings and colored soap; there were no gentlemen present to be impressed by the lady's kind act; so it wasn't done for effect, and no possible reward could be received for it, except the ungrammatical thanks of a ragged old woman. But that simple little charity was as good as a sermon to those who saw it; and I think each traveller went on her way, better for that half-hour in the dreary station. I can testify that one did; and nothing but the emptiness of her purse prevented her from "comforting the cockles of the heart" of every forlorn old woman she met for a week after.

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

[Our readers will, we are sure, enjoy the following eminently just tribute to Col. Higginson, which we copy from the Golden Age.—Ed.]

That news is "choicely good," as old Izaak Walton would say.

What news?

Why, that Col. Higginson is going to bring out this fall, in book form, some of his papers published within a few years in the Atlantic. The book is to be called "Atlantic Essays," and will contain "Americanism in Literature," "The Greek Goddesses," "Sappho," "Art in Literature," and so forth. To every man and woman who appreciates the best thought put into the best words, the appearance of these exquisite and stimulating compositions in a convenient shape will be a benefaction.

For myself, I sometimes get a little impatient at what seems to me the tardy and inadequate growth of Col. Higginson's reputation. For at least twenty years, he has been doing, quietly and industriously, some of the most genuine literary work that has been wrought in English within that time. A very few of his essays—"Saints and their Bodies" for one—have attracted general notice, and the fit audience, though few, have listened to him as to a master. But, to my great surprise and discontent, all have not yet learned to listen to him. His fame has not taken the world by storm. Dozens of writers—of greatly inferior quality—have risen into something like general renown, while this writer—so perfect in quality and form—has not yet received his "all-hail." But it will come! He can bide his time. His supreme recognition is delayed because he will not hasten it by any condescension to literary clap-trap. But what he is doing has the fibre to endure. I believe that he is one of the few literary men of our time who are already elected to represent us in the parliament of posterity.

To say nothing, at this moment, of the felicity of his style—of the grace, radiance, and agile movement of his sentences—there is pervading all that Higginson has written a certain wholesomeness of spirit that is just as precious in literature as it is in life. I do not remember in all his pages a solitary trace of what you could call a feverish, petty, or fretful thought. His words reveal the magnanimity of good health. His athletic culture has been a tonic to mind and emotion as well as to muscle.

Another great sign of merit and power in Higginson is that in him the ancient feud between aesthetics and utility, between the men of letters and the men of science, has been composed. He ends the unseemly strife by showing in his own culture that there need be no strife at all—that letters and science are, indeed, allies and friends.

The true man of letters, for our time and henceforward, must be, likewise, a true man of science. Literary art is to find its next employment in the interpretation of science; while science is to open to the literary artist a new world of analogies and illustrations.

The old symbols which poetry and prose have used for ages, are used up. Science supplies both with new and unbackneyed ones. When the people become as familiar with Nature as they should be, and as they will be, there will seem nothing far-fetched in an illustration of human nature such as this, which Higginson uses in "Malbone," in speaking of "Cousin Harry": "It seemed as if a sudden flash of anger went over him, like the flash that glides along the glutinous stem of the fraxinella, when you touch it with a candle; the next moment it had utterly vanished and was forgotten as if it had never been."

To judge of Higginson's training in literature—of the range of his acquaintance with books—run your eye over his "Out-Door Papers." In fact he writes nothing which does not reveal this. But to judge of his training in science, glance at those essays, in the volume just referred to, called "Water-Lilies," "The Life of Birds," "The Procession of the Flowers," and "Snow."

The value to the literary artist of this union of these two kinds of culture cannot be overstated. His description of Nature, of the sea, the clouds, the phases of the sky, and of the weather, which you find in his novel, have none of the vagueness so common among half-educated writers; they have the precise touch of the man of science, and the imaginativeness of the poet.

Harvard College proposes to give her degree of A. M. hereafter, only to those who pass an examination in studies equivalent to a one year's post-graduate course. Good! But if D.D. is conferred on a similar principle!—New Covenant.

John Chinaman being asked to take a drink said, "No, whisky make Chinaman one first-rate fool." The poor heathen Chinese!—Exchange.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"All this winter, in my present seclusion, I have been struggling with the desire to know for myself what 'faith' means and is. I am not easily satisfied, and nothing yet has reached consciousness. I do not expect a burst of light, but rather that it will be so gradual, so silent, so gentle, that I will never know when I exchanged one state of mind for another. God and immortality, these questions throb in the very air! Nothing but the real truth (no semblance) will satisfy the craving which we all feel. My mother prays for me to be 'converted' or reconverted, and thinks me doomed to be among the lost. All my life these influences have been around me. The incentive to 'keep in society' by connecting myself with one of the popular churches (Presbyterian) has been held up to me by a loving and idolized father; but if I seemed to yield for a little while, it all passed off, and the old scepticism that insisted upon going clear down to the very bottom of things haunted me, and got to be the despair of my family. And the voice deepens in my soul, and the call has come to me, 'search! search!' As you say, these things are no 'fancies'; if there are realities, if there be substance, this is it! And the nearest that I come to any definition of what 'faith' is, I think I can state in these words: consecration of character to the noblest and best there is in us, to real interest and real endeavor in the great work of humanity. And I, even I, weak and doubting, and so blind I can scarcely see a step before me—just a little glimmer here and there, just a faint knowledge of the universal call to human freedom,—why, it is painful to me to think I should do nothing for humanity. And so I am trying to think how I can work, what influences I can send out and upward, and how, by doing for others, I shall myself come into clearer light. O, how my heart thrills and quickens its pulsations at the thought of what is going to be revealed! And I do believe the spiritual world to be very near us; this is one of the seasons when its power is sweeping over men, and rending the material and gross, and refining it. I know that you do not believe at all in 'Spiritualism' (what an unfortunate name!); and were I a believer in the modern article, I should readily tell you. But I am not. I could give you my reasons why I am not, but they would fill a letter. All I can do is to wait, in the spirit of self-renunciation and calmness; that I desire. But I am determined to hold out firmly to the end; and hold fast to my convictions, if every friend deserts me. Worldly policy I never take into account."

"Let me not forget to say that your reply to Thos. McClintock in the February 4th number, giving your reasons for not affirming God in 'Modern Principles,' has given us great satisfaction. All I have seen express themselves as lovers of that respect which you manifest for 'universal man.'"

"I have used every effort in my power to get you some subscribers here, and shall continue to do so, but most of the people here and in this part of the country were intended for the dark ages, and how they were retained for this is a mystery."

"I have circulated THE INDEX among some of my friends, after reading it myself, and I find that it acts like a charm, they now can't get along without it. I can secure some new subscribers."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RECEIVED.

NATUERLICHE SCHOEFFUNGSGESCHICHTE. Gemeinverstaendliche wissenschaftliche Vortraege ueber die ENTWICKELUNGSLEHRE im Allgemeinen und diejenige von DARWIN, GORTHE, und LAMARCK im Besonderen, ueber die Anwendung derselben auf den Ursprung des Menschen und andere damit zusammenhaengende Grundfragen der Naturwissenschaft. Von Dr. ERNST HAECKEL, Professor an der Universitaet Jena. Zweite, verbesserte und vermehrte Auflage. Berlin. 1870. Verlag von GEORG REIMER. [Paper, pp. 6.8.]

THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION, showing the Operations, Expenditures, and Condition of the Institution for the year 1870. Washington: GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE. 1871. 8vo. pp. 423.

OLD AND NEW, for June, 1871. Published Monthly. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 143 Washington St. New York: AUGUST BRENTANO, 83 Union Square, Broadway.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW for June, 1871. Rev. JOHN H. MORISON, D. D., Editor. Boston LEONARD C. BOWLES, Proprietor, No. 3 Beacon St.

"HOW COMMON SENSE LOOKS AT IT," and "THE TWO THEOLOGICAL DEAD-LEVELS,"—two New Tracts by CHARLES K. WHIPPLE, 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

Poetry.

THE ONE RELIGION.

LAY-BROTHER.—You are a Christian, Nathan! Yes, by Heaven,

You are a Christian! Never was a better!

NATHAN.—What makes of me a Christian in your eyes,
Make you in mine a Jew. Happy for both!

LESSING'S "NATHAN THE WISE."

The Index.

JUNE 10, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for Single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, Toledo, Ohio. The following are among the Subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [Three Lectures.] 8. Lying Pretences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom, and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
For the INDEX Association.

TOLEDO, O., April, 1871.

Rev. Mr. Frothingham has just published his Boston lecture on the "Beliefs of the Unbelievers," as will be seen by our advertising columns. It glows with noble indignation at the calumnies heaped upon such men as Diderot, Voltaire, and Thomas Paine, and speaks strong words in their vindication. A gentleman just returned from the South informs us that Mr. Frothingham's influence is felt even in Louisiana and Texas. This lecture shows why.

Mr. B. F. Underwood has been lately lecturing in Washington, D. C., on the "Influence of Christianity upon Civilization." An abstract of this lecture in the Daily Chronicle of that city, for which we are indebted to Mr. Underwood, shows much careful study and independent thought. It is a cheerful sign of the times that the daily press dares to publish respectfully such fearless expressions of the most radical thought.

The editor of the Christian Radical, in reproducing our late article headed "Debts to God and Debts to Man," prefixes the following note, which shows that his "Christianity," though orthodox enough, is yet too "radical" to approve orthodox dishonesty in any shape:—

"We publish the following from THE INDEX. Spite of some of the unwarrantable deductions the editor draws from the letter he gives, his comments are timely and deserved. When will men learn that to wrong a brother is a sin against God? Paul says, 'Owe no man anything.' And John, the divinest interpreter of Jesus Christ, says:—'He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?' We would not give a farthing for the piety or Christianity of a man who steals from his neighbor to pay God or send the gospel to the heathen."

GOD AND FREEDOM.

The first two articles of our present issue, taken from a Scottish paper of last December, were kindly sent to us by Rev. Moncure D. Conway, of London. The second of them is especially interesting by its bearing on the question of the true basis for free religious organizations. No reader of THE INDEX needs to be assured that we heartily sympathize with the position taken by Mr. Conway against all creeds, even a theistic creed. This has been our own position for several years, and we have repeatedly advocated it in THE INDEX from the very start, as demanded alike by the logic and by the spirit of perfect freedom. Mr. Towne, in the February number of the Examiner, somewhat severely criticised it as involving unbrotherliness towards Keshub Chunder Sen; but the substance of this criticism was completely met by Col. Higginson in his "Credo" and "Crede," in THE INDEX No. 61.

This subject is one of profound importance to the future of religion; and it brings up at once the question—"Does religion necessarily involve a belief in God?" If it does, then a theistic creed is necessarily a condition of all religious organization and fellowship. If it does not, the way is open to a religious fellowship broad enough to include theists and atheists on terms of absolute equality. By refusing to have even a theistic creed, the London "Society of Religious Rationalists" have taken a stand far in advance of the Theistic Union which Mr. Conway would not join, and helped to give to the word religion substantially that broader, grander meaning which we tried to express in the first of our "Fifty Affirmations."

It cannot be said that our definition of religion as "the effort of man to perfect himself" is purely theoretical, when we thus find a company of "Religious Rationalists" practically planting themselves on it as the platform of their organization. This is only one more illustration of a principle which the Free Religious Association was formed expressly to embody—namely, religious fellowship on the basis of absolute freedom of thought. The conception of religion above given is the only one that can be harmonized with this principle. If this conception is erroneous—if there can be no religion without belief in God,—then the Constitution of the Free Religious Association, affirming pure religion and perfect freedom of thought in one breath, is a glaring self-contradiction. If thought is bound beforehand to arrive at theism, it cannot be free to arrive at atheism. But freedom, if affirmed, involves the possibility of arriving at either.

Here we enter upon the question of Intuition and Science. In the last INDEX, Mr. Spencer calls upon us, as others have done, for the "reason" of our private conviction of God's existence. With all the deference due to our friend, for whose able editorial contributions we are glad to acknowledge our great indebtedness, we must reply that this is not a question properly raised by the lecture he criticises. As we have already stated in THE INDEX, we must defer answering it in full till we can do so to our own satisfaction. Our lecture was confined to the question of METHOD in dealing with the problem of God's existence. We argued for the scientific, as opposed to the intuitional, method. If at the close we stated conclusions drawn from our own use of the scientific method, and omitted to state the processes of our reasoning, it was not because we had no reasons, but because we had no opportunity to explain them at the end of a lecture already too long. Suffice it to say that our private belief in God rests on no absolute affirmation of him by an intuitional faculty superior to reason, but on the verdict of reason itself, applied as scientifically as possible to the totality of the subjective and objective universe. If our science is at fault, or can be shown to be so, we stand ready to confess our mistake; but this is at present an irrelevant issue. No valuable result can be reached, until the question of method is first settled. Are we to answer this great problem of God's existence by science or by intuition?—that is the question. Whether we use science well or ill, is of no consequence, if intuition is to give the answer. What intuition says, or is thought to say, is of no consequence, if science is to give the answer. The tribunal must be agreed on, before the case can be heard.

Now this issue between science and intuition is really the old one between freedom and authority. Intuition decides the case by authority pure and simple—by naked affirmation of the point in dispute. Science accords a fair hearing to both sides, and will render judgment according to the weight of evidence. The fact is plain that human thought is divided on this great problem of God. Intuition takes him for granted, and thereby extinguishes thought; science doubts and inquires, and thereby kindles thought. Out of this doubt and inquiry the truth must emerge. Freedom of thought must be asserted, vindicated, and exercised, on this highest of all themes.

Free Religion, therefore, asserting the great principle of freedom in religion and religion in freedom, must adopt an idea of religion broad enough to cover all possible solutions of all possible questions; else it will sacrifice freedom of thought, after all. And it must accept, as its supreme appeal, science rather than intuition, for the self-same reason. There is no escaping the logic of these conclusions. The Free Religious Association, the London Society of Religious Rationalists, the Toledo Independent Society and all similar bodies, by their practical position take this ground. They all assume in point of fact the substantial truth of our first "Affirmation," and the substantial truth of the leading ideas of our Boston lecture. That is to say, the "Fifty Affirmations" and the lecture do but carry out to their logical conclusions the principles involved in the actual position of these organizations. In other words, these societies have all planted themselves on the ineradicable hostility of Free Religion to all creeds, even a theistic one.

He who fears to submit his belief in God to the test of the scientific use of reason, has but a feeble faith. If science can overthrow it, let it go. Since science is the knowledge of Nature, all beliefs that science cannot control are doomed to perish as supernatural or unnatural. Do those who would exempt the belief in God from the sway of science perceive this? What science once condemns is dead forever. Nature is the totality of all that is; and science is the knowledge of it. There is no room for a belief in God outside of science. Beware of teaching men that this belief can be unscientific or even non-scientific, unless you mean to banish it from the human mind. Science is most rapidly extending her empire; and do not hope that you can defend any inch of intellectual soil from her rule. The one foe that science relentlessly puts to death, wherever found, is creeds. Do not imagine she will spare the theistic or intuitional creed. She spares nothing that stops the free movement of human thought.

OUR CONTRIBUTORS.

An apology is due to our occasional contributors for the tedious delays in the appearance of their articles. We have already on hand a large number of communications which we should very gladly publish at once, were it not for the exceeding smallness of our room. It is becoming an invidious and disagreeable duty to select from among them such as shall have the precedence; and, our choice being necessarily guided in great measure by considerations which have nothing to do with intrinsic merit, we dare say some of our friends who favor us feel unappreciated or neglected. This is a painful predicament for an editor to be in, especially for one who wants to give everybody a fair and full hearing; and we are in danger of growing desperate under the circumstances. But we owe it to our contributors to say that they keep their dissatisfaction almost invariably to themselves, if they feel any. It is very seldom indeed that any one complains; and for this good-natured forbearance we tender them our heartiest thanks. Considering the usual experience of editors, we infer that our contributors are endowed with rare common sense (pardon the Hibernicism), and exercise a very generous indulgence towards us in the discharge of duties more difficult than any of them can fully comprehend.

We cannot in this connection help expressing our deep gratitude to our editorial contributors, whose great ability and unremunerated labors are winning for THE INDEX an honorable place among American journals. Despite the unpopularity of its cause, they are giving it a character which commands the respect even of those who least sympathize with its objects; and we could not without displeasing them give full utterance to our admiration of the matter they send. We should do violence to our own feelings not to return especial thanks to Mr. Potter for his unwearied, disinterested, and indispensable co-operation, without which we could never have secured such regularity in the publication of these editorial contributions. Refusing to be publicly recognized under the year's new arrangement otherwise than as one of our regular contributors, he still divides our editorial work with us, and with unfailing promptness sends us week by week a due amount of editorial matter for each issue. To him, and to the others who so kindly second our efforts to make THE INDEX worthy of the cause it works for, it would be repugnant that we should enlarge on this subject; but we can no longer quiet our conscience for not "confessing the faith that is in us." The safety-valve insists on its rights, and lets off a little steam.

We find it necessary to repeat our request not to remit money or send orders to us for books, &c., advertised in our columns. Send to the advertisers.

A SYMBOL.

The talk in New York art circles for some time past has been about Mr. William Page's Head of Christ, a most remarkable piece of painting, by general allowance, but a most disturbing apparition in the theological world, frightening the devout from their proprieties and suggesting profanity of speech to people who are in the habit of associating Jesus with the mood of prayer. I have listened curiously to the comments of the visitors who strolled by it or paused before it in the gallery, and to the criticisms ventured by ladies and gentlemen who made it the topic of discourse in the parlor. The remarks are as wild as the flight of disturbed pigeons. But the objection, at bottom, seems to be that Mr. Page has painted a man.

Yes, here it is. The artist, an eloquent and sincere Swedenborgian, has taken the churchmen at their word, and presented to them a solid piece of flesh and blood—no simulacrum or translucent mask of pallid pigment, such as the mediæval painters devised, wishing to portray a god simply made phenomenal by a material veil without substance, character or expression, the Christ of the Roman Catholic Sentimentalists, old or new—no lackadaisical, sweet, patient, pitiful, compassionate face, such as the humanitarians of France and Germany like to draw,—but a veritable man, a deity incarnate, with frame-work of bone, and layers of cartilage, glowing skin, eyes that dilate, search, and pierce, thick, strong nose, ripe lips full of passionate life, immense weight of head set on wide shoulders, and turned at the top of the vertebral column with a gesture of genuine human power. It is this bold assumption of the truth of the universal belief that has given offence. The pious people were not prepared for so literal an interpretation of the language of their creed. When they said it was ugly, which certainly it was not, though few vote it beautiful; that it was sensual, which it cannot fairly be called; that it was disagreeable, as none will call it except such as are occupied by some prepossession,—they simply meant that it was human, and that, in spite of their creed, the Christ of their adoration was not.

For myself, I am not a full convert to Mr. Page's picture. It seems to me needlessly flush and ruddy; the coloring is in parts crude; I cannot persuade myself that the set of the head on the shoulders is perfectly correct; and here as in other respects the opinion of professional artists goes with mine. But the popular dislike springs from none of these incidental defects, but rather from the radical mistake of making the Christ a real man. The dislike is a confession of unbelief. The picture tries the faith of the generation and finds it wanting in sincerity.

In some respects, it must be acknowledged, Mr. Page has done a fine service to art in emancipating it from conventional trammels in the treatment of one of its greatest subjects, if not its greatest. This picture marks a new era in artistic conception and expression, and henceforth artists will feel perfectly free to treat the personality of the divine man without regard to the laws of tradition. But a higher service has been rendered to religious thought by bringing Christians face to face with their own professions. The picture is human,—therefore it offends. Christians do not believe in the actual humanity of Christ.

Mr. Page believes in it, and also in his divinity. But the divinity does not have justice done to it. There is nothing in this head that simple humanity will not account for; nay, simple humanity will supplement it with qualities that transcend those here depicted. The humanitarians are no better satisfied with the painting than the Trinitarians are; which, again, hints at the truth that the Christ is a fancy. The historical Jesus is lost beyond recovery. The imaginary Christ cannot be acceptably described. We are left, therefore, with humanity as we are acquainted with it. No portrait of Jesus will satisfy more than a few. Let us be honest, then, and, instead of trying to reproduce a legend, let us try to understand men.

O. B. F.

RELIGIOUS SELFISHNESS.

The phrase "religious selfishness" may strike some minds as a very strange one,—paradoxical and self-contradictory. We expect religion to contend with the natural selfishness of man and to have a hard struggle in overcoming it; but to put the two terms together, to suppose that selfishness can ever exist in the very camp of religion itself as one of its trusted allies, to speak of any kind of selfishness as being "religious,"—this seems to demand explanation.

Yet the phrase very accurately expresses what appears as a prominent feature of religion historically considered, and a feature which we may see today in the popular developments of religious thought and method all around us. Selfishness is, in fact, the root of much that calls itself religion. It has fashioned theologies and forms of worship, as well as determined the flavor of personal piety. Religion is characterized quite generally by the bargaining spirit that was so naively manifested in old Jacob's vow,—that if Jehovah would give him bread to eat and raiment to put on and lead him home in safety, then Jehovah should be his God and should receive worship and honor. The popular piety keeps a sharp look-out for the quid pro quo.

Indeed, it would hardly be too much to say that the central and most animating impulse of Christianity, historically, has been its claim to give a definite and final answer to the question, "What shall I do to be saved?" And in the wake of this question there have been developed in the popular theology of Christendom some of the worst phases of religious selfishness that the world has ever known. The truth is that upon this question,—upon the selfish anxiety and prudence which it discloses, upon the mean animal instinct which takes hold of man in a time of danger and bids him look out for his own safety first,—turns the prevailing theology and worship of the Christian church. Religion is made to consist, not in forgetting one's self, not in losing one's self in grand ideas and noble doings, but in constantly remembering one's self by seeking to satisfy the selfish desire for personal security. "What shall I do to be saved?" is the primary question with which, it is alleged, the true religious believer must start—"I am saved," the certain assurance which he is instructed he must constantly feel after religion has done its perfect work in him. The one thought, the one question, the one concern, which the popular theology of the Christian church keeps ever in view and never ceases to impress on the human mind, is personal salvation. It pushes constantly in upon devotees the query, "Am I safe? What is the condition of my soul? What is to be my state hereafter?" I emphasize the pronouns so as to disclose the real fulcrum upon which the lever of this theology works. From first to last it presses not upon the generous, but upon the selfish, anxieties of the human heart.

This theological system, making central as it does the question, "What shall a man do to save his soul?" and then offering the sacrificial atonement—the suffering of an innocent being for the sins of the guilty—as the solution of the question, has indeed demoralized the religious sentiment of Christendom. It has introduced a spirit of selfishness everywhere. You hear it in discourse and prayer, you read it in hymns and religious books, you witness it in ritual, it shows itself especially in "conference meetings" and "revivals." The noble, unselfish life of Jesus is torn out of its natural human relationships with mankind, and transformed into a dogma to respond to this selfish concern about personal safety. The ME is made prominent everywhere in this grand scheme of salvation. It cannot help protruding itself even through the tender emotion of the favorite camp-meeting chorus, "O how I love Jesus, because he first loved me." Here is the same spirit that came out in Jacob's vow,—the prudential lobbying spirit; we will do well by Heaven if it will do well by us. This, surely, is not the finest fruit of religion. Nor can it express the highest type of regard for Jesus. Can we not love him for his beautiful character, for his heroic manhood, for his self-forgetful fidelity to God and man, though we should know that he never had any thought of us?

And to what monstrous climax does this religious selfishness come in the affirmation which has appeared more than once in the theological history of Christendom, that the happiness of the redeemed souls in Heaven is enhanced by their looking down upon the tortures of the damned! Is there anything in the possibilities of pious selfishness that can go beyond that? Compare it with the vow of the Chinese litany, where the worshipper pledges himself "never to seek nor accept private salvation for himself alone,—never to leave the world of labor and struggle till all souls are redeemed." This monstrosity of theological dogma is, it is true, so hideous that, to the credit of human nature, no sect is willing to father it, and we most gladly believe no church could be persuaded, at least at this day, to write it into its creed. Yet something quite similar to its spirit may be found. Said a young girl to her teacher in an orthodox Sunday School—one of those fresh, healthy natures in whom the religion of love and loyalty to home is stronger than sectarian dogmas—"I couldn't be happy in Heaven, if I should be converted and go there when I die, and my father and mother and brother and sisters shouldn't be converted and should go to eternal perdition." "O yes," replied the teacher, "you would be so wholly absorbed in the joys of Heaven that you would not think of your family and friends at all." This is, to be sure, an advance upon the old doctrine of Edwards and Emmons, since it substitutes forgetfulness of others' misery for a positive enjoyment of it, as one of the elements of the heavenly felici-

ty. But even with this improvement is it a very good religion to teach the young? Is it quite so good as that impulse of natural heroism which springs up in every healthy, manly soul, to throw one's self into any place of danger where a human being is in peril, utterly forgetful of personal safety? Is it a very high type of saintliness to become so entranced with the bliss of one's own salvation as to forget one's own father and mother? Give me rather the natural religion that spoke out in the young girl's protest against the theological crime that could abandon friends and kindred to perdition without a thought, and that is uttered in the pagan vow to share the outward fortunes of the sinning and suffering souls till they shall all be saved. The truest saints would find more joy in rescuing lost souls from the torments of hell than they could have by themselves in the seventh heaven with the remembrance of that perdition below them. So long as one is capable of a selfish enjoyment of any personal advantage, neither the purest saintliness nor the highest heaven has been reached.

W. J. P.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

A BOOK TO BE READ BY FREE RELIGIONISTS.

I do not remember to have seen in THE INDEX any notice of Dr. Furness' last book on Jesus. Having read it with great interest, I desire to call attention to it. The author has devoted many years to the study of his subject, and in all literature there is not a more interesting story than that of the loving, earnest and felicitous presentation, in several volumes, of the life and character of the great prophet of Judæa by this able and studious preacher. He has loved his study. He has rejoiced in companionship with Jesus. He has yearned to make the world see this great friend as he himself has seen him.

Years ago his work entitled "Jesus and His Biographers" brought me to the "foot of the cross." Do not be alarmed. That phrase only means, even with evangelicals who are educated, a passionate love for the spirit of Jesus and so for himself. And the fact ought to interest Free Religionists that a scholarly man, for Dr. Furness is one, can give up the dogma of miraculous birth, consent to doubt or rejection of physical resurrection, care little about claims of Messiahship, and yet love, honor, follow Jesus as the world's greatest spiritual leader.

I hope, therefore, the book will be widely read by the readers of THE INDEX. The knowledge of its contents will help make clear these propositions which are very important:—first, the gospels are only artless histories, colored by the ideas of their times and the convictions of their compilers; second, the subject of the narrative is a greater being than the reporters of his words and deeds could understand, just as Wendell Phillips is greater than a New York Herald reporter, or as Starr King was superior to his amanuensis. I am often indignant because literalists appear to me to be unjust to the great historical personage outlined in the Gospels. They judge him by Matthew's conception or by Luke's. They pick the "letter" to pieces, and do not see the great soul suggested by all the parts put together, and judged in the light of a cultivated historic sense, which ought to be shown by the students of today. Dr. Furness is the widely-seeing critic who wisely uses gospels, traditions, lives of other men and his own fine imagination, without which no one really sees the Past, and gives us a life of Jesus which deserves a reading and a study.

HENRY BLANCHARD.

JUSTICE TO ALL.

THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY,
ITHACA, N. Y., May 26, 1871.

MY DEAR INDEX:—Allow me two lines for setting you right. You recently published a portion of a letter about this institution which was shaded with injustice to another, which you would not have published but for your confidence in your friend. The expression used to describe Dr. Wilson is as inappropriate as could be found. The one thing which he is not and never will be supposed to be by any future investigator is "a fossil." His being an Episcopal clergyman has not changed the liberality which he and Theodore Parker cultivated at the Harvard Divinity School, nor does any one who knows the unhesitating boldness and free swing of his mind wonder at his having written for the Dial with Emerson and Margaret Fuller. There is none of your contributors more ready to investigate and less bound by theories or habits of thought. His contempt for the greater part of what is called metaphysics, his application of science to theological statement, his sympathy with and pleasure in other liberal men, should make those who know him more generous to those from whose opinions they differ. Those who do not know of him ought not to speak of him contemptuously. Had he been less fond of general culture, more content to devote himself to a specialty and to remain in one spot, he would have been more distinguished, more highly appreciated at large, and possibly might have excused the boldness of your correspondent's imagery. As it is, his desire for knowledge, his restless wish to make everything his own and to be at home in all departments of inquiry, have resulted in such a variety and breadth of culture that no subject will ever be beyond his sphere, nor too long established for his examination. A younger man than Dr. Wilson is rarely to be found; and when he is fossilized, we shall all be found deposited in the same formation.

That this protest may not seem to proceed from theological sympathy, I subscribe myself

Yours most cordially,

WILLIAM C. RUSSEL.

[The passage referred to is in the "Voices from the People," No. 72. The writer is personally unknown to us, nor did we even know the name of the gentleman incidentally alluded to. But we hasten to give place to the above communication, since nothing could be less our wish than to do the least injustice to any one. We believe that our correspondent, however, intended no reproach at all by the word "fossil," but only used it to express the lack of sympathy with radical ideas which is perhaps necessarily inherent in all forms of Episcopalianism.—Ed.]

"SCIENCE THE SAVIOR."

The distinguishing feature of modern thought is its reluctance to trust to the old modes of metaphysical reasoning, and its demand for more positive data upon which to build. The human mind, the nature of thought, the source of consciousness, have ever been fruitful themes for speculation from the earliest ages. The nature, origin, and destiny of the soul, have furnished the material for all religious speculations and philosophical systems. The ancient sages of India, the dreamy enthusiasts of China, the worshippers of Osiris, Mithras, and Zeus, all found this subject an inexhaustible fund from which they could derive their various theories of the purpose of life. The subject is still an absorbing one. Plato and Hegel, Locke and Cousin, Comte and Hamilton, have not spoken in vain; their works will ever be of value, not because they have discovered the nature of mind, or laid open its secret springs, but because we there discern the direct revelation of the power and genius of the human intellect.

And yet the world has grown weary of looking to them for practical results. They have failed because their investigations proceeded from an erroneous standpoint. The scientific attainment of the age is the direct result of a change of method in inquiry. Astronomy, Geology, Chemistry, and Biology are the results of pursuing the inductive method, of collecting facts first and generalizing afterward, of rising from the well-known to the less-known, of using facts, not as mere illustrations of the theory, but as the basis of the structure. The scientist never attempts to dive within and bring out the secrets of being by the simple power of reflection; but he asserts that a knowledge of Nature can only come through the study of Nature.

J. S. Mill, in his "System of Logic," says: "It must by no means be forgotten that the laws of mind may be derivative laws resulting from the laws of animal life; and their truth, therefore, may ultimately depend on physical conditions." Scientists are now engaged in pursuing this subject in this new manner. Maudsley affirms that mind, "instead of being, as assumed, a wondrous entity, the independent source of power and self-sufficient cause of causes, is proven incontestably by honest observation to be the most dependent of all the natural forces. It is the highest development of force, and to its existence are all the lower natural forces indispensably pre-requisite."

"The incessant vital changes which correlate thought do not differ in their nature," says Laycock, "from those which correlate growth, nutrition and development. . . . Life and mind are correlative in consciousness, and dependent, therefore, upon correlative causes. Knowing and Being have the same cause." Herbert Spencer asserts that all "those modes of the Unknowable which we call motion, heat, light, chemical affinity, &c., are alike transformable into each other, and into those modes of the Unknowable which we distinguish as sensation, emotion, thought; these, in their turn, being directly or indirectly retransformable into the original shapes. That no idea or feeling arises, save as a result of some physical force expended in producing it, is fast becoming a common-place of science."

Perhaps none has more beautifully expressed this doctrine than Professor Tyndall in these words: "The law of Conservation rigidly excludes both creation and annihilation. Waves may change to ripples, and ripples to waves; magnitude may be substituted for number, and number for magnitude; asteroids may aggregate to suns; suns may resolve themselves into floræ and faunæ, and floræ and faunæ melt into air; the flux of power is eternally the same, it rolls in music through the ages, and all terrestrial energies—the manifestations of life as well as the display of phenomena—are but its modulations."

Marshall, Hall, Carpenter, Bain, and others, have placed the study of mind upon an immovable scientific foundation that cannot be overthrown. What then are the "consequences?" Are they Materialism—Atheism? We do not so see them. The result of all scientific research is towards Unity. Man, world, sun, and star are found indissolubly linked together and formed from the same materials. But Science has taken a step onward. The assertion of Swedenborg that "there is one sole essence, one sole substance, and one sole form, from which are all essences, substances and forms that are created," is now authoritatively announced as the crowning discovery of the century. "Every form is force visible," says Prof. Huxley. Says Prof. Tyndall—"We only know matter through its forces."

No force is a mere attribute of matter. Force is eternal—the sole Reality. Everything around us results from the mode of action or manifestation of this One Force, the different forms of which we call phenomena. Draper says that any organism, of whatever grade, "is only a temporary form," and compares it to the flame of a lamp; and Coleridge compares forms to a "column of blue smoke from a cottage chimney in the breathless summer noon, or the steadfast-seeming cloud on the edge of a hill in the driving air-current."

The inevitable conclusion from these facts is that the essentiality of a body is not contained in the matter of which it is composed, but in something underlying all material existence. Thus Oersted, in his Soul in Nature, held that "the permanence and invariability of Nature are not found in its individual parts, which are all undergoing perpetual changes; but the invariable, that which perdures, is found only in the abstract nature of things." "Nothing is invariable in Nature but laws, which may be called the thoughts of Nature." Or, as Baden Powell has pertinently said, "All science is but the partial reflection in the reason of man of the great all-pervading reason of the universe, and thus the unity of science is the reflection of the unity in Nature, and of the unity of that supreme reason and intelligence which pervades and rules over Nature, and from whence all reason and all science are derived."

The substratum underlying all phenomenal existence is God, the Infinite "Being" of the Hegelians. Consequently, the higher the structure in the organic scale, the more perfect his manifestation, and the more God-like the instrument. Organic life and spiritual life flow contemporaneously from God; though so different in expression, they are identical in essence. God manifest in rock, tree, man physical, and man spiritual is still the same; but how varied the expression!

Science is continually approaching to the clearer demonstration of this great fact, the Unity of Nature in its most comprehensive sense. These beautiful lines are no less scientific than poetic:

"The works of God are fair for naught,
Unless our eyes, in seeing
See hidden in the thing the thought
That animates its being."

"So, since the universe began,
And till it shall be ended,
The soul of Nature, soul of Man,
And soul of God are blended."

And such will soon be the affirmation of all our scientific magnates, so inevitably does research tend in this direction; and when metaphysics shall have become obsolete, Science will unite with Intuition in the thought so beautifully expressed by Mrs. Corbin in one of her poems:

"The silver-threaded chords of being run
Down from God's throne,
Through the whole universe, from sun to sun,
From zone to zone;
And the same life in human bosoms thrills
Which guides the spheres, and clothes the verdant hills."

DYER D. LUM.

PORTLAND, ME., May 14, 1871.

THE DAWN AT HAND.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I have been reading the "Fifty Affirmations." I cannot pronounce upon many of them, because it is all very new to me; but when I come to the twenty-eighth, I am forced to respond. "Protestantism is a protest against authority." It is merely that, when analyzed. Protestantism is unworthy of itself, if its adherents, even in part, ignore its call for "freedom." If Protestants are to wear chains and stifle the liberties of free religion, why, it is Protestantism no longer! I rejoice with my whole heart, that THE INDEX can speak out what the common press dare not, will not speak.

It is glorious even to witness the beginnings of the new era. The great undertone of the ages is heard, when humanity lifts itself out of conformity, and is great enough to speak the truth!

This earth is fair enough; but the insincerity of creeds and formulas has cursed it; popish slavery has cursed it; untruth in all its phases has coiled itself around the "Tree of Life," and trailed its slimy folds through our would-be paradise. Whether or not the completed protest of Protestantism is to be the "extinction of faith in the Christian Confession," none can be so prophetic as fully to decide; but it matters little, provided every obstacle to truth is swept away, and every idol that has been set up perishes in the permanent and perfect. And who doubts that this age of "ideas" is the expansion of the old into the new? My own personal faith in humanity is heightened, since the races from ocean to ocean give evidence that truth is the real battle-cry and watchword of souls. And there are thousands sitting at the "gate Beautiful," watching for the "Messiah" who is to come. And the Healer shall be Truth.

CHARLOTTE G. BARBER.

THE ARGUMENT OF HUME, M'COSH, AND KANT.

THAT THE EXISTENCE OF A GOD CANNOT BE DEMONSTRATED.

NEW HARMONY, IND., April 10, 1871.

Hume, in what Huxley calls his immortal essays, declared that questions respecting "the origin of worlds, the situation of Nature from and to eternity, and the economy of the Intellectual System or region of Spirits, lie entirely beyond the reach of human capabilities;" and that in the discussion of such questions "men may long beat the air in their fruitless contests, and never arrive at any satisfactory conclusion." Similar declarations form the basis of what Dr. M'Cosh, in his Boston Lectures against Free Religion, called the New Philosophy, which he attributed to Comte, whose representatives he said are Mill, Spencer, and Bain, who all affirm that man can know nothing of the nature of things; that he can know merely phenomena or the relations of things, which things, in themselves, are really unknown; and that all that man can do is to generalize these relations into laws, the first cause of which it is useless to attempt to discover.

M'Cosh told the young men of Boston that his object was not to check, but to direct inquiry. In fighting "that giant which is defying the living God, and threatening to destroy all that is fair and lovely on our earth," they must not depend "on mere impulse or feelings, or on unexamined beliefs, for these will be powerless" in fighting such brave and able men as Mill, Spencer, and Bain. "Facts and solid arguments which can stand a rigid logic" must be used; though, he said, the young men will find how little facts and solid arguments can do in constructing a religion. "The Scriptures do not set about proving, they assume that there is a God, and claim to be revelations of his Will." By all means, he said, defend the doctrines of Natural Religion—"the works of God are a proof of his existence, and the moral law in the heart implies a lawgiver; but you will only be made to feel that what you know impels you to desire to know more." "Physical Science does not show that there is a God." Mental science "can tell of man's fears, aspirations, and struggles, but cannot tell how these feelings are to be gratified." Appeals to faith and intuition, he said, afford no certitude. "The sensationalism so characteristic of the Old Unitarian School," the "logical processes and definitions of reasoning," which formed "the cold rationalism of Channing," Parker's intuition of reason or consciousness of God; and the double-meaning, oracular utterances of Emerson, are, he says, examples of the fruitless and fleeting systems of Boston theology. Every one sees, says M'Cosh, how flickering a light the logical understanding and the reasoning process can throw on the grand problems of God and religion; and as to feelings and intuitions, when no two men agree in their feelings, and no one is certain whether they have intuition or not, what assurances can there be in appealing to feeling or intuition? (I quote from the Boston Advertiser of April 23, 1870.)

Now, if there is any force in M'Cosh's objections to intuitive knowledge of the existence of a God, they apply to the so-called Scriptures in which he finds the proof of a God. He says: "Channing stuck to the inspiration of Scripture, as I understand it;" but if Channing could not find Trinitarianism in the Scriptures, and if, as Dr. M'Cosh says, Channing could not find Unitarianism in the letter or spirit of the Bible, may we not say, as M'Cosh says, in relation to intuition, there is no arbiter to decide, and we may sympathize with Hume when he said: "If we take in hand any volume of Divinity or School Metaphysics, for instance, let us ask, Does it contain any abstract Reasonings concerning Quantity or Number? No. Does it contain any experimental Reasonings concerning Matters of Fact or Existence? No. Commit it, then, to the flames. For it can contain nothing but sophistry and illusion."

Huxley says that he is irritated periodically by its being stated that Comte is a representative of scientific thought at the present time; and by writers being labelled Comtists, in spite of their protests to the contrary, whose philosophy has Hume for its legitimate parent. Mill had to rub hard to get the label off; and Huxley says that he is interested in watching Spencer, who, like a good man struggling with adversity, is still engaged in the task, and ready to tear the skin away rather than let the label stick. Fearing that his turn to be labelled would come next, Huxley took the opportunity at Edinburgh, in his lecture "On the Physical Basis of Life," to incidentally revindicate Hume's property in the so-called New Philosophy, and at the same time to repudiate Comte. He there said it was enough to make David Hume turn in his grave, when two days before, within ear-shot of his house, an instructed audience listened without a murmur while an archbishop attributed Hume's most characteristic doctrines to Comte, in whose dreary and verbose pages, Huxley says, we miss the vigor of thought and clearness of style, of the most acute thinker of the eighteenth century, although that century produced Kant.

Dr. Hutchinson Stirling demurs to this exaltation of Hume over Kant, in a reply to Huxley's lecture, in a pamphlet, "As Regards Protoplasm." Stirling charges Hume with shaking, "in levity and mockery," those institutions which alone give value to human existence by bringing us into relation with the Deity; and he exalts Kant for reverentially refixing these relations in purity and truth. Stirling's estimate of Hume is unjust; Kant's estimate is very different and more true. Kant in his "Critique of pure Reason" said: "If we were to ask the dispassionate David Hume, a philosopher endowed, in a degree that few are, with a well balanced judgment—'What motive induced you to spend so much labor and thought in undermining the consoling and beneficial persuasion that Reason is capable of assuring us of the existence, and presenting us with a determinate conception of a Supreme Being?'—his answer would be: 'Nothing but the desire of teaching Reason to know its own powers better, and a dislike of the procedure by which Reason was compelled to support foregone conclusions, and prevented from confessing the internal weaknesses which Reason cannot but feel when it enters upon a rigid self-examination.'" I do not think that Kant would have written thus concerning Hume, if Hume had treated the matter of the existence of a God with "levity and mockery." (I quote Kant in Meiklejohn's translation.)

The succeeding paragraph in the "Critique" is interesting from its bearing on the doctrine of Free Religion, and on the propriety of omitting the word God from the declarations of all governmental institutions. Kant continues: "If, on the other hand, we were to ask Priestley, a philosopher who had no taste for transcendental speculation, but was entirely devoted to the principles of Empiricism, what his motives were for overturning those two main pillars of religion, the doctrines of the freedom of the will and the immortality of the soul (in his view the hope of a future life is but the expectation of the miracle of resurrection), this philosopher himself, a zealous and pious teacher of religion, could give no other answer than this: 'I acted in the interest of Reason, which always suffers when certain objects are explained and judged by a reference to other supposed laws than those of material Nature, the only laws we know in a determinate manner.'"

In reference to such cases as these of Hume and Priestley, Kant said: "The course to be pursued to provide against the danger which seems to menace the best interests of humanity is perfectly plain. Let each thinker pursue his own path; if he shows talent, Reason is always the gainer; for it is absurd to expect to be enlightened by Reason, and at the same time to prescribe to her what side of the question she must adopt." Kant could not consistently advocate any other course, for he had previously said two pages back: "Instead of hoping one day to see sufficient demonstrations of the two cardinal propositions of the pure reason, the existence of a Supreme Being and the immortality of the soul, I am certain that this will never be the case."

Respectfully,

JOHN CHAPPELLSMITH.

The great man is he who chooses the right with invincible resolution; who resists the sorest temptations from without and from within; who bears the heaviest burdens cheerfully; who is calmest in storms and most fearless under menace and frowns; and whose reliance on truth, on virtue, on God, is most unfaltering.—Channing.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively). Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESUB CHANDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Samaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN (LARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others). The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE,
RELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,
Forwarded free for twenty cents.
D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 684 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 78-98

SELL TREES. Nurserymen's and Dealer's Supplies. Price Lists, viz: No. 2. Nurserymen's; No. 3. Dealers'; No. 4. Local Canvassers'. Address W. F. HEIKES, Dayton, O. (Nursories established in 1822.) 73-77

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield Street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. TOWNE, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison St., Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

WANTED—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 88y1

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63 75. ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

A Few More Agents Wanted For THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

or Cincinnati, O.

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I. Worship; PART II. The Good Life; PART III. Prath. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68 DAVID G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place, New York.

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50.

64-73

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infidelity: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: - howing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.

Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.

"It Injures our Business": Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?
Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.
These four for 10 cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE, 43 Broadway St., Boston.

70tf

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts,
SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

A
Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,
FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

• $100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disquiet Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

O

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

O

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.

Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 22d, 1869.

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.
HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.
I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.
JOHN EUTERMARCK, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooiland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.

(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hooiland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hooiland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hooiland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1 50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7 50. Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere. 24—cowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octavo Melodeons (price $65.) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50.)

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12.)

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

LECKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols. 6.00

MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols. 5.00

EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols. 5.00

WEISS'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes. 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price. $2.00

LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price. 2.00

Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price. 2.00

Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price. 2.00

Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each. 2.00

On the Heights, AUERBACH. 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names, 50 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 50 Names, 25 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 25 Names, 15 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 10 Names, 5 Dollars in Greenbacks

For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,	1
What is Free Religion?	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,	7
Sunday Schools,	8
Friendship,	9
Grief and its Compensations,	11
The Hebrew Prophets,	12
Capital Punishment,	13
Human Ideals,	14
The Essence of Religion,	15
The Management of Children,	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),	17
The Candle of the Lord,	18
Public Opinion,	19
Conscience,	20
The Pedigree of Man,	21
"Following Christ,"	22
The Tongue,	23
The Golden Age,	24
What is Truth?	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,	27
The Sunday Question,	28
Motes and Beams,	29
The Dove's Departure,	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,	31
Religious Freedom,	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,	33
Noise,	34
The Humility of Free Religion,	35
Chaos and Cosmos,	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,	38
War and Free Religion,	39
Religious Revivals,	40
Mary and Martha,	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,	42
Success,	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,"	44
Spiritual Beauty,	45
The Book of Daniel,	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter,	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers,	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,	49
Parties and Party Spirit,	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,	52
Transient and Permanent,	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 24.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JUNE 17, 1871.

WHOLE No. 77.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to the INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

LOVE AND JUSTICE, OR THE CHRISTIAN AND RADICAL RULES OF LIFE.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, May 28, 1871.]

"The sentiment of justice is so natural, so universally acquired by all mankind, that it seems to me independent of all law, all party, all religion."

VOLTAIRE, quoted by Mr. Frothingham in his "Beliefs of the Unbelievers."

"A nobler religion is dawning on the world, which will unite the nations by free thought, not dogmatism, and will establish a more general good-will through justice than endless talk about Love can ever produce."

FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, On the Defective Morality of the New Testament, p. 33.

Love and Justice—that is the subject to which I would invite your attention this evening.

To many minds these words would suggest the ancient problem of Christianity, namely, how to reconcile the love and justice of God in his dealings with man. The conflict or clashing of these two attributes of the Supreme Being is the terrible question which in all ages has exercised the mind of every reflecting Christian; and the solution of it adopted by the early Church is the substance of Christian theology. On the one hand, receiving from the later Judaism the doctrine of total depravity, the Church has always taught that mankind lie under the wrath of God, justly incurred by Adam, not only for himself, but also for all his posterity; and that the infinite justice of God requires their condemnation to a hell of eternal torment, as the only possible satisfaction of his violated law. On the other hand, God's infinite love requires that mankind, being the creatures of his own hand and made in his own image, shall be all rescued from this frightful and miserable doom. Here, then, is apparently an irreconcilable conflict between God's infinite justice and his infinite love, the one demanding the universal damnation of the human race, the other demanding their universal salvation.

From this seemingly hopeless contradiction in the depths of the Divine Nature, this absolute clashing between the essential Divine attributes, Christianity professes to offer to the human mind a way of escape in its grand "scheme of redemption." By sending his own Son, co-equal and consubstantial with himself, to suffer an ignominious death upon the cross, to bear in his own person the punishment due to human sin, and to become the Sovereign and Savior of all who will consent to avail themselves of this salvation on the simple terms of faith in him and obedience to him, God is declared by the Church to have done all that is required by infinite justice and infinite love. His infinite justice is declared to be satisfied, because Christ himself suffers the penalty exacted by the broken law; and his infinite love is declared to be satisfied, because the benefit of this vicarious atonement is offered freely to all. Thus Christianity professes entirely to have solved the enigma, to have reconciled the Divine love and justice, and to have "vindicated the ways of God to man."

What should be said of this "scheme of redemption," regarded as an attempt to reconcile the clashing attributes of love and justice in the character of the Christian God?

A story is told of King Charles the Second (I will not vouch for its historic credibility) which will suggest an answer to this question. It is said that the king sent a communication to the Royal Society of London, inquiring the reason why a glass globe, filled with water and containing a live fish, weighs more than the same globe and water when the fish is dead. The philosophers were profoundly perplexed. They felt honored by the king's deference to their opinion, and devoted several months to the discussion of the problem. Various theories were propounded, but no one of them was universally accepted. At last, when the Society had become split into several parties which vehemently contended for as many different explanations of the anomalous phenomenon, it occurred to some one a little wiser than the rest to try the experiment for himself; and, to the intense mortification of the learned body, it was discovered that the globe had precisely the same weight whether the fish was alive or dead. The incorrigible royal joker had been poking fun at the philosophers. The whole discussion grew out of a false fact very foolishly taken for granted.

I am tempted to see in this apocryphal story a grotesque illustration of the equally profound problem which gave rise to Christian theology. It grew out of a false fact foolishly taken for granted—I mean the supposed fact of total depravity. Science has disproved the credibility of the first chapters of Genesis; and the story of Adam, fall and all, is a pricked bubble. With the disappearance of this idle tale from the pages of history, disappears also the entire underpinning of the Christian theology. The basis of the supposed conflict between the Divine attributes is pure myth. Together with the doctrine of Adam's fall vanish the doctrines of an everlasting hell and man's need of Christ's salvation from it. The laboriously built structure of orthodoxy collapses like a house of cards touched by the breeze.

But even admitting the false fact to be a true one, and conceding the absolute corruption of humanity, the Christian "scheme of redemption" would fail to reconcile infinite love and infinite justice. If all men deserve hell, this intrinsic ill-desert cannot be wiped out by any vicarious arrangement. Christ may be supposed to bear the penalty of man's sin; but he cannot assume this intrinsic ill-desert. He may be supposed to volunteer to take the punishment in place of guilty man; he cannot be supposed to take the inherent guilt of his offence. But justice requires that the guilty, not the innocent, shall pay the penalty; punishment belongs to him who deserves it. Thus the "scheme of redemption" fails utterly to satisfy the demands of infinite justice. Not less does it fail utterly to satisfy infinite love. This would require that all mankind should be actually saved from hell, not merely that all mankind should have a chance to be saved. If any are allowed to be damned at last, God's love is defeated to that extent, and ceases to be infinite or perfect. Still more so, if the vast majority of the race are damned. It is plain, therefore, that, if the doctrine of depravity were true, there would be no possibility of reconciling God's love and justice. Love would require the actual salvation of all mankind; justice would require the actual damnation of all mankind. The "scheme of redemption," consequently, which is offered as a reconciliation of these clashing attributes, is a miserable compromise which sacrifices both of them by saving part of mankind and damning the rest. By assuming the false fact of universal depravity, orthodoxy creates a contradiction which it cannot solve, and is itself devoured by its own offspring.

But there is little interest felt to-day by thoughtful people in these idle speculations of theology, whose teeth and claws, once red with blood, have long since been drawn by modern science. We feel too impatient with these antique absurdities even to listen to them; and perhaps I ought to apologize for having referred at all to issues so alien to the living thought of the times. But even an old dusty cob-web, seemingly deserted and adorned only with the dried-up carcases of flies long since sucked, sometimes harbors a concealed spider, all the fiercer for being half-starved; and so these old cob-webs of theology are haunted by a spider which still rushes forth to "gobble up" the incautious insects that allow themselves to get entangled in their meshes. It is therefore worth while now and then to go about with a broom and sweep out webs, spiders, and all.

It is chiefly, however, with reference to their human relations that I would speak to you to-night about love and justice. I borrow no trouble about their discord or concord in the Divine character. The unity and harmony of Nature's laws permit no suspicion that God is at war with himself; nor do I see any reason, in the universe as it appears to me, for any attempt to "vindicate" him in our human philosophy. Experience and reflection alike convince me that all goes well with him who lives well; and with him who lives ill, why should it not go ill? Vice and ignorance are the fruitful parents of misfortune; wisdom and virtue are the parents of happiness. Seeing in these the sufficient explanation of most human events, and knowing nothing of the veiled future, it seems to be ingenious self-torment to waste thought in solving enigmas we have ourselves invented. It is, therefore, only of love and justice regarded as rules of human life that I deem it important now to speak.

Taken in its highest and best aspect as an ethical system, Christianity is an attempt to base all human morality on the single principle of love. It is, as claimed by its adherents, emphatically a "religion of the heart." Its whole philosophy of life has grown out of the affections; for it does but put into intellectual shape and coherency the maxims of conduct which necessarily flow from the supremacy of the law of love. Jesus, as is well known, sums up all human duty as "love to God and love to man." Paul reiterates that "love is the fulfilling of the law." John even goes farther still, and, in the saying that "God is love," has uttered the very heart of Christianity by his bold identification of its supreme principle with God himself. The law of love is thus put forth by Christianity as its one grand rule of human life, including in itself all lesser rules, and, if obeyed, involving necessarily the complete discharge of all human obligations. In fact, Christianity aims at the establishment of a universal empire on earth and in heaven, of which love alone shall be the organic law. Setting the affections at the top of the scale in the hierarchy of the faculties, it measures the morality of all actions by the degree in which the heart has controlled them; and it teaches that, of all motives, none is perfect and complete but love. Love, then, is the supreme Christian rule of life.

Now I think no one can appreciate more highly than I the ethical grandeur of this Christian conception of a universe bound together with golden chains, blending human and Divine in a heaven whose throne is based on the passionate and adoring loyalty of love. I fully recognize the peculiar beauty of a religion of which this conception is the inspiration and life; and I would do full justice to the saints and heroes who have been nerved by it to almost superhuman sacrifices of self. Nevertheless, I believe that this conception is one-sided, inadequate to govern the modern world, and far from sufficient to produce the largest and finest types of individual character. The Christian rule of life alone would never create massive and masculine men, nor yet the noblest and best women; and still less could it preside over the evolution of a civilization like that of the nineteenth century. It is in spite of this rule, not in virtue of it, that the giants of humanity have now and then appeared among the saints of the Church; and it is in spite of this rule that modern man has pushed his way through the dense forests of barbarism and is now laying the foundations of a world-wide commonwealth. Let me mention five out of many different ways in which the Christian law of love fails as a practical rule of life.

1. Love, as a constant motive of human action, is too irregular and spasmodic. It varies in intensity, like every other emotion and affection: it fluctuates, oscillates, flows and ebbs, veers and shifts. It is a sentiment or feeling, and is but little under the control of the intellect or the will. Like the wind, it bloweth where it listeth. That this inherent variability of love manifests itself as well among the saints as among the sinners, is clear enough from the complaints of "coldness of heart," "insensibility," and so forth, which are so common in the confessions of the most highly venerated characters of Church history. Whoever depends solely upon the stimulus of love in the doing of duty will perhaps perform prodigies of valor while the fit lasts, and perhaps flee ignominiously from the field of battle when its enthusiasm is spent.

2. Love is not only subject to great and sudden fluctuations of intensity, which cannot be fully accounted for at any time, but it is also subject to a definite and gradual diminution in proportion to distance or want of knowledge. Being a sentiment which connects individual persons, it cannot be generalized without fundamentally changing its character. It weakens as it widens. It fades into mere benevolence, or a latent willingness to be of use. In this respect, it might be said that love obeys the laws of all radiant forces, which, exerting a certain energy at a certain distance, at twice the distance exert one-fourth the energy; at three times the distance, one-ninth the energy; at ten times the distance, one one-hundredth the energy. In short, it might be said that the laws of light and of love are the same, namely, that their intensities vary inversely as the squares of the distances. We cannot truly be said to love one whom we have not personally known in some way. The love of mankind in general is really a metaphorical use of language, and means more strictly benevolence. We really love individuals only, and but few individuals at that. Love radiates not very far, and weakens as it widens.

3. Love is essentially blind, partial, indiscriminating. Cupid was blind in the old mythology. Mere love, love unguided and uninstructed, is a dangerous thing. It as frequently injures as benefits its object. It is no guide to conduct at all, except as the blind lead the blind, tumbling into the ditch. It is a mere impulse or affection, and cannot itself be a guide, or furnish a rule, except in utter ignorance of whither it tends. Spoiled children, inflicting discomfort on all within their reach, and growing up with all their dangerous tendencies developing rank and unregulated, are the victims of their parents' love in most cases. The foolish indulgence of children is an illustration of the truth that uninstructed love hurts its objects, and, as a rule of life, leads only astray. The heart urges blindly forward; the head alone has the eyes.

4. Love is, as I have said, a sentiment between individual persons. It is limited by this fact to very few. It cannot embrace many without becoming transformed in character, and losing that tremendous power which, when intensified, it exerts. We cannot love all men, in any strict sense. A vague goodwill is the strongest sentiment we can cherish towards them. Hence the Christian morality, as if conscious of this fatal weakness in its fundamental law of love, condenses the love which it would fain awaken for all mankind into a great passion for the individual Jesus. It proscribes "abstractions," by which it means all far-reaching principles or universal ideas; and lights up a flame of personal attachment to Jesus as the supreme motive to the discharge of duty. All duty to mankind must thus be done out of love to the individual Jesus. This spirit Jesus seems constantly to have fostered; and it is the greatest blot on the beauty of his ethical instructions. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Men cannot love all persons equally; and if love is to be made the rule of life, they must love one person supremely. Thus the Christian ethics run necessarily into a mere love for Jesus, and endeavor to build up a system of universal obligations on a merely private relationship.

5. The chief defect of the Christian rule of life, however, is its nearly complete omission of the idea of justice. Love gives; justice pays. Charity, philanthropy, forgiveness, mercy, self-sacrifice,—all the virtues that directly or indirectly grow out of the sentiment of love, Christianity has abundantly illustrated in history; but the virtues that grow out of the idea of justice, are neither inculcated in the Christian Scriptures, nor exemplified in the history of the Christian Church, to any great extent. On this subject I wish to read to you a somewhat long extract from Prof. F. W. Newman's admirable little tract on the "Defective Morality of the New Testament."

"Still worse is its defectiveness on the most essential questions of private and family right. These did immediately and vitally affect the contemporaries of the apostles; yet such decisions as they have given are nothing but the seeds of pernicious error. The rights of man of woman seem hardly to be mentioned in the New Testament, though undoubtedly they ought to be implied, whenever the words Just, Justice, are used. Even then there is often an ambiguity; for the same word is indifferently rendered Just and Righteous, nay, and even admits of being rendered Merciful. (Thus when Joseph in Matt. I is called a just man, it means that he was unwilling to bear hard upon a guilty woman, not that he respected her rights; and it is well known to scholars that the word which in classical Greek means justice, in the Greek of the Septuagint may be rendered mercy, and even an alms.) Jesus forbids us to stand up for our rights; we are to surrender them to the first violent claimant. He might nevertheless have urged his disciples to stand up for the rights of others, but the topic nowhere appears; nor is any prominence given to justice (in its strict and limited sense) as a virtue of prime importance.

In the modern view, the moral state of society primarily depends upon Law being just, as to the rights of persons, rights of land, and rights of movable property. Of property something has already been said, and it suffices here to add that on that cardinal question, the just tenure of land, no word is dropped in the New Testament, although the whole Empire was a scene of essential injustice from the vast seizures of land by Roman avarice and violence. In fact, that public Law is of any importance to morality cannot be learned from the New Testament.

The most absolute and heartless violation of personal right is in the system of Slavery, which treats a man as a piece of property, robs him of everything, even of self, of wife, and of children, and subverts alike licentiousness, cruelty, and every form of crime. I do not admit the thought that any leading Christian teacher approved the institution. Nevertheless, they have left no protest against it, unless James V. 4, may be so understood; and as a fact, slaveholders have always found a great strength to their cause in the apostolic precepts to slaves, and in the absence of any suggestion to a Christian master that men and women cannot be chattels. "The time is short," argued they, "the Lord is at hand; art thou a slave?

care not for it; mayest thou be free? use it rather." But if the Lord was to return in three years, why was the Christian master to be unjust for those three years? Evidently the apostles cannot have discerned the essential injustice; they cannot have seen (what Homer saw) how hard is virtue to a slave, nor how unnatural is the relation of slave and master. They were blinded by the general mist of the moral atmosphere, or they must have given other precepts to masters. A teacher who understood the rights of men and women and the wrongs of slavery, would have laid down that manumission of slaves and repayment to them of the wages of which they had been defrauded in long years, with liberal interest, is a cardinal duty, is in fact a mere deed of common honesty; and that to sell a slave, or allow him to pass into the hands of another by inheritance, is equivalent to a crime. The omission is as deplorable as it has been pernicious.

The rights of children are set aside as summarily as the rights of citizens and of men. A despotic power is conceded to the parent; for children are commanded to obey in all things (Coloss. III, 20), and that without limitation of age.

Still more unreasonable is the precept to wives of unlimited submission. ("Wives, submit yourselves to your own husbands as unto the Lord." Ephes. V, 22. Peter adds they are to obey as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord, and that they are not to be afraid with any amazement. I Peter, III, 6.) As among early barbarians, so by the apostles an essential inferiority of grade is attributed to the whole female sex, and an appeal to early doctrines, texts, and legends is frankly made in proof. Adam, forsooth, was first created, then Eve: a decisive fact!

It is very strange that Christian advocates are fond of claiming high credit for the religion as having elevated woman; whereas its precepts clearly keep the whole sex down in the unjust depression in which that age found them. According to Paul, the man is the glory of God, but the woman is the glory of the man. The husband is the head of the wife, as Christ is the head of the Church. The two sexes are not co-ordinate. On this idea Milton formed his degrading idea of woman:

"He for God only; she for God in him."

A legend was at hand to justify the depression of woman. Eve ate the forbidden fruit before Adam; therefore she was cursed in child-bearing, and doomed to love her husband and be ruled over by him. (Gen. III, 16). On such a basis are we to rear our practical morality! The rights of woman of late obtain more and more attention, and will at last be won; but only against hard resistance from both Old and New Testament traditions."

This defect in the Christian rule of life on the side of justice is shown most strikingly, as Prof. Newman says, in the system of slavery, which in the United States was never protested against by the Church as a body until after it had become shattered in civil strife. There is a reason for this indifference, wholly independent of any supposed hypocrisy on the part of the Christians. The very genius of their religion was against the assertion of rights as such. The more sincerely they believed it, and the more completely they caught its spirit as taught in the New Testament, the less would they be moved to protest against slavery. Their duty was to submit to the "powers that be," to love their Savior with supreme love, and to do towards all men for his sake what he had commanded. But he nowhere commanded them either to claim rights, or to concede rights for justice's sake. Justice was unheeded by him, and has been unheeded ever since in the Church. It is only as the protesting spirit manifests itself in the Church that the idea of justice seems to exercise much influence. All Protestants have more or less caught it from extra-Christian sources; but that they are far less under its influence than under that of the old Christian rule, is instanced in the tenacity with which they defend so glaring an injustice as Bible-reading in the schools. They believe in the love-principle, which culminates and concentrates in the love of Jesus; and for the sake of propagating the love of Jesus through the use of the Bible, they are willing to trample on the plainest rights of other people. They are consistent enough; it is their principle that is bad. And this principle must give way to a better one.

To recapitulate, the Christian rule of life is the law of love alone as supreme motive and guide. Beautiful as it is, beautiful as are its fruits in some respects, it is yet an incomplete and misleading one in these five out of many points:—

1. Love is too variable and erratic a sentiment to furnish a rule of life.
2. It weakens as it widens, and loses its practical power if extended to all men.
3. It is blind, and itself needs guidance by the reason.
4. It can only be powerful when one man is loved as the representative of the race, and all other duties are discharged as acts of affection done to him.
5. It does not awaken the idea or the sentiment of justice, and thereby fails most gravely as a guide to human conduct.

Turning, then, to the Radical rule of life, I find that this is the simple law of justice. It does not by any means exclude the law of love, but reduces it to the rank of a subordinate principle. Love never yet has been a rule adequate to the right adjustment of relations even between individuals—still less between nations. Justice should rule supreme. The world's nominal worship of love as the supreme law is unconsciously insincere; men really worship either power, or expediency, or justice, according to their characters. The power of love is enormous in a narrow range; but it vanishes in all large relationships among men. Communities, states, nations, never love; they are governed by the ideas of force, self-interest, or justice. The Radical rule of life is the law of justice between man and man, between nation and nation. Let me state wherein it excels the law of love as a practical guide to conduct:—

1. Justice is not a vague sentiment like love, variable and fitful as the wind, but rather a clear and unchangeable moral idea, as fixed and plain in the mind that once conceives it as is a mountain-peak, and sure to create its own appropriate sentiment.

2. Justice is as strong a power over the mind in the case of utter strangers as in the case of the dearest friends. It does not, like love, weaken as it widens; but it acts impartially and equally in all analogous cases. The really just man is as earnest for justice to strangers, or even to enemies, as to his friends. It will govern his action as much in one case as in the other.

3. Justice cannot possibly run into devotion to an individual. It is a great principle or idea, and cannot attach itself by any possibility to a man or to a name. It governs by its own eternal right. It never heard of Jesus.

4. Justice is keen-eyed as an eagle to moral relations—blind as a bat to all personal pretensions. It involves the activity both of the moral and the intellectual nature; and its sublimity consists in its superiority to all selfish interests, all private loves, and all bribes or threats.

5. Justice has no quarrel with love, so long as love does not prompt to injustice. But there it asserts its own absolute supremacy, and vindicates the sanctity of the natural Law of Right against the claims of the Christian Law of Love, and every other usurping rule.

Justice, then, is the Radical rule of life; and asserts itself in human nature as the public law of all which should be privately obeyed by each. It involves the equality of all human beings, the sanctity of all human rights, the universality of freedom, the accountability of the individual to his own conscience and also to the public conscience; it assures private happiness and public prosperity; it transforms the blind devotion to persons into grand and ennobling devotion to principles.

Friends, if you would weigh a man in the balance, put first of all into the scales his love of justice. If that be light in weight from any cause, set him down as one of those whose possibilities may be sublime, but whose attainment is pitifully and deplorably small. But if his love of justice makes the opposite scale kick the beam, here is a man upon whom God himself must look with reverence. Show me one who, when he has the opportunity to do a wrong undetected, says in the solitude of his own soul—"Yes, I have my neighbor in my power; I can take advantage of him unknown to any; I can secure a fortune at his expense in a way that is legal and reputable; I can do this or that, and suffer no detriment in my name or fame; but it is unjust, and I won't!"—show me a man who thus in his own secret heart sets honor above profit, integrity above enjoyment, justice above every prize that tempts the cupidity of the crowd, and, be he what he may in outward estate and in worldly eyes, I cannot help it, friends, I worship in that man the eternal God. What crown so resplendent, what throne so august, what empire so magnificent, as the sublime mastery of a true man over his own soul! What grander temple of the infinite and indwelling God than a just and upright heart? If God is anything but a mockery and a dream, in that calm and inflexible spirit of justice, which obeys the law of right and truth though the very heavens should fall, he speaks to you and me the profoundest word that man can hear, and offers to our reverent eyes the living Bible of a humanity that makes itself divine.

SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

[From the Toledo Blade, May 31.]

MR. EDITOR:—At a meeting held last evening at the office of E. H. Fitch, for the purpose of organizing a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, Mr. C. C. Miller was appointed Chairman and E. H. Fitch, Secretary.

Mr. A. T. Stebbins, Rev. F. E. Abbot, E. H. Fitch, Rev. Henry M. Bacon, Col. L. T. Lytle and John Kaufmann were appointed a committee to draft a constitution and by-laws, after which the meeting adjourned to meet Monday, June 5th, at the same place, to perfect the organization. All interested are requested to be present. E. H. FITCH, Secretary.

A HUMANE WORK.

[From the Toledo Commercial, June 5.]

The announcement for the organization in Toledo of a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, has already been mentioned. A meeting of those interested in such action is called for this evening. The following act of the Ohio Legislature constitutes the basis of this movement, to wit:

AN ACT—To prevent cruelty to Animals.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That if any person shall overdrive, overload, torture, torment, deprive of necessary sustenance, or unnecessarily or cruelly beat, or needlessly mutilate or kill, or cause or procure to be overdriven, overloaded, tortured, tormented or deprived of necessary sustenance, or to be unnecessarily or cruelly beaten, or needlessly mutilated or killed, as aforesaid, any domestic animal, every such offender shall, for every such offence be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 2. Any person who shall impound, or cause to be impounded, in any pound or yard, for sale or slaughter, any domestic animal, shall supply the same during such confinement with a sufficient quantity of good and wholesome food and water, and in default thereof shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 3. In case any domestic animal shall be at any time impounded or yarded as aforesaid, and shall continue to be without necessary food and water for more than twenty-four successive hours, it shall be lawful for any person from time to time, and as often as it shall be necessary, to enter into and upon any pound or yard in which any such domestic animal shall be so confined, and to supply it with necessary food and water so long as it shall remain so confined. Such person shall not be liable to any action for such entry, and the reasonable cost for such food and water may be collected by him of the owner of such domestic animal, and the said domestic animal shall not be exempt from levy and sale upon the execution issued upon a judgment therefor.

Sec. 4. If any person shall carry, or cause to be carried in or upon any vehicle or otherwise, any domestic animal in a cruel or inhuman manner, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and whenever he shall be taken in custody therefor by any officer, such officer may take charge of such vehicle and its contents, and deposit the same in some safe place of custody; and any necessary expenses which may be incurred for taking charge of and keeping and sustaining the same, shall be a lien thereon, to be paid before the same can be lawfully recovered; and if the said expenses or any part thereof remain unpaid, they may be recovered by the person incurring the same, of the owner of said domestic animal in any action therefor; and it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation engaged in transporting live stock on railway trains, to detain such stock in cars for a longer continuous period than twenty-four hours without supplying the same with food and water.

Sec. 5. If any maimed, sick, infirm or disabled domestic animal shall be abandoned to die by any person in any public place, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and it shall be lawful for any magistrate or chief of police in this State, to appoint suitable persons to destroy such domestic animal if unfit for further use.

Sec. 6. Any person convicted of a violation of any of the provisions of this act, by any court of competent jurisdiction, shall forfeit and pay for every such offence, together with the cost of prosecution, a fine not less than five or more than fifty dollars, and said fines shall be paid into the common school fund.

Sec. 7. This act shall go into effect and be in force from and after its passage,

J. H. COCKERILL,

Speaker pro tem. of the House of Representatives.

J. C. LEE,

President of the Senate.

The provisions of this act are comprehensive and definite, reaching nearly every form of abuse of domestic animals so common, especially in cities and on transportation lines, and if efficiently enforced will do very much toward protecting useful and harmless dumb brutes.

Inasmuch as the objects sought to be protected by this law are chiefly depending for fair usage upon the cupidity or humanity of their owners, and as the fact of ownership is too often considered as warranting any treatment the owner may bestow, the result is that great delicacy is felt about interference in the matter. Because the brutal owner of a horse, for instance, beats his own property, and bears any pecuniary loss consequent therefrom, he holds, and his neighbors are too ready to concede, that no interference is called for. So common is this view, that it is very rarely that even the public authorities interpose to protect abused animals.

To meet the demand thus found to exist, the Legislatures of different States are making more definite provision for the protection of domestic animals, by the enactment of additional laws, and humane citizens are in very many sections forming voluntary organizations, with a view to the enforcement of the same. The city of New York has been the scene of many and earnest efforts in this direction, with which the name of Mr. Bergh has been honorably connected. Large amounts of money have been expended there in this service, and much larger sums pledged. It is stated that, from legacies and other sources, not less than $400,000 have been placed at the disposal of Mr. Bergh's society, the object of which is not only to restrain and punish abuse of animals, but in proper cases to furnish relief to suffering dumb brutes. We are glad to know that a similar movement is in progress in Toledo, where the observation of every citizen shows it to be much needed. Not a day passes, but cruelty in some form or other is shown among us, and it is time something was done to check the evil. This may be accomplished not only by the direct means of penal law, but indirectly by the development of a more correct and active public sentiment on the question. In fact, we think the latter the most effective means of the two, though both are indispensable. Public sentiment is sufficient in many cases, but the rigor of law is often necessary, and without that but partial success can be expected. We trust, then, that a goodly number of friends of humanity will be present at the meeting called for this evening, to the end that this most desirable and beneficent enterprise may have a proper inauguration.

PROTECTION TO ANIMALS.

[From the Toledo Blade, June 6.]

We are glad to learn that the effort to organize a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was entirely successful. At the adjourned meeting last evening a constitution was adopted and officers elected, as follows:

President—A. T. STEBBINS.

Vice Presidents—Col. L. T. LITTLE, JOHN P. JONES, EDWARD BISSELL, Dr. W. W. JONES, Rev. F. E. ABBOT.

Secretary—RALPH H. WAGGONER.

Treasurer—JOHN KAUFMANN.

Executive Committee—F. J. COLE, M. O. WAGGONER, EDWARD KNAPP.

The meeting was very judicious in selecting officers for the Society, and from our knowledge of the gentlemen named we are confident the organization will not only prove useful, but will be effective in correcting many of the evils which suggested its formation. The President, Mr. A. T. STEBBINS, will devote the necessary time to give efficiency to the Society, and those acquainted with him will not doubt that he will promptly, and with firmness and judgment, discharge the responsible duties imposed by his office, and in all his efforts he will be heartily seconded by his associate officers.

The following is the Constitution adopted by the Association:

ARTICLE 1. The object of this Association is to see that the law for the prevention of cruelty to animals is enforced, and it shall be called and known by the name of the "Toledo Association for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals."

ART. 2. The officers of the association shall consist of a President, five Vice Presidents, a Treasurer, Secretary and Executive Committee of three.

ART. 3. Officers of the association shall be elected annually on the first Monday in June, and all officers so elected shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified.

ART. 4. Meetings of the association may be called by the President, and in the absence of the President by either of the Vice Presidents; and seven members shall constitute a quorum to do business.

ART. 5. The members of the association may be assessed pro rata for expenses incurred, not to exceed in any one year the sum of one dollar.

ART. 6. All persons signing this constitution shall become members of this association.

ART. 7. This constitution may be changed by a two-thirds vote at any meeting.

A TOUCHSTONE FOR FALSE TEACHERS.

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

The central idea of true religion is the idea taught by Jesus of Nazareth; the love of God to man, suggesting and inciting a return of love from man to God. The Being who created the whole human race not only cares for its welfare as a whole, but earnestly desires the best good of every individual, without excepting the chief of sinners.

In this idea all sects agree, the orthodox sects just as much as others.

There is another doctrine in which all agree, namely, that God is unchangeable.

If, however, you proceed to what seems a reasonable and inevitable inference from these two doctrines, and affirm that God's love to man remains unchangeable, your orthodox friend will immediately interpose some conditions.

According to him, unless you do this, that, and the other, before the close of your mortal life, God will hate you as thoroughly as he now loves you, and will curse you throughout eternity as persistently as he now offers blessings.

If you ask—What then becomes of God's unchangeableness?—you will find your orthodox friend not inclined to talk about that.

He maintains doctrines opposite to each other, and mutually self-destructive, without caring for this opposition, or recognizing the fact that both cannot be true.

Do you ask how any man comes to take a position so unreasonable and unnatural? The creed he has chosen requires him to take it.

Do you ask again, why any man accepts such a self-contradictory and unreasonable creed? He accepts it for the same reason that he gives his purse to a highwayman.

"Your money or your life!"

"Believe or be damned!"

These two demands, made with emphasis and resolution, produce a strong impression upon the majority of men; and the latter is the substance of the demand made by the orthodox preacher, however quiet his manner of approach, and however gentle the terms in which he unfolds it.

Your mention of this belief as unreasonable shows how little you understand your orthodox friend's position. He neither requires reasonableness as his condition of faith, nor accepts unreasonableness as a valid objection to it.

His acceptance of God's love to man as a fact does not proceed at all from the considerations that it is natural, probable, honorable to God and beneficial to men, though he may use these illustratively to enforce belief in it. The efficient, decisive reason why he believes it is that somebody has so written it in "the Bible;" that is, in one or more of the books which have been brought together to make up "the Bible."

Again, his belief in damnation is not in the slightest degree shaken by its improbability, its unreasonableness, the dishonor to God and the ruin to man involved in such a theory. The efficient, decisive reason why he believes it is that somebody has so written it in "the Bible." He has agreed to accept every part of "the Bible" as sacred and certain, irrespective of any proof that such part is untrue, or of evil tendency, or destitute of any meaning altogether. If you show him that any portion of that book is in opposition to God's unquestionable works in Nature—or to man's experience in life now—or to man's past experience, recorded in history—or to the reason and conscience which God has undoubtedly given us as present guides—or even in direct opposition to some other portion of the same book—none of those things move him; he doesn't care for them. He sticks to his church theory, and really thinks it a duty to God to do so.

I began by defining the central idea of true religion. The central idea of the orthodox faith, on the contrary, is hell. The other points of that faith are dwelt on, in preaching and exhortation, mainly in their supposed relation to this central doctrine. The "plan of salvation" is a plan to deliver men from hell. The "atonement" is the means whereby men may be delivered from hell. Acceptance of atonement is the fact through which some men are delivered from hell. Jesus made the atonement to save men from hell. God sent Jesus to make the atonement to save men from hell. The Bible was dictated by God to make known to men the conditions on which they can escape hell. And the fact here illustrated is further shown by a vote taken in 1869, in General Convention of the Young Men's Christian Association of this country, declaring—"We hold those churches to be evangelical, which agree in accepting certain conditions there specified as the only method 'whereby we must be saved from everlasting punishment.'"

Here are five orthodox sects, the largest in the country, whose most active church members, united in the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called), combine, as above, to present hell as the centre of their plan of faith and works. They are joined to their idols. As they renounce reason in religious matters, it is useless to reason with them. They are likely to pass into the next stage of existence before getting any real light on the subject of religion. Our comfort in regard to them is that they will be there, as here, in the hands of a loving Father, who has resources, no doubt, for the enlightenment of even the dullest scholars.

But, as this sort of people fancy themselves eminently wise and good, and make it a point to dictate to others about the right course of faith and practice, it is well to understand how to answer them.

"Believe or be damned" is a formula common to various heathen systems, as well as to the five combined sects in this country who are trying to monopolize the name "Christian."

When a Mussulman threatens you with the hell of the Koran, unless you accept that book as an infallible rule—when a Hindu threatens you with the hell of the Shaster, unless you accept that as infallible—you are not only unterrified, but you feel in no doubt what to say to them; neither, before saying it, do you feel bound to hunt up evidence through hundreds of years about the Koran, nor through thousands of years about the Shaster.

You plant yourself on REASON and CONSCIENCE, two faculties which were certainly given by God to man as guides; and you say—as far as the contents of your books shall approve themselves to me as reasonable and just, so far I accept them. So far, however, as either book pretends God to have appointed an everlasting hell for any portion of his human children, so far it is a libel on God, plainly unworthy of belief, and needing to be purged from such a blasphemous falsehood before being given, for instruction, to any man, woman, or child.

Say just this to the parson or the exhorter who threatens you with hell on Biblical authority, or assumes the reality of hell in his conversation with you.

[Mr. Whipple has kindly sent us the above unpublished tract for insertion in THE INDEX. As a writer of tracts well calculated to reach all classes of minds by their clear, calm, powerful style, he has perhaps no equal among the liberals. We hope that our readers will send him large orders for his tracts, a list of which will be found among our advertisements. They are as pungent as they are logical, and are admirably adapted for gratuitous distribution; and their cheapness shows that Mr. Whipple is aiming only to do real service to the cause of liberal ideas.—ED.]

A vivacious Massachusetts woman stops in the midst of writing a novel (which she is trying to get down for the early fall) to speak to us as follows: "The 'Sheep-fold' article in last week's Golden Age struck me as particularly good. I have begun to believe that the most effectual work in battering down the old abominations of doctrine is done by those who stay in, rather than by the come-outers. Think of the things that Robertson dared to preach in an Episcopal pulpit, and of their incalculable influence over thousands who would have stopped their ears utterly, had he stood as a seceder." We feel the full force of our correspondent's suggestion. But then there are two sides to this come-outer-ism. Think what Wesley gained by coming out of, rather than staying in, the old-fashioned Church of England. Think of what William Lloyd Garrison gained by coming out of, rather than staying in, the ancient and conservative Whig party.—Golden Age.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

DONATIONS.—The INDEX Association gratefully acknowledges receipt of the following donations:
WILLARD TWITCHELL, Syracuse, N. Y. $ 2.00
O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City. 5.00
J. W. SCOTT, Toledo, O. 10.00

RECEIVED.

AMERICAN RELIGION. By JOHN WEISS. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS. 1871. 12mo., pp. 326.

THE BHAGVAT-GEETA; OR, DIALOGUES OF KRESHNA AND ARJOON, in eighteen Lectures, with Notes. Translated from the Original, in the Sanskrit, or ancient Language of the Brahmans, by CHARLES WILKINS, Senior Merchant in the Service of the Honorable the East India Company, on their Bengal Establishment. Chicago: RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE. S. S. JONES, Proprietor. 1871. 12mo. pp. 139. Price $1.25. [Reprint.]

SIXTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE ST. LOUIS PUBLIC SCHOOLS, for the year ending August 1, 1870. St. Louis, Mo: PLATE, ORLBAUSEN & Co., Printers and Binders. 1871. With an Appendix. pp. 201, cxx.

CATALOGUE OF THE HAMPTON NORMAL AND AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE, Hampton, Va., for the Academic Year 1870-1871. Incorporated by Special Act of the General Assembly of Virginia. Opened April, 1868. Boston: Press of T. R. MARVIN & SONS, 131 Congress St. 1871. pp. 26.

A LIST OF BOOKS Selected for the Use of Young Persons, and Intended also as a Guide in the Formation of Small Libraries. Boston: AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION. 1871. pp. 28.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]
FRIENDSHIP:

EPILOGUE TO A COLLEGE POEM.

Thus have I briefly sought in scanty verse
Some few and transient pleasures to rehearse;
Yet all these vary with the varying year,
And, though a moment ours, soon disappear.
One still remains, the noblest of them all,
That knows not Time nor owns his iron thrall;
And ere I lay aside the lyre divine,
One heart-felt strain shall rise at Friendship's holy shrine.

The river swiftly seeks the murmuring sea,
Where sinks and swells the ever-shifting tide;
The tiny waves that dance in antic glee,
Sparkling and eddying on its bosom wide,
Heed not their distant fate as on they ride,
Nor deem they lose for aye the smiling flowers
That bloom so wantonly on either side;
Chiding impetuously the lingering hours,
They hurry on in wild, tumultuous haste,
And mix and melt away in Ocean's watery waste.

Thus thoughtless Youth floats onward with the stream,
And lightly reck's of what he leaves behind;
Intent upon some fondly cherished dream,
The glowing future charms his eager mind,
Which not the present nor the past can bind:
Hopeful he presses towards the distant goal,
And still, by Passion's witching voice inclined,
His spirit high spurns Reason's mild control.
But Time unpitiful sweeps his hopes away,
And soon his airy domes lie mouldering in decay.

Yet though Ambition's golden dreams expire,
And gay Prosperity the wretch disdain,
O'erwhelmed by sorrow and misfortune dire,
The boisterous storm shall buffet him in vain;
Friendship shall heal his bleeding heart again,
And wipe the falling tear-drop from his eye,
Heighten each joy and soothe each restless pain,
Turning to cheerful smile the struggling sigh;
And though in error's wastes he wander wide,
To Virtue's paths once more his devious steps shall guide.

O Friendship, dear as life to souls sincere!
Though oft thou'rt deemed a phantom and a name,
False are the lips at thy delights that sneer,
And dare blaspheme thy heaven-descended flame.
How ill can earthly power and wealth and fame
Content the heart that feels itself alone!
Life is a sickening void, life's pleasures tame,
Unless o'er all thy glorious beams are thrown,
That make the blazing noon seem doubly bright,
And turn to full, broad day the blackest shades of night.

Unblest is he who has not felt thy power,
Who thrills not at the sacred name of friend,
Who ne'er has yearned in solitary hour
To share the highest boon that heaven can send—
A generous soul that with his own may blend.
I would not trust that spirit stern and dark,
For not to him may heavenly Hope descend;
Malice and Hate on him have set their mark,
And, when the clouds of death shall dim his eyes,
No faithful hand shall point to realms beyond the skies.

But, O how happy he, how doubly blest,
In whose true soul the fires of Friendship burn!
No earthly flames are they that warm his breast—
From Heaven they came, to Heaven they must return.
Together from grave Wisdom's page to learn,
To walk life's toilsome journey side by side,
Through joy and sorrow still to love, to yearn
And find those inmost yearnings satisfied—
Midst all earth's joys (and earth yields much of bliss)
Tell me, O man of self, what joy compares with this?

Let him who will the warmth of youth disdain,
And prate of hot romance and raptures fine;
To sing of Friendship's joys to him were vain;
The wise man never casts his pearls to swine,
Yet doth not therefore count them less divine.
Though blind men deem the heavens above are dark,
The sun's refulgent beams still brightly shine,
The pale moon kindles still her wonted spark,
And still the myriad glittering hosts of night
Confute the damning lie and flood the heavens with light.

Enough—the song is sung; I'll strike no more
With trembling hand the sweet, harmonious lyre;
The echoing chords shall slumber as before,
Till worthier bard shall to the task aspire,
Whose breast is warmed with true Promethean fire.
I scarce dare deem that sacred gift is mine—
Such glorious theme should loftier strains inspire,
And wake the strings to minstrelsy divine.
Yet though no master's hand the notes prolong,
Scorn not the faltering lay—my heart was in the song.

1857.

ASTERISK.

"Political freedom," says Dr. Holmes in his Phi Beta Kappa address on "Mechanism in Thought and Morals," "inevitably generates a new type of religious character." The Declaration of Independence was the death-warrant of Christianity as a dominant religion. "Liberal Christians" are building the gallows, and Time is the executioner.

The Index.

JUNE 17, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 73 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [Three Lectures.] 8. Lying Pretences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

TOLEDO, O., April, 1871. F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
For THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

"AMERICAN RELIGION."

The new volume by Mr. Weiss, just issued with this title by Roberts Brothers in Boston, and for sale in Toledo by H. S. Stebbins, is a characteristic product of the nineteenth century. Mr. Weiss is one of the very few radical preachers who have the power of electrifying a popular audience. Mood is all-important with him; but when this is propitious, he makes his hearers tingle. If in reading this book, into which he has put his best thought full-charged with passion for vital spiritual truth, we are conscious of any lack, it is because we remember the intensity of his delivery, and fail to receive immediately from the printed page that flashing spark which leaps from his own into his listener's mind as from a Leyden jar. But the electricity is here.

Every page scintillates and coruscates with brilliant rhetoric; and while the thought is not infrequently so subtle as to be obscure, his phrases are pregnant with meaning. Overpowering conviction of the sanctity of natural right glows in every sentence, and saturates his style with moral earnestness. The book will hardly be a popular one; yet it is all alive with the spirit that animates the American people. The pulse of the age throbs in it. But because the age is intellectually unconscious of the ideas by which it nevertheless lives day by day, it may fail to recognize itself in this faithful mirror. A passage from the fine chapter on "America's Debt" will illustrate what we mean:—

"The reason why so many moral battles have to be fought afresh, and the new causes of righteousness are slow to enlist their natural allies, is because the popular religion is so largely made up of recalling the nature of Jesus; holding, his words heaven-distant, at the tongue's end; clinging for justification to the garment stained with blood; trying to make a ladder of his cross. Men climb to the top of that, and are no nearer human rights and sanities than they were before. It is just high enough to give the churches an outlook over people's heads. They can 'see Jerusalem and Madagascar'; entranced, they cry hush to the pother that enslaving iniquities make beneath them. Lately these true believers remained perched up there so long, enjoying the beatific prospect, that half a million men got nailed to as many fresh crosses at the head of graves where slavery lies buried. Then they come down and vote it magnificent. But they are soon up again. It is a wasteful and slovenly kind of religion, this pulling at the skirts of a mediator. America has lost too much in that way already, and paid roundly in absence of mind.

Put it to common sense, then, if the proposition to emancipate America from this hectoring step-mother of tradition into the immediate liberty of the sons of God, be not a constructive one. It is so, if the mission of truth be to organize and save by the divineness of the instant and not of the memory. The book is not yet printed that provides for the emergencies of our future. There are hundred of books, reverend with age, that imply them, but nothing is so futile as implication. It can only be read clearly by such a fresh inspiration of duty and courage as makes the reading superfluous.

America is an opportunity to make a religion out of the sacredness of the individual."

A NOTE FROM MR. WASSON.

Just before going to press last week, we received the following communication from Mr. Wasson, to which we cheerfully give place below.

To the Editor of THE INDEX:—

Colonel Higginson's criticism of my statement, that the conception of the Christ is among the great products of religion what wheat is among cereals, is fair, and indeed unanswerable, upon his understanding of its purport. I was not indeed aware of having brought forward this analogy before, but, believing it to be no mere piece of rhetoric, but a veritable analogy, am inclined to think it none the worse for having been more than once suggested. It seems incredible, however, that I can have adduced it in opposition to the "sympathy of religions," since this would indicate in me a strange misunderstanding of my own statement. To say that the great historical religions compare as the various kinds of cereals is to assert, not merely their "sympathy," but their substantial identity. Does not Col. Higginson's mode of statement fall somewhat short of my own, instead of surpassing it? The latter, I am persuaded, will bear inspection on all sides. It says enough and not too much. Substantial identity without uniformity, and without exclusion of rank and degree,—is it not that which we see in the great religions of the world?

Now, my point was this. As one cannot compound the various cereals to make a new cereal, able to propagate itself, so is it quite impossible to make a composite universal religion endowed with seminal power. One may vary in the use of those we have, and often with profit. I myself like oatmeal for a change of diet, and am particularly fond of barley biscuit, made with cream, I believe, by some art and mystery of the kitchen in which I am not versed. So an occasional diet of Brahmanism, Buddhism, or the like, may refresh appetite and favor digestion. One relishes the staple articles of his table all the better after some departure from the accustomed course. Wheat bread never tastes so well as upon a return to it from some occasional substitute. Only I do not desire even upon the table any "universal" extract from all the cereals, as a substitute for any one of them in particular; still less do I desire it as seed to be sown and raised by that productive culture which belongs to the farmer rather than to the cook. It seems to me that some of my friends are thinking a little too much of the latter, and in their zeal for radical cookery are proposing to plant "Boston brown bread," with a hope to make it grow. When it does grow, there will indeed be a new thing in the world.

D. H. WASSON.

Boston, May 31, 1871.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The readers of THE INDEX, many of them at least, will doubtless be interested in a brief preliminary report of the fourth annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, while the pamphlet, containing a more complete account of the proceedings, is going through the press.

The meeting was held in Boston, on the 1st and 2d of June,—opening, as has been the custom, with a session for business in the Parker Fraternity Hall, on Thursday, June 1st. A change was made, however, by putting this session in the evening instead of the afternoon, and making it a meeting for addresses as well as for technical business. By this change a larger attendance and a more interesting and valuable meeting were secured. The existing Board of Officers was re-elected, with the exception of John T. Sargent in place of Francis Tiffany, the latter gentleman, on account of ill-health, intending to reside abroad for two or three years. The Treasurer's Report showed the gratifying fact that the receipts of the Association the past year were twice as much as they had been in any preceding year,—gratifying in spite of the other fact, that a considerable deficit was due to the Treasurer, the expenditures also having more than doubled. The increased expenditure was the result of increased work attempted by the Association,—the Western Conventions and the Sunday Lectures in Boston making the main items.

The Report of the Executive Committee read at this session showed that the year had been one of encouragement,—that the field of operations was widening and that the signs of the times indicated in various ways the progress of the movement which the Association represents. The Reading of the Report was followed by brief Addresses from Mr. Frothingham, the President, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, Rabbi Guinzburg, Col. Higginson, and others. Mr. Frothingham spoke of some of the principles of the Association, and of the practical difficulties in the way of such an organization. The Committee, doubtless, had made some mistakes, and might seem to be doing very little. Yet all the time solid progress was being made. They were feeling their way, not anxious to push their own views but to keep the organization utterly free to the impulse of the spirit out of which it had come. Mrs. Cheney dwelt upon the enlarging, liberalizing effects of that single idea,—the natural kinship and sympathy of Religions; and wished that something more might be done to bring the evidences of it before the popular mind. She alluded also to the value of such a free association and platform as this, as a safe channel for the natural utterance of sentiments which, if resisted and pent up by force, may ultimately burst forth in revolution and violence as in unhappy Paris to-day, but which, if allowed free expression and submitted to free investigation and culture, would pass into society as a harmless or even beneficent power. Rabbi Guinzburg, of the Hebrew Synagogue in Boston, spoke very pleasantly of the freedom which belongs to Judaism both historically and ideally, and gave the reason why he, a Jew, could yet join the Free Religious Association with all his heart and work with it most cordially. Mr. Higginson hoped that the plan of holding Conventions would be adopted again this year, and that one of them would be held in New York City. He thought the President of the Association had not fully appreciated the importance of having a Convention there. Mr. Powell, of New York, endorsed Mr. Higginson's remarks in this respect,—whereupon Mr. Frothingham explained on what conditions he thought a Convention in New York might be successfully held, and gave it as his opinion that these conditions might be met the coming year and a good convention be secured in that city. After the appointment of the usual Committees, the meeting adjourned at 10 p. m.

On Friday the Convention assembled in Tremont Temple. Ten o'clock was the hour for meeting; but as is usual the audience was slow in gathering (the trains from out of town not generally allowing their passengers to get to the Hall so early), and it was twenty minutes past ten before the meeting was called to order. The Hall from that time rapidly filled, and from 11 o'clock to the close of the session a very large and fine audience was present. After some preliminary remarks by the President, Mr. John Weiss read a paper on "The Attitude of Science toward Religion." This Essay was very brilliant and incisive; and, whether all would agree with it or not, evidently gave immense satisfaction to the audience. Mr. Weiss remarked at the outset that he had written about twice as much as he should read; but the Essay will be printed entire in the pamphlet Report of Proceedings. The subject of this Essay was the subject of consideration for the morning session; and addresses were made by Dr. Bartol, Rev. Henry Ierson, of England, Wm. H. Spencer and Thomas Wentworth Higginson. Differing in some particulars and presenting different phases of the topic, there was yet substantial agreement among all the addresses on the proposition that science and faith are not necessarily antagonistic, but may be reconciled,—that religion is to give a cordial recognition to science, accepting fearlessly her positive conclusions, and that science, to be broadly universal, must include the facts and phenomena of religion within its domain. The only defect in the discussion was that science was not represented by a professionally scientific man. But this was not the fault of the Committee of Arrangements, who made several efforts, unsuccessfully, to secure such a representative. The talk, however, was excellent, and the spirit of the meeting all that could be desired. Science did not lack for able defence, though none of her technical partisans were present to speak for her.

In the afternoon session the Convention was disappointed by not having the expected essay from Rabbi Wise, giving his view of Jesus. Dr. Wise had fully expected to be present, and was quite desirous to read this essay in Boston. But just before the meeting he announced that a Hebrew Conference would necessarily keep him in Cincinnati,—that he was, "nevertheless, heart and soul with the Association, with truth, progress, and enlightenment;" and in confirmation of this avowal he promised a check of fifty dollars for the Treasurer. (Let others go and do likewise). It is one of the functions of the Secretary of the Association to fill any gap that may occur in the programme of its meetings. So, in the absence of Dr. Wise, he was put in to "play the Jew" as nearly as he could. He read an Essay on "The Natural Origin of Christianity and its relation to preceding Religions." After this Essay, Mr. Frothingham, having heard Dr. Wise's address on Jesus, in New York, gave a clear abstract of its main points as he remembered them. The venerable Lucretia Mott, her very presence full of blessing, then made an address of considerable length, full of pleasant reminiscence and excellent practical suggestion. Remarks were also made by D. A. Wasson, J. L. Russell, Dean Clarke, and Rabbi Guinzburg.

The evening session was opened by an excellent paper from Mr. Frothingham on "Superstition and Dogmatism." It dealt hard blows at the idolatries of Christendom. Prof. Denton, the well-known and popular Spiritualist, followed, speaking especially of the idolatry of Bible-worship. J. Vila Blake bore testimony against the superstitious observance of Sunday, which robs so many people of the only hours when they have leisure for improving their minds with knowledge or their bodies with healthful recreation. Mr. A. M. Powell called attention to the fact that dogmatism and superstition, organized in the Church, are to-day, as they have always been, powerful obstructions in the way of philanthropy and reform. Samuel Longfellow was to have spoken on some other point of the general theme, but, as the hour was late, preferred to be excused. At ten o'clock the meeting adjourned sine die.

Thus ended the fourth Annual Meeting of the Association. As a whole the meeting, perhaps, was not equal to that of last year; yet it had more popular interest. Each of the Annual Conventions has had a distinct character and left a special impression. The Association is many-sided, many-tongued; and it will take many annual gatherings to present all its phases or to exhaust the topics with which it may legitimately deal. Yet every year it is planting itself more solidly in the community. Every year shows substantial gain. And when the results of this meeting are gathered, they will be found probably, even allowing for some disappointments, not inferior to those of preceding years.

W. J. P.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

And yet, not much in the Field. Last week, I had a good meeting in Milford, N. H., and am now attending the anniversaries in Boston. Only on Sunday can my lectures be of account, and the two last have been too literally Sun days to be endurable. Only the religious faith and zeal of those who believe in a more terribly torrid climate in the hereafter, are equal to much meeting-going with the mercury at 93 in the shade, as it has been much of the time for the last weeks. And so my meetings have not been numerically, however morally, great; nor very encouraging in results, so far as yet appears.

It is anniversary week in Boston, but not so as "in auld lang syne." Most of the so-called religious bodies are converting these ancient and honorable gatherings into a general good time, or a good time generally. The New York Herald called the occasion "Holy Week," years ago, when the meetings appeared to mean something serious. Now it is coming more and more to resemble the Carnival in Paris or Rome. The change will be rather for better than worse. The "Congregational Union" Festival is the best, if not about all there is left of the New York religious anniversaries that remains worth perpetuating, and its chief merit is in its hilarity and secularity.

The "Young Men's Christian Association" is the last effort of the popular church to perpetuate its power. Its closing, principal observance was kept last evening (Sunday) in Music Hall, although it kept itself pretty well before the public gaze during the week.

From the report made, it appeared that the disproportion between the prayer meetings and tract distributions on the one hand, and the number of persons actually assisted (sick or otherwise) is certainly a little remarkable. The prayer meetings were over one thousand; the tracts distributed two millions; the sick persons assisted were ten!

There had been six hundred applications for employment, and one hundred and forty-seven furnished. The reason given is that so few young men are "well-recommended." Too many are, I suppose, like what one of the subsequent speakers described. He was Rev. Mr. Talmadge, of New York. He said:—

"He trusted their intention was not merely to make resolutions, but to go forward to practical work, their object being to save young men and evangelize the city. A young man was not safe in any city without the grace of God; at least, none except those mean young men, who were so mean that Satan would not know what to do with them—young men who would dispute the realm of everlasting meanness with Satan; who wouldn't drink unless some one treated them; who wouldn't break the Sabbath unless some one paid the horse hire; in fact, too mean to go to perdition unless some one would pay the expenses. No Young Men's Christian Associations were needed to save such men, but they were wanted to gather in young men who were capable of being made better."

So it is the business of the Associations to call not sinners, but the righteous, to repentance.

A Mr. Nodder from England was among the speakers. He said:—

"Great caution was used in admitting to membership, lest some one should join who should disgrace the Association. Every member was expected to be a missionary, and to bring at least one soul to Christ. It was their custom to button-hole some young man and ask him in to take a cup of tea, which, with other simple refreshment, was always furnished without charge. Getting the young man there, efforts were made to get him interested; whole-souled men conversed with him, and this frequently led to conversion."

Such prudence as to "membership" should surely be exercised and commended, too, when such means are used to ensnare the simple.

"Will you walk into my parlor,
Said the spider to the fly?"

Spiders are great at "button-holing"; doing a good deal at it, and possibly sometimes getting "disgraced." But we read of one Christian organization wherein a twelfth part was "devil," without "disgracing" it. The "button-holing" process was not much used then and there; and enticing "tea," also, was omitted.

The Young Men's Christian Associations are the forlorn hope of the sectarian church, and should be met and exposed as mercilessly as their hypocrisy deserves.

The Labor Reformers certainly achieved, in point of numbers, a most eminent failure. Even the name of Wendell Phillips, almost a universal talisman in Boston, drew nearly nobody. Capital still holds labor in merciless grasp; nor does its deliverer seem yet to have arisen. Colored male suffrage will not be safe, nor will labor reform ever make much progress, until woman comes to possession of her right of ballot.

PARKER PILLSBURY.

Mr. Pillsbury will address the Twenty-Eighth Congregational Society of Boston (formerly Theodore Parker's, now Rev. J. Vila Blake's) on Sunday, June 25.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

A MAN-GOD.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I suppose I may be allowed to criticise a vestige of the idolatry of Christianity which the Free Thinkers have forgotten to leave behind them. As far as I know, all the writers, editorial or otherwise, in THE INDEX have adhered to the blasphemous idea of calling God a masculine being, which is a relic of barbarity. We may do so for the sake of convenience, but we ought to label the expression as such. I think we are indeed shallow Radicals if we copy the antique aristocracy of man over woman way up to our Deity. Not that I would make God a woman—I would not "make God" at all. Let us emancipate ourselves from the old phraseology as much as possible.

W. H. D.

[We believe in reform. What shall we do about it? Shall we say, "He," "She," or "It?"—Ed.]

PRAYER AND LAW.

CHICOPEE, MASS., May 30, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Will you allow me a few words with reference to some statements in an article in your issue of the 20th instant?

I have been for some months an interested reader of THE INDEX, enjoying the general candor and fearlessness of its discussions of the great questions of the day; but I must confess to being rather startled by the summary and somewhat ex cathedra manner in which you dispose of some of them in the article I allude to.

In the course of your notice of Miss Cobbe's new book, you say:—"Prayers of petition, impossible without the ignoring of law, are at all seasons unseasonable, even though the good sought be a spiritual good."

If this be truth, then the idea of an active, conscious sovereignty in the affairs of the world is exploded. So also the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man; and the question whether Wisdom and Will may not be superior to law, or, if you please, the active forces of Nature, is settled forever.

But does not the daily experience of the most ignorant man demonstrate that even his limited wisdom and will are to some extent superior to law, and does not that superiority increase in proportion as the intelligence and will-power of the individual increases? Shall we say that man is the possessor of all the wisdom and will-power of the universe?

These are to me very grave and weighty questions; and he is a bold man who claims to have solved them so that he may safely dogmatize thereon.

Again you say:—"Man gets what he takes—no more."

Admitting this, it settles several questions for the Spiritualists as well as others. For example, the idea of aid and sympathy from the Spirit-world is then absurd, and the thought that the mother's love for her child is undying and ever-active is purely fanciful; while the belief of many that each individual is a link in the chain that anchors all humanity to God is an extravagant conception. So also the testimonies of great and good men in all ages of the world, on these points.

Is it safe to set all this aside because we cannot understand it?

But the question arises—what does reason, or science, or philosophy, say to these questions? And this brings me to my greatest difficulty, to-wit, the disagreement of logicians, scientists, and philosophers on these matters.

One man hears a certain sound, and to him it is but a noise suggesting no definite thought. Another hears the same sound, and to him it is harmony, a strain of music, suggesting intelligence and design. To one the thought that prayers can affect the action of the Deity seems the height of unreason, and to another, the assertion that by standing on the shore of the ocean and dipping his hand into it one may change its whole level and bring it towards him, equally so. And this difference in men is not always the result of education or the lack of it, but of varied natural powers, so that what appears unreasonable or meaningless to one may be the very bread of life to another. Therefore I am led to the conclusion that in the domain of Religion and Theology, as in Astronomy, there is a question of "personal equation" to be decided, before we can fairly estimate the dictum of any one on these great questions.

Respectfully,

T. A. DENISON.

[If dissent should always be couched in language as courteous as the above, how little occasion there would be for quarrels!

Mr. Denison has drawn inferences from our language that we did not intend. It is the very supremacy of infinite wisdom in the universe that renders incredible to us the supposition of deviation from uniform law. The more intelligent and virtuous a man becomes, the more completely he governs his own actions by fixed principles. Given infinite intelligence and goodness, unchangeable and universal law necessarily results.

Has not our correspondent mistaken terse statement for dogmatizing? One cannot always indulge in verbose qualifications; but he should hardly be suspected of the dogmatic spirit, if he avowedly submits every word he utters to the test of reason. This we do.—Ed.]

THOMAS PAINE AND ELIAS HICKS.

SALEM, COLUMBIANA Co., O., }
May 14, 1871. }

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

My Dear Sir,—It afforded me a special gladness of heart to read the opening essay in the last issue (No. 72) of THE INDEX, and your editorial remarks concerning it. I wish the same could be read at the fireside of every home in this land, and lead to the study of Thomas Paine's Works by every American old enough to understand them. I believe America owes more to Thomas Paine for the success of the revolution than any other man that ever lived; and had he been content to let superstition, bigotry, and priestcraft go unexposed, his name would now be cherished by every household. He was a hundred years in advance of his age. It doesn't cost much now to be a liberal, but in his day it cost nearly everything. Tell a class of Sunday school scholars that Thomas Paine was a good man, that his life was characterized by unselfishness, love, sincerity, and purity, and who could describe their amazement?

The man who dares even to criticize priests or doubt their theology is ever after marked by them, and they spare no pains to injure him and falsify his character; and as they have held almost unlimited power over the minds of a very large proportion of the people, the fate of Thomas Paine's memory is so far not surprising. But, thanks to justice, his worth is every day becoming known farther and wider.

I suppose you are acquainted with the doctrines of faith preached by Elias Hicks; and if so, I would be thankful if you would explain what essential difference there is (if any) between the belief of himself and that of Thomas Paine on religion, as set forth in their writings.

Very truly, yours,
C. BONSALL.

[Will some one familiar with the writings both of Paine and Hicks comply with our correspondent's request? We have not the means of doing so.—Ed.]

THE RETRIBUTIONS OF PROVIDENCE.

Among the brief telegraphic items yesterday was the following:

"The Presbyterian Reformed Synod, at Philadelphia yesterday, adopted a resolution that the sufferings of France and Paris are retributions for the massacre of St. Bartholomew."

Astute conclusion! Irrefutable logic! Because the bigotry and cruelty of Catharine de' Medici led to the murder of thousands of innocent people, therefore, three hundred years after, the French are unsuccessful in a war with Prussia. Because in 1572 the streets of Paris were slippery with the blood of Frenchmen slain for their religion, therefore in 1871 it is obliged to capitulate to German ambition. Because superstition then brought untold suffering to France, it is retribution that she now loses a large part of her population, a part of her territory, and goes bowed to the ground with an immense war debt. Verily, only the "faith which could remove mountains" could bridge the gulf between these propositions. This is justice, this retribution! Retribution implies the giving back in kind; but what connection is there here save that there has been sinning and suffering? But whose sinning and whose suffering? It were vain to say to these theologians that the men who were implicated in the crime slept the sleep of death; that the men of to-day are as innocent as ourselves. Wherein is this idea of retribution more absurd than the Bible idea that we ourselves are all under a curse, because our first mother Eve disobeyed and ate the apple? Of course that decides the question. Let me add that, in my opinion, our late civil war was brought about by our neglecting to burn witches as our forefathers did; for, as Wesley truly says, "he who does not believe in witches does not believe in the Bible." I feel safe in making the assertion, because no one can ever prove the contrary; an argument which has been the chief safeguard of most theological dogmas, and ought to protect my modest assertion.

If it were not the Presbyterian Synod who made this declaration, one like myself of an unspiced mind might wonder how it was discovered that this particular event was the punishment for another three hundred years earlier, with which apparently it has no connection. The French have suffered much since then in wars, civil and foreign, religious (?) and profane, in tyranny, in insurrections, in revolutions, some of them springing directly from this massacre. Was none of these the necessary consequence of that folly and crime? Why wait three hundred years to punish? Why choose this particular time and occasion? A hundred questions and doubts rise to my mind. None but they who are in the councils of the Almighty could know or decide on points like these, which follow no chain of human reasoning. "Who hath known the mind of the Lord?" says Paul. At last we can answer—the Presbyterian Synod!

It will be useless for the worldly-minded to declare that these sufferings have come from the ignorance of the people, which made it possible for them to submit to the long corruption of Napoleon's reign, which unfits them for the responsibilities of freedom; and many other natural causes. The Synod would only quote to us the words of Luther in his reply to Zwingli (who had been trying to prove that Christ did not enter heaven with his human body), that his reasonings "were a devil's mask and grand-child of that old witch mistress Reason." Happy Presbyterian churches, which, for the small trouble of trampling under foot the "old witch Reason," can have an infallible Synod to guide you! Unhappy we who are not of the elect! Would that we might be of importance enough for some future theologians to point out to us why our sins have been honored with a special retribution: I can guess, and let them deny it if they can. Of course, "because we follow the old witch Reason," and are not converted to the Presbyterian Synod.

ELIZABETH PECKHAM.

SACRILEGE:—A CORRECTION.

GENESEO, N. Y., May 14, 1871.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Mr. Frothingham in his noble sermon published in THE INDEX (No. 67) under the title of "False and Genuine Sanctities" has naturally enough fallen into a misapprehension relative to certain laws of Great Britain, which I am sure he would gladly see corrected, and the correction of which, moreover, is due to the British Parliament. "The present English law of sacrilege," he says, "depends on a statute of George IV, which enacts that—'If any person shall break and enter any church or chapel, meeting-house, or place of divine worship, and steal any chattel, or who, having in such place stolen any chattel, shall break out of the same, every such offender, being convicted thereof, shall suffer death as a felon.'" Mr. Frothingham understands this to be a definition of "sacrilege," whereas the purpose of the enactment was to constitute the offence described burglary, by placing it on the same footing as if committed in a dwelling-house in the night time, when it constitutes burglary and subjects the offender to capital punishment. The crime of sacrilege no longer exists, eo nomine, under the laws of England. "The value of the article," Mr. Frothingham rightly says, "is of no consideration;" but he adds, "an article of ten times the value might be taken from a poor woman's shop, and a small fine would be punishment enough." This is a mistake. Simple larceny, whether from a church or a poor woman's shop, whatever may be the value of the article stolen (for the same act abolishes the old common law distinction of grand and petit larceny), subjects the offender to transportation for seven years, imprisonment not exceeding two years, and, if a male, to one, two, or three public whippings.

FULTON ON THE RAMPAGE.

TREMONT TEMPLE.—Rev. J. D. Fulton, D. D., will preach Sabbath morning, at 10½ and 3 o'clock. Subject in the morning—My Vote against Free Religion; or a Creed vs. Liberalism.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Observing the above among the notices of the Sunday services in the Boston papers to-day (Sunday, June 4th), I wended my way to Tremont Temple, much as I longed to turn my steps into Music Hall to listen to Rev. Robert Laird Collier "On the solving of certain problems."

Shall I give you a brief synopsis of the discourse? First, then, a prayer, the chief burden of which was—"God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, nor even as this pulpit" (free religionists).

Then followed the discourse, based on these words:—"I believed, therefore have I spoken." 2 Cor. 4, 13.

There was no attempt made to present or expose the errors (?) of the free religionists, and scarcely an allusion to them, except as the Reverend D. D. threw in an occasional misrepresentation or a sneering, would-be witticism. For instance, he stated that one of the speakers last week, on the very platform that he was then occupying, said "that he was willing to come from a monkey, in order to support the Darwinian theory against the truths of God and the Bible." The Boston Daily News, a religious paper of this city, reports thus: "John Weiss opposed Darwin's theory of the development of men from monkeys." All the Boston papers that I have seen reported the fact that the speakers denied the Darwinian theory; and yet this Rev. Doctor, in the face of these spoken and published facts, dared to-day, before a large congregation, to assert the contrary. So much for his veracity.

But the greatest attempt of the learned Doctor seemed to be to establish or defend his creed, and his righteous indignation oozed out towards the free religionists in no very gentle language, because they opposed creeds. "Why," he exclaimed with venomous ire, "a man without a creed is a man without a thought." He accused the infidels, as he called the free religionists, of being too small to hold a creed, and related a vulgar anecdote to prove the same.

He compared his creed to the bones of a man, to a skeleton, and affirmed that what a skeleton was to the man, so was a creed to religion. "O," said the Elder, "we must have faith in God, not in MAN." "Our creeds are weak because we make them so." Then he told a pitiable story of a man who was so disloyal to God and his creed that, when he (Fulton) told him that his brother had gone to hell, the man would not believe it. In his holy horror, with uplifted hands and eyes, Fulton exclaimed: "Well do I remember how his face lost its sunshine and his life its beauty," because he could not believe his brother was in hell, and because he denied his creed, his religion, Bible, and God, rather than believe his brother was walling in torment. "O," said he, we must take the entire Bible, and say—I believe it from Genesis to Revelation." "O," said he, "the free religionists want us to throw away what has been given us and think out a system for ourselves! We are in the midst of drifting currents of human thought. A creed will help you to meet this infidelity!"

He lamented that some of his own church-members, of whom better things he had hoped, were drifting about when they listened to these infidel doctrines. He accused the free religionists of having small heads, blind eyes, and little knowledge of God.

He closed this wonderful discourse by announcing that on next Sunday morning he should preach on the first chapter of Genesis, and clear the account of the creation from the charges the infidels had made against it.

Poor man! He hopes to bend science and fact to his idea of revelation; but, like many another would-be Christian philosopher, he will find that science is ever positive, and will not budge one inch to accommodate his creed, church, Bible, Jesus Christ, or God.

NOT A FREE RELIGIONIST.

A BAPTIST ON THE BIBLE.

MR. ABBOT:—

It would seem that the clergy are awake to the necessity of bolstering up their sinking dynasty. A Baptist divine of this place recently preached a Bible-in-schools sermon, taking strong ground against the exclusion of the sacred book from the schools. If falsehood and misrepresentation are of any weight, their cause is secure; for clerical skill in those arts has attained a perfection none can hope successfully to emulate. It is scarcely just to impugn any one's motives; but in this instance there is but one other alternative, and that is to make due allowance for an amount of ignorance and fanaticism next to impossible in such an age as this. The reverend gentleman argued that the Bible is the source of all morality, the fountain from which flows in living streams all our maxims of civil liberty,—the Declaration of Independence being but an elaboration of Bible precepts. He pointed out the real design of the opponents of Bible-reading, which, he says, is finally to expel from the schools religious, and to introduce into them infidel teachers. The consequences of adopting such an impious policy he portrayed with more than prophetic skill. Anarchy, the demoralization of society, the downfall of the government in the horrors of a French Revolution, were the mild results sure to overtake us. To pretend to discuss a grave question while dodging the real issue, to substitute the most delirious fancies for the arguments of an opponent, to make a show of reasoning only to indulge in the veriest baby-prattle, may be the tactics of clergymen; but they use arts which must inevitably fail to convince any one who reasons of the justice of their cause.

POLO, III.

EUCLID.

"PROTESTANT PERSECUTION."

The Boston Pilot—a Roman Catholic paper—says that complaint of the treatment which Dr. Doellinger and Rev. Mr. Cheney are receiving at the hands of their respective churches, for the breach of their solemn vows, comes with a bad grace from papers which support the "Young Men's Christian Association" in its recent assault on Mr. Hatch. "He," it says, "has broken no vows; but for merely distributing tracts before Tremont Temple, the leaders of the Y. M. C. A. assault him, and the Rev. gentleman, a Unitarian minister, has recourse to law." He asks for that protection of which Protestants so loudly boast: "He is not fleeing from 'Popish violence.' The lovers of religious liberty who hate every form of Christian persecution are now the pursuers, and this in an enlightened community and by Christian heroes of a free gospel. . . . Protestant persecution is nothing new in other countries; but here at the Hub, where the cream of Protestant liberty is scattered all round us, it is wicked for the leaders of the Christian Association to hamper the action of a fellow Protestant dispenser of a free gospel in a free city among a free people."

At an infant Sunday School the teacher gave the story of the "Prodigal Son." When he came to the place where the poor ragged son came to his former home, and he saw him "a great way off," he inquired what his father probably did? One of the smallest boys, with his fist clenched, said, "I dunno; I desay he set the dog on him."—Exchange.

A letter dropped into the New Bedford post-office, Friday, addressed to "Heavenly Father," is detained for non-payment of postage.—Banner of Light.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I have been thinking for a long time of writing to you to thank you for your excellent paper, and to tell you how much good it has done me. In my poverty and sorrow its weekly visits are like 'cold water to a thirsty soul.' The Church, of course, will never forgive me for my apostasy and is wreaking its vengeance on my devoted head—in the way of cold neglect when it can do nothing more. It is pretty well understood hereabouts that I stand with you 'squarely outside of Christianity,' but my former friends utterly fail to appreciate the sacrifice I have made for truth and conscience's sake. It is to the friends of Free Religion alone that I can look for sympathy and aid amidst the bigotry and superstition with which I am surrounded. I want to be recognized as an humble member of that noble band of reformers composing the 'Free Religious Association,' and should be very thankful to receive a fraternal letter from any of them at their earliest convenience. It seems to me that I have a greater burden than one heart is able to bear; and sometime I am almost driven to despair in view of the difficulties surrounding me. But I have the consolation of knowing that the best men and women of the age are with me in sentiment and effort. My great difficulty is to know how I shall support my large family, as I am left utterly destitute of material means. I have managed to struggle through the winter by teaching school and lecturing on science; but even here the church has opposed me all it could by keeping up the mad dog howl of Infidel. It seems as though, because I could not in conscience serve the cause of decaying superstition any longer, its infatuated dupes take it for granted I have no right to earn an honest living any other way. There are many here (by far the majority) that do not believe in the church, but seem afraid to commit themselves against it. They give me good and fair words, but very few dollars. I ask your pardon for troubling you with my private affairs, but I feel the need of sympathy from some one that can appreciate my condition. My time is out for THE INDEX, but I am unable to send you any money for the renewal of my subscription; and yet I do not know how I can do without it. Do as you think best about sending it any longer." [Sent.]

"I shall make it a rule to take all the subscribers I can get, from one dollar and upward. If I can't get two dollars, I take less, down to one, and make up the balance myself. I live among the Methodists; they watch me close; they do all they can to hinder the circulation of such books and papers as THE INDEX. I use every economy and good opportunity to introduce them. After the excitement subsides a little, I think some of them will reflect. One day I sent by the hand of one of my neighbors an INDEX to a man about fifteen miles off. The man says: 'Tell Mr. — that it was I who sent one to him.' He had sent up my name to THE INDEX, and I had sent up his name, so we both became subscribers. I had sent up several other names, but cannot say with what success."

"Inclosed you will find the sum of one dollar for another six months. I only wish it were fifty instead, and thereby could aid in some direct way the announcement of this broader generalization of truth to mankind. It gives me pleasure to express my profound sense of the great demand for such an organ. Nothing short of the like of this can vitalize our American life with the true religious element strictly belonging to our nationality, and carry it forward into the great future that is opening before us."

"I saw in a late number of the Golden Age an advertisement of THE INDEX, devoted to Free Religion. It is a subject I am now interested in, and I would like to subscribe for your paper, provided it is liberal and not bigoted in its treatment of theological subjects, and willing to accept truth though it may not agree with former times. If you think your paper would prove an aid to one who desires to see clearly, though it be not far, then send a sample copy for the enclosed five cents."

"A friend kindly loaned me a copy of THE INDEX, that I might read 'Battle-fields of Science.' I came from that battle-field with a recognition of my own experience in degree. There is a chord in my nature that answers to the touch of the spirit of THE INDEX. Please send me back numbers for present year and number me among your subscribers."

"I failed to receive No. 62 of your very valuable paper; and although I borrowed it of a neighbor to read, as I keep a file, you will please send it to me. I enjoy so much your free, independent, manly course, that I preserve your papers that I may have them to re-read, should you sometime stop publishing THE INDEX."

"I do not keep a single number of THE INDEX on hand, but send them all away to different friends as soon as they are read. I am glad to know that in this way I have secured several subscribers. Was not that a splendid article in the February Radical, by Conway, on 'The Human Sacrifices of Christendom?'"

"Doc." Simmons, the engineer who was killed on his train, had an intelligent reason for sticking to his engine. Perceiving that the train could not be checked in time to avoid a collision, he threw on the throttle, hoping to dash through the obstructions. Had he been able to do this, and had he leaped from the engine, the train would have sped on its way at a tremendous speed, without an engineer to control it. He therefore had reason for staying at his post, and he knowingly risked and lost his own life in the hope of saving the lives of his passengers. A grateful public, in appreciation of his heroism, has subscribed $350 for his widow. We forget precisely how much was subscribed the other day to erect a statue to Mr. Tweed.—Golden Age.

The celebrated physician Dumoulin was surrounded in his last moments by several doctors of Paris. "Gentlemen," said he, "do not regret me—I leave behind me three great physicians." On their pressing him to name them he briefly added, "Water, Exercise, and Diet," to the no small discomfiture of his disappointed brethren.

It is said that the reason why the Russian government is so slow in availing itself of the advantages of the Electric Telegraph is that they object to one of the important preliminary arrangements, namely,—the Elevation of the Poles.—Christian Register.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

M^R. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE,
BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,

Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.

D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

ABSTRACT OF COLENZO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENZO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

SELL TREES. Nurserymen's and Dealers' Supplies. Price Lists, viz.: No. 2, Nurserymen's; No. 3, Dealers'; No. 4, Local Canvasers'. Address W. F. HEIKES, Dayton, Ohio. (Nurseries established in 1822.) 73-77.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73-7

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73-1

A Few More Agents Wanted For
THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD,

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th Street, Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed). The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88-1

or Cincinnati, O.

CHEAP PAINTING.

100 lbs. of the PECORA COMPANY'S COLORED PAINT will paint as much as 200 lbs. of Lead, and wear longer. For circulars, send ten cents to S. BOWEN, Manager, No. 150 North 4th St., Phila., Pa.

COST LEAD.

or New York.

65-77

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINS, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on the "RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj;" also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLIER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAYER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WOOD & HOLBROOK'S PUBLICATIONS.

HERALD OF HEALTH.

Sixty Pages. $2.00 a Year. 20 Cts. a Number.

Three Months on Trial, Twenty-Five Cts.

$1 a Year to Clergymen, Teachers and Invalids who request it. New subscribers who send $2 for 1871 will be entitled to a book of 300 pages and 100 Engravings, entitled PHYSICAL PERFECTION, or Hints toward Human Beauty, showing how to acquire and retain Bodily Symmetry, Health and Vigor, and to avoid the infirmities and deformities of age, worth $1.50. The Scientific American says, "THE HERALD OF HEALTH contains more sensible articles than any monthly that comes to our sanctum."

Also—

PHYSICAL PERFECTION.—Containing Chapters on Structure of the Human Body; the Perfect Man and Woman; the Temperaments; Laws of Human Configuration; Embryology; Childhood; Effects of Mental Culture; Moral and Emotional Influences; Social Conditions and Occupations; Effects of Climate and Locality; Direct Physical Culture; Practical Hygiene; Womanhood; the Secret of Longevity; the Arts of Beauty; External Indications of Figure, etc., etc. Beautifully Illustrated with 100 Engravings, and handsomely bound. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This work has been through many editions, and has given great satisfaction to thousands. A copy is given free to subscribers to the HERALD OF HEALTH, who send $2 at once.

MINNESOTA AND ITS CLIMATE, as adapted to Consumptives, Invalids, and all who wish to make the State a Home. By Ledyard Bill, author of "A Winter in Florida." Price $1.25 post-paid, by mail.

This book, while a godsend to invalids and consumptives, will be found equally interesting to sportsmen and settlers, who would find a home in this far-famed State. It contains a beautiful view of Minnehaha Falls, and also chapters on the climate of all those places which are most desirable as resorts for invalids, including Florida, Nassau, the Adirondacks, California, San Diego, Fayal, etc., etc.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL, AND PHYSICAL CULTURE; OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRUE LIVING. By Professor F. G. Welch, Superintendent in Yale College. It contains over 400 pages, and is beautifully bound. Price, by mail, $2.25.

This book is the most perfect Encyclopedia of Gymnastic exercises of the most approved method known. It tells in plain language how to do everything, from the building of a gymnasium and choosing apparatus to doing the exercises. The series of exercises with the Indian clubs alone, is the best ever published. Those who want a good work on gymnastic culture should not fail to get this one. Dr. Dio Lewis says, "This is an admirable guide to physical culture."

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS.—Hints on Getting Well and Keeping Well. By Mrs. E. B. Gleason, M. D.

Woman agents wanted everywhere. Thousands are being sold. Full contents and terms of agency sent on application. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This book is designed mainly for women of all ages. It treats principally on the diseases of women, and includes chapters on Child-Bearing and the Care of Children. Harper's Magazine, in reviewing the work, says:

"Mrs. Gleason is able to say something to wives and to mothers which no man could say. There can be no difference of opinion about the value of the practical suggestions she affords, which are characterized by sound philosophy and clear, good sterling common sense. We wish the chapter, 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract, and sent to every mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sayles, after reading it, says: "I would rather have written that book than have been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

No woman can read it without being made wiser and better, and without being better qualified for all the duties of life.

For any or all of the above works, address,
WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
67cows1 13 & 15 Lighthouse St., New York.

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE - - - $1.50.

64-78

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).

I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?

The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.

The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.

God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.

Infidelity: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.

Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.

Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.

Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.

What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.

Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.

Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.

The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.

Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.

Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.

"It Injures Our Business?" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?

Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.

These four for 10 cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
70tf 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is TWO DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

Lecky's History of European Morals, 2 vols.....$6.00

Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols.....5.00

Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols.....5.00

Weiss's Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, 2 volumes.....6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870 (price $2.50). Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

Darwin's Origin of Species, price.....$2.00

Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price.....2.00

Essays in Criticism, by Matthew Arnold, price.....2.00

Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, with portrait, price.....2.00

Any volume of the writings of Theodore Parker or Henry D. Thoreau, each.....2.00

On the Heights, Auerbach.....2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.

For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.

For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.

For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.

For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
LOCK BOX 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones.....	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions.....	5
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. R. S. D.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	38
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	48
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Fickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation—A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 25.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JUNE 24, 1871.

WHOLE No. 78.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

HOME.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, June 4, 1871.]

There is no sweeter word in the English language than that little word home. It is big with meaning. It is sacred with the tenderest associations. It is powerful with appeals to the best and deepest in our human nature. To the absentee and the exile the sound of it is a spell that abolishes time and space, and makes the whole surrounding world dissolve like mist to make room for the pictured scenes of imagination. Like the famous "runz des vaches," whose strains recall to the banished Switzer his native mountains, their flocks and herds and happy cottages, with such resistless power that the pride of manhood breaks down in a flood of tears, the little word home breathes a music that moves all hearts. It makes the tired workman spring to his task with fresh-born industry; it makes the tempted man shrink back in horror from the crime that beckons him; it makes the patriot rush to battle with a courage that despises death. When Christine Nilsson sang here last winter, the people clapped and applauded every piece with admiration; but when she sang "The Old Folks at Home" and "Home, Sweet Home," and threw into that last word all the sweetness of her voice and all the tenderness of her heart, a great wave of feeling rolled over the crowd, and all but the thoughtless and the shallow forgot to applaud.

To some, the word home symbolizes a dead past, into whose grave has gone down together all the glory and the joy of life,—a beautiful memory that grows more and more divine as it recedes farther and farther from the hard, cold, empty present. There is no grief so bitter as that of having had a true home and lost it. Life never duplicates itself. We taste the supreme happiness, like the supreme misery, but once. To the brave and faithful spirit, it is true, little way-side flowers spring up along the rockiest and steepest path; a solid, calm content is born of incorruptible integrity and unselfish devotion to noble ends, which indeed is better and far more sure than any happiness that depends on what fortune can give or take away. But when a divine home is broken up,—when the gift that is but once given slips out of despairing hands, and the whole framework of a life is shattered into irreparable ruin,—there is no second advent to the beauty that is gone. The grandest life is thenceforward fragmentary and broken. This is the tragic side of human existence which no optimism can reverse. The great and terrible wound, if it kills not, will heal with the lapse of years; but the great scar, hidden never so proudly or so shrinkingly from curious eyes, remains to the end. When I see a blow like this fall on a defenceless human heart, and know that the sun of human happiness has gone down at noon, my very soul cries out for immortality.

You know I do not dogmatize—you know I count it ill-befitting a great spirit to quarrel with Nature's laws, be they what they may. But in our utter inability to pierce the veil that hides the future, I hold it not presumptuous to expect noble things of this noble universe we dwell in. Sooner or later every human career becomes tragic. But is it worthy of Nature or worthy of God (I care not what name is chosen to hide our ignorance) that human life shall be forever a tragedy? These homes of ours are frail as the shells that enclose the embryo bird; shall the great affections of the human soul perish unfledged? Shall nothing at last emerge with wings? Remind me of my ignorance as much as you will; this I confess, for truth demands it. But expect me not to take delight in drawing from my own ignorance auguries that dishonor the absolute wisdom patent on every page of Nature's book. No! If instructed at last that this life is all, it concerns my self-respect that I accept with fortitude the inevitable fate. But until thus instructed beyond a doubt, it concerns my self-respect not to cherish the conceit that my human hope can be more magnificent than Nature's infinite possibilities—not to fancy that my imagination can conceive a sublimer denouement to the drama of human existence than Nature with her boundless and unsuspected resources can evolve in limitless time. I can understand full well how a great-souled man may unflinchingly but sadly acquiesce in what seems to him the disproof of immortality; but I cannot conceive how a great-souled man can exult in it. To be intelligent is a magnificent privilege, is it not? Then to lose intelligence is to be degraded from a high function in the universe. Let it be far from us to rejoice at the thought of our own possible degradation!

When, therefore, I see a beautiful home shattered like a costly vase, whose very fragments are still fragrant with the divine perfume of the flowers it held,—when the spectacle of life's drama ends with crushed and bleeding hearts,—I am impelled by the very artistic instinct within, if by no deeper stirring, to hope that this is but the ending of a scene, not the ending of the play. Life cannot be a tragedy at the last, unless the actors are nobler than the Author. The final outcome of spiritual being—shall it be death? The utter pathos of these separations, wringing tears from everything but stones,—can this be the closing strain in the grand oratorio of divine devotion and a love that triumphs over all? Can it be that the music of the stars is thus set to the minor key? Be it that the word home has become a mere memory of the past, inwrought with deathless pain and longing and outstretching after beloved arms; yet if it shifts and changes under the soothing touch of Time into a still diviner hope of the future, a cheerful vision of re-united loves and bliss made a thousand-fold more sacred by long intervals of solitary grieving,—who shall venture to cry "Nay!" Until the vast mystery of death has been utterly unsealed, it is sciolism, not science, that steps briskly forward with negations incapable of proof.

But not to all, by any means, has this word home become a monument of the dead. Others, freshly entering upon life, and still lingering in a shelter towards which they have not yet learned to look back with unavailing tears, peer into the future with beating hearts, and dream beautiful dreams of a home of their own yet to be. Who can help feeling a kindly sympathy in these bright visions of youth? Who would croak like a raven to suggest dismal forebodings and chill the warm young blood? Not all such dreams are vain. There are true and happy homes, perhaps long enduring. The craving for them is the secret of the world's best life. Quench it, and the era of savagery would return. That nation will thrive and grow and strike root deep in the earth, whose young men and young women are taught to cherish these aspirations for a happy and honorable home. And that nation is dying a horrible death whose young men and women sneer at them or know not their value. It is the homes of a people that give it all its character and solid worth. Instead of urging prudent reasons for postponing their homes,—instead of bidding young hearts wait till fortunes are made, and till style and fashion are secured,—the true friend of the young and of all his race will rather encourage to the utmost the establishment of new homes in early life, on a modest scale, and without the gangrenous ambition of social display. Wiser are they who join hearts and hands in early youth, and begin life while still able to adapt their habits and ways to each other's mutual comfort, than they who postpone marriage from prudential reasons in order to gratify pride at the expense of substantial happiness. What young people need is, not to be cautioned against the desire of an early home, but rather to be well instructed how to build an early home upon strong foundations, with solid rafters, and a roof that will keep out the rain,—how to obey the laws that determine the weal or woe of married life as surely as the laws of trade determine success in business. Let me mention some of the conditions of a happy home.

Frugality and economy, the restriction of expenditure within the limits of income, the avoidance of that sure destruction which follows improvidence and debt,—these are homely topics, perhaps, but they lie at the root of the matter. Without heed to these things, Paradise itself will be mortgaged, with a certainty that the mortgage will be speedily foreclosed. Mr. Wilkins Micawber, in "David Copperfield," scarcely overstated the fact, when he laid down the law (I cannot quote his inimitable language) that the difference between a sixpence more and a sixpence less of expenditure than the amount of annual income was the difference between misery and happiness.

Next, it is a matter of great importance that home should be home,—that it should be a private and independent establishment, if possible, rather than a boarding-place. The home-feeling cannot grow up in a boarding-house. All that makes domestic life beautiful and happy is seriously infringed upon by the too common practice of boarding, especially at the beginning of married life. The privacy and seclusion and honest pride of house-keeping, which did so much for our ancestors in olden times, and which do so much for Americanized Germans as compared with the Americanized Irish, are falling out of repute, I deeply regret to say, among Americans themselves, especially in our large cities. The growing popularity of what is called the "European plan" is one symptom of this. The jealousy felt of "co-operative house-keeping," even if mistaken to some extent, is a better sign. Nothing in the way of increased comfort or convenience, or even of increased leisure, will fully compensate for the loss of that sense of proprietorship, that development of common interests, and that cultivation of what might be called family individuality, which lie at the basis of sturdy national character. We might almost gauge the real prosperity of a country by the number of its independent households. The swarming of human beings in great hives or centres of population, as is shown in vast cities like London, Paris, or New York, is very unfavorable to character. It is the country homes, the small villages and towns, that make the true strength of a nation. The same principle operates on a smaller scale. It is the individualized families in any city that make its moral and social strength. Wherever families swarm together, as in the tenement-houses of any large city, morality and thrift fall to a very low ebb. The houses for the poor founded by George Peabody in London are said to be exposed somewhat to this objection. But there can be little doubt that the growing practice of boarding, into which so many families seem to be drifting, is unfavorable to the development of independent homes; and my advice to any newly-married couple would be—"Get a home of your own as speedily as possible."

Further, the independent home being secured, it should be made a school of all the virtues. First of all comes justice. Let the great idea of equality be taken for granted from the very start. Husband and wife are one; but, reversing the legal maxim, it takes both to make that one. Unless the spirit of equal rights pervades a home, so thoroughly, in fact, that the subject need never be mentioned, there is a slender prospect of permanent felicity. Justice is the only secure foundation for any human relationship, even though it be marriage; for unless love rests on a basis of justice, it will be arbitrary, unreasonable, capricious, and sure to be jarred with so many quarrels that it cannot long survive. In fact, justice might almost be defined as educated love. In the home, this spirit of justice will regard all things as equally owned, and prevent the wife from feeling herself in that state of pecuniary dependence on her husband which too often galls a high-spirited woman, and is essentially degrading. It will also break down that unnatural reticence which so many men preserve concerning their business affairs, thereby keeping their wives in ignorance of their real financial condition, and preventing them from adapting expenditure to receipts. Mutual confidence in all things, based on mutual respect and mutual regard for justice even in the minutest trifles, are fundamental conditions of true home happiness.

Again, there is great and constant need of order, which is a high virtue in both its moral and material applications. How much is implied in the phrase, a well-ordered household! Disorder begets discomfort, and discomfort begets dispute. That is very frequently the true genealogy of family unhappiness. Want of regularity, neatness, cleanliness, punctuality, method, or energy, in the administration of domestic affairs, has again and again undermined the foundations of domestic tranquillity. Nor can this duty of maintaining order in the household be properly thrust upon the wife alone, as is too frequently the case. Carelessness and disregard of reasonable home-regulations are very common with men; they make needless work, or break over rules by which they expect others to be bound, and are often themselves responsible if the patience and good-humor of the housekeeper become at last exhausted. These matters may seem trivial to men; but order is easily turned into disorder, and any woman will get tired after a while of "putting things to rights" after a disorderly husband, who often fails to perceive that what makes him uncomfortable and cross is caused by his own disorderliness. Constant and minute attention to the wants and convenience of others, even in little things, is the advance-guard of more imposing virtues. It is in the best ordered households that usually are begun the best-ordered lives. Respect for the laws of the state, the laws of conscience, the laws of universal Nature, must have its root in respect for the laws of home. Where this is absent on the part of parents, and disorder reigns in the common conduct of home-life, the chances are greatly against the future well-being and well-doing of children. Taken in a high sense, it is true, as the poet says, that "order is heaven's first law."

Another element of a happy home, the importance of which is too often undervalued, is the love of beauty. Home should be attractive to the eye as well as to the heart. Something essential is wanting, where the poetry of life finds no visible expression. If the young wife and husband love their home well enough to adorn it, being careful to avoid the dangers of extravagance,—if they surround themselves with flowers, hang on their walls a few of the good engravings or chromo pictures now fortunately so cheap, consult good taste in the selection and arrangement of their furniture, and spend some little thought on the cultivation of their æsthetic nature,—they will do much towards perpetuating that bloom of fine sentiment, which, once destroyed, is lost forever. Happiness is a delicate plant, and needs constant care. Neglect of appearance is very apt to precede neglect of substance. Unless the taste for beauty, the sympathy in elevating thoughts outside the common routine of life, and the pursuit of general culture, receive a due share of attention, the most complete harmony of life will scarcely be attained. The humblest dwelling can be made graceful and lovely at very little expense of money and time; and the charm of it is very apt to extend to matters that are higher still.

But all these various elements of a happy home are less important, of course, than the spirit of unselfishness and mutual self-sacrifice. Above everything else is what might be called the tone of the household. It is this which makes itself felt first of all by a stranger. A certain atmosphere pervades every home, which gives it its main character. Cheerfulness and mutual good-will, the abiding presence of that temper which makes the happiness of others first and foremost,—how quickly these are perceived even by the casual visitor! And their absence is as quickly perceived. Where quarrelling or bickering is the order of the day except when company is at hand, they betray themselves in unsuspected ways even when strangers are present. No disguise is effectual. I once knew a case in which, notwithstanding a sincere attachment in the main between husband and wife, ill-temper not infrequently got the upperhand; and the traces of it were perceptible even in the tone and manner of the most casual conversation. As sometimes happens in such cases, the free use of terms of endearment was indulged in, apparently to hide from the world the existence of family jars behind the scenes. On calling one day, the husband received me; and on inquiring after a while for the lady, he went to the foot of the staircase, and shouted—"darling! darling!" in a tone so curiously suggestive of impatience and vexation at her delay, that the effect was comical in the extreme. I am always a little suspicious of "pet-names," when paraded in public. But it is seldom that the contrast between semblance and reality is so striking as when they are vociferated in this manner up to the second or third story.

Reverence for the sanctity of home-life lies at the basis of all social well-being. Nothing can make up for its absence. It should be fostered and cultivated in the young as the surest guarantee of their future happiness and usefulness. Whatever tends to diminish it tends directly to break down the safeguards of private character and public order; and I count that man and that woman as universal benefactors who make their home worthy of its great ideal. All the virtues of after-life have their foundations laid in the intercourse of the home-circle; and when the golden age is inaugurated, its highest praise will be uttered in saying simply that the whole world has become a home.

PIXY-LED.

[From "The Earthward Pilgrimage," by Rev. Moneare D. Conway, pp. 343-351.]

Wandering in Wales I found a rustic who believed in pixies, and I deciphered from his dialect his notions concerning them. There were not many of them nowadays, he said, with evident satisfaction, and especially few in the neighborhood of railways; but still they could be occasionally heard in the woods and under the earth, and every now and then a traveller was misled by them. How was he misled? Why, he seemed to see his own house-gate just before him, but when he came near it, it was somewhere else; or there might be something to attract him which always glided somewhere else, and really was nothing at all; and so he wandered far from his way. (Here was the Hindu Yoganidra, or Illusion, holding her own within sight of the Atlantic!) To my further questioning he replied that the pixy-spell had to yield to either of two antidotes; if the victim turned any garment he had on inside out, he recovered his wits, or else when the next Sabbath dawned he would be released from the delusion. On hearing this grave account I first experienced a certain delight at getting so near to the ancient religion of our ancestors; but the next moment the antiquary in me was shamed: I remembered that I was a pilgrim toward the shrine of a human religion, and be thought me with thankfulness that the pixies had almost vanished, and that only one here or there could now be found who believed in their existence. Happy are we that live in an age and land of light and knowledge, I said, whom Science has taught to look upon the fern or the toadstool as an organism of wisdom, and not as the hiding-place of an elf that waylays and misleads us!

But when I wandered through the cities of England and Scotland, and saw the behavior of the people on the first day of each week, the credulous Welshman did not seem so isolated as before. Surely the Sunday had laid a spell upon the people similar to that which it had been said by him to dissolve. For six days of the week we go about in our right senses; but on Sunday our populations lose their wits, and stray helplessly from their own Nineteenth Century homes to wander amid the delusions of antiquity. On Saturday the English people are among the most sensible people in the world; on Sunday, the stupidest.

The parallel between the pixy-led and the Sabbath-led people is not so fanciful as it may at first appear. Our Science of Mythology has proved the pixies to be the shrunken forms of the once powerful gods of Northern religion, lingering, since Christianity outlawed them, in a size diminished for the requirements of the nursery, and lurking in the superstitions of districts unvisited by the school-master. But it is equally true that the sanctity of the Seventh Day is the survival of the worship of Ashtaroth or Astarte, Queen of Heaven,—the Moon, that is, which renews itself in four quarters of seven days each. There is even a trace of the intelligence previously ascribed to the Sun and Moon in the Mosaic account of their creation—"the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night;" and the belief hides in our word "lunacy," as well as in various rustic superstitions concerning the new moon. This new moon is continually associated with the Sabbath in the Bible, and it is the consent of scholars that the festivals of the two originated together. The priests of Moses retained the sacred days and festivals of the older faith—festivals known to Assyrians, Arabs, Indians, and even Peruvians—but of course associated them with their own deities. At first the sanction of the Seventh Day observance was that Jahve had rested on that day after his toils of creation; but that seems to have been not sufficiently impressive, since in the second edition of the Decalogue the Sabbath is associated only with the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. It became so powerful, that a man could be stoned to death for the slightest work done on that day; yet its sanctity must have to a great degree vanished at the time when Jesus experienced less inconvenience from his repeated violations of it than he now would in a Scottish village. Since his time the Seventh Day observance has lingered only among Jews and a few barbarous tribes.

As Moses adopted the festivals of the Moon, the Christians, after the death of Jesus, adopted the festivals of the sun. As Moses associated the Sabbath with Jahve, the Christians connected the Sun's day with Jesus. There is no reminiscence of Jahve's rest, but a curious mingling of Mosaism, Sun-worship, and Christianity, in the first explanation we have of the observance of the Sun-day by Christians. It is that of Justin Martyr (A. D. 147): "We all of us assemble together on the day of the Sun, because it is the first day, in which God changed darkness and matter, and made the world. On the same day also Jesus Christ our Savior rose from the dead."

The Sabbath was as gloomy as the night over which the deity to whom it referred ruled, and the day of the Sun was joyous. So it remains on the Continent of Europe to this day. But the reaction against Roman Catholic usages which followed the Reformation, the existence of the command about the Sabbath in the Decalogue, and a certain dismal element in the Anglo-Saxon man, combined to lead on the revival of Judaism known as Puritanism, and with it the blending of the Sunday with the Sabbath, notwithstanding the furious protests of Luther, Calvin, and other Reformers. "If anywhere," cried Luther, "the day is made holy for the mere day's sake,—if anywhere any one sets up its observance upon a Jewish foundation,—then I order you to work on it, to ride on it, to dance on it, to feast on it, to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit and liberty."

The Sabbath and the Sunday are as much remnants of old mythologies as the pixies. But they have not diminished in size like the pixies. It is indeed marvellous that the old Moon-deity is still strong enough in Great Britain to receive human sacrifices. Here are Baal (the Sun) and Ashtaroth (the Moon), with their idolaters in full power, and human health, happiness, and improvement bound as victims on their altars! Our Sabbatarians do not, like the Nestorian Christians, honestly fulfil the Jewish law, and kill the man who travels or works on Sunday; but they confine the people in their dens of filth or the gin-shop, and deprive them of the noble opportunities of their own free day. And, to complete the irony of the case, we send missionaries to the poor wretches who cast themselves under the Car of Juggernaut! The Car of Juggernaut may be as bad as a Scotch Sabbath,—I have never seen it,—but it is hard to pass on Sunday by the reeking closes of Edinburgh, where the poor are barred in by superstition, and, from fields where the birds are singing and the sun shining, to look down upon the spires of that city, without seeing each shape itself to a horrid idol, with humanity wasting, as by a slow fire, before it.

We are, indeed, not so bad as that in England; nevertheless, the main body of the Sunday is here in the power of the idol, especially so far as the poor are concerned. The rich can go to the Zoological Gardens on Sunday. They can have their open libraries, pictures, music, and games at home. The clergy, disregarding—they, their servants, and their sextons—so much of the Commandment as does not suit them, find their pleasure on that day, well knowing that, under the law "Whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death," every one of them would have been stoned to death by the congregation of Israel. But although the law of England is so much more merciful than the law of England's God that men cannot be stoned to death, the Poor Man's Sunday is still a disgrace to our civilization.

The Sunday question is a very large one. It concerns not only one-seventh of every human life, but the whole leisure time of laboring millions. To them destiny presents only so much release from drudgery and physical bondage. An ancient satirist represents a carpenter with his log of wood hesitating whether he shall make it into a god or a stool. England places every working man before his Sunday, and compels him to shape it to a Sabbatarian idol or a Satyr of the public-house. But what might not be made of this beautiful material! On that day Art might cast its ray across the dismal lot of Toil; the wonders of Science, the crystals of the Earth, the curiosities of History and Nature, the pictorial illustrations of human achievements, heroisms, and the celebrations of grand epochs, might kindle, refine, and ennoble those who now live and die as in caverns; they might count their higher, their real lives by luminous Sundays, remembering each as having brought them some new thought or uplifting ideal; they might sing, with George Herbert,

The Sundays of man's life,
Threaded together on Time's string,
Make bracelets to adorn the wife
Of the Eternal Glorious King!

But the pixy-spell is upon us, and it can be removed only by a complete change of our religious raiment inside out. To make that day what it should be, involves a revolution in the fundamental ideas of religion. It would imply a belief in a deity detached from a book; in a living, and not a dead, deity; in a deity to whom every day belongs; in a deity not dependent for his happiness or equanimity upon human abasement before him. That every day is the Lord's Day, and that every human interest religiously sacrificed is offered to an idol, as much as if it were roasted meat offered to his palate or incense to his nostrils, is a transcendent faith to whose height we shall not so easily climb. The Sunday will follow the development of human faith; it has reflected the mystery of the changing Moon, it has invested the greatness of the Giant Mechanic who built the universe in six days, it has been abased before the power that swallowed up Pharaoh and his hosts, it has shone with the gladness of Apollo rising with his radiant chariot, it has followed the glooms and glories of religion in its oscillation between fear and hope, heaven and hell; and when the religion of Humanity shall arrive, it will faithfully reflect the happiness and welfare of Man.

And because so much is implied in it, there is no cause that demands more the faithful service of the thinker and the philanthropist than that which demands the opening of museums, art-galleries, lecture-rooms, and concerts on the Sunday. That is a fatal servility that leads liberal believers to defer to the prejudices of neighbors and servants, and suspend games and pleasures on Sunday. Our neighbors and servants require our testimony against those chains which our timidity helps to strengthen. We have no right to set up in our homes, side by side, the God of Truth and our neighbor's idol. Our thought and our deed should be one. If a thing be false, let no true man or woman bend before it. If it be true, let it be organized in our homes and in our lives. It is but little, O my brothers, that we can do to lighten the superstitions that degrade and afflict mankind,—little enough at best; all the more should it be our very best!

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

I regard it as a phenomenon worth considering, the fact that within the last thirty years so many "Lives of Christ" have been written. And still they come! Dr. Hanna's work was no sooner published, read, criticised, and then laid away in the tomb of all the Capulets, than Dr. Crosby's "Life" made its appearance. This is so closely evangelical and common-place, that it fell still-born from the press, and cries aloud for burial. But the religious public are again on the tip-toe of expectation for Mr. Beecher's work, especially as it is to be illustrated after the fashion of Gustave Dore.

Now what is the secret of all this? How comes it that men are not satisfied with any of these "Lives"? Why this restlessness to have a history of Jesus that shall command universal confidence, and why this constantly recurring disappointment and dissatisfaction? Why are we not contented with the picture of Jesus as painted by the four Evangelists? They are the only sources of information the world has. Roman annals are silent concerning Jesus. Even Philo, who was contemporary with him, does not mention him. The passage in Josephus is obviously an interpolation. The Epistles of the New Testament do not shed much light. Yet with the sole records lying open before us, and so short that we all know them by heart, we have more than thirty lives of Christ already printed, and probably thirty more on the anvil, being forged in the different sectarian workshops of the theologians.

This strange uneasiness, I think, grows out of the conviction that none of these lives are consistent. The human mind naturally admires homogeneity. It likes symmetry of character and unity. But the life of Christ, founded on the four Gospels, cannot be homogeneous. It must be confused, inexplicable, and unintelligible, for the records are so. According to the first three Gospels Jesus was a man. According to the fourth he was God. Horace Greeley, in defining his theological views in a late number of the Golden Age, says that Jesus was more than man and less than God. That is to say, he was neither man nor God: for if he was more or less than man he was not man at all; and if he were less than God, he was not God at all. What then was he? Why, a nondescript personage, who never had any more real existence than the mythological Mercury of the Greeks.

Mr. Greeley, after announcing his faith, seems to have felt the shock given to his common sense, and with the artlessness of a little child observes that, if he is mistaken in the matter, he has been misled by the Evangelists! No doubt of it; for they were the most fallible and inconsistent men who ever undertook to write history. Two at least of them, nay three, after ascribing omniscience to Jesus, show that he did expect to return immediately after his death, in the clouds of heaven, to establish his Kingdom. His disciples, according to the accounts, indulged expectations which were unquestionably more political than religious. They were always thinking of thrones; and at the last, when their hopes were shaken by events, they say:—"Wilt thou at this time restore again the Kingdom to Israel?" But Jesus has not yet returned to the earth; and eighteen hundred years have passed by since he declared that he would!

In a life of Christ which would date from his birth to his ascension, an historian would dwell much on the stupendous miracle of his resurrection from the dead. It is the key-stone of the arch—the cardinal doctrine of Christianity. Yet see the conflicting accounts given of it by the Evangelists! No lawyer who ever read a book on the nature of evidence would dare to bring such a case into a court of law and equity. Suppose Mr. Beecher, when he comes, in his "Life of Christ," to this important part of the history, illustrates the scene; who will be present in the picture, according to the "inspired and infallible" records?

No candid man, I think, can read these Gospels without being convinced that they fall within the sweep of Mr. Motley's opening remark, in his great address before the New York Historical Society a few years since, that "all history is unreliable." There is no truth that is so painful to my mind as this, that we cannot trust either the ancient writers or the modern, in their narrative of events and their representations of character. They have "recorded" rather the things they wished to be true than the things they found to be true—their fancies rather than the facts. And we must do in this department of human inquiry what a juror does during the trial of a cause—take the clear and undoubted facts, and then the likelihoods and probabilities which form the substance of circumstantial evidence, and make up our minds in view of the whole.

Who knows the real character of any public man of ancient or modern times, around whom sects or parties have gathered? The Southern people regard Robert E. Lee as having been one of the purest of patriots. We regard him as a perjured traitor to his country. Hence the difference between character and reputation—the first being what a man really is, the other what people think him to be; and these may be as opposite as the poles.

I like Mr. Morris Einstein's style of biography, as given in a late number of THE INDEX, in his criticism of Mr. Frothingham's sermon; and also that of Prof. Denton, in a lecture he recently gave at Boston on "Who is a Christian?" If I were entirely satisfied that these gentlemen were free enough from prejudice to be historians, I would like to see their estimate of Jesus, as drawn from conceded facts and from circumstances which most have been dove-tailed with those facts. This, I think, is the only way under heaven by which a reliable, or even plausible, account can be given of the distinguished personage whom we call Jesus. And in so doing there is no violence done to truth. It is the only way by which in a court of justice truth can be elicited and justice be done.

A juror, when he takes his seat in the box, is sworn to bring in his verdict according to the law and evidence. But there may be some witnesses whose incoherent and even contradictory statements amount to nothing in the way of proof. There may be others who swear positively, but whose character for veracity is decidedly bad. If the verdict is to be according to the swearing, which is commonly called testimony, the accused person would be both guilty and innocent. But a juror who knows his business weighs the testimony. Some he rejects altogether; some he accepts partially; and some he accepts wholly.

The historian must exercise this discretion in making up the "Life of Christ" from the Evangelists; for all of them are more or less unreliable. Matthew, I think, if not ruled out of court entirely, should at least be suspected, for he was so bent on making Jesus fulfil the prophecies that he was misled by every Old Testament jingle of words to utter the most foolish things. Besides this, he makes Jesus allude to the assassination of Zacharias,—an event that took place thirty years after the death of Jesus. The other Gospels, though not as faulty as Matthew, are still unreliable.

A life of Jesus, however, simply repeating the details of the Evangelists, and clothing them in modern style, we do not want; for we have enough of them. A life based on facts outside of the Gospel is impossible; for we have no contemporaneous records. But a life based on the admitted facts of the Gospel and other writings, with inferences, probabilities, and likelihoods, is possible; and is a desideratum. Is there not somewhere some great and noble soul who can rise above the prejudices of education, whether orthodox or heterodox, and give us such a life of Jesus of Nazareth?

BUZA.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"My first subscription, after reading your Prospectus, had two objects in view, namely, to give my mite to your new enterprise, and to see what you would fetch forth, not expecting much good would come from it to mankind, seeing so many Reverends mixed in among the expected correspondents and contributors. But we have been quite disappointed in their character and intentions. We learn they are not of the God-eating class, but friends to free thought, progress, and mental freedom. We detest the name and title of Reverend, Priest, or Clergy. They bring to mind the days of our childhood, when through their influence we were deprived of the innocent play and sports that make life bearable in that stage of existence. Time flew apace; we cut loose from all fear in desperation, defying all gods, devils, and men to do their worst, determined to get rid of hell in this world, enjoy it as best we could, and run the risk of hell in the next, feeling, when young, that happiness consisted in doing right to our fellow-man. A long life has not made us repent of the determination taken and followed thus far in life. We are free to have no religion. The word conveys no meaning to our mind. It has no reality in existence; it is the phantom of a disordered mind, or one which thought and reflection has not entered. All men cannot divest themselves of early education, and become either Atheists or Philosophers; they must believe something they cannot comprehend, or there would be no mystery. THE INDEX is doing much good; for those who still stand on the coals of hell have not courage to jump off, and it teaches them rightly without irritation, loosening them from their bondage without their knowledge or consent. Many persons will read THE INDEX that would burn unread the Investigator. It teaches them as if it taught them not, to become free. Go ahead with THE INDEX, and prosper; drive away that non-entity in existence, but reality in imagination, that has cursed and crushed Humanity so long—a Brutal God. Mankind are their own oppressors, through ignorance of natural laws, or neglect to follow them. Perhaps nothing adds so much to the general misery as superabundance of population, when there are more hands to labor than work to be done, more mouths to be filled than food to supply. Want destroys both morals and honesty. He that believes our republican government can withstand a dense population, has more faith in the head brute, Man, than I have."

—"You will confer a favor by not sending any more papers to my address. The views put forth and the doctrines taught are at variance with my settled beliefs, and I am unwilling to be the means of circulating a paper which to me seems dangerous."

—"THE INDEX sent to the address of — is not taken out. She says she did not subscribe for it, does not want it, and will not take it out." [Postmaster's notice.]

—"Your paper is very welcome at my fireside. I enjoy it, and appreciate it, and depend upon it. I am delighted you feel encouraged to go on with it."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RECEIVED.

THE PRIMARY SYNOPSIS OF UNIVERSOLOGY AND ALWATO (pronounced ahl-wa-to), the New Scientific Universal Language. By STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS, Member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences; of the American Ethnological Society, etc.; Author of "The Science of Society;" "Discoveries in Chinese," "The Basic Outline of UniversoLOGY," etc. New York: DION THOMAS, 141 Fulton St. 1871. 12mo. pp. 294. Price $1.50.

A CATALOGUE OF BOOKS FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL LIBRARIES AND OF BOOKS OF REFERENCE FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS. Recommended by the Ladies' Commission. New Edition, revised and enlarged. AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION. 1871. pp. 64, 16.

THE EXAMINER, A Monthly Review of Religious and Humane Questions, and of Literature. Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, Editor. Chicago: THE WESTERN NEWS CO., 121 & 123 State St. Price $2.50 for Six Numbers; $4.00 for Twelve. Single Numbers 50 Cents. July, 1871.

BLETTNER FUER FREIE RELIGIOESER LEBEN. Herausgegeben von FRIEDRICH SCHUENEMANN-POTT, Sprecher der "Deutschen Freien Gemeinde" in Philadelphia. Juni, 1871.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD, A Monthly Magazine of General Literature and Science. New York: THE CATHOLIC PUBLICATION HOUSE, 9 Warren St. $5.00 per year. July, 1871.

HOME AND HEALTH, A Monthly Magazine devoted to Health and the Home Circle. W. B. DE PUT & BROTHER, Publishers, 805 Broadway, New York. $1.50 per annum in advance. June, 1871.

Poetry.

THE RAINBOW.

My heart leaps up when I behold
A rainbow in the sky:
So was it when my life began,
So is it now I am a man,
So be it when I shall grow old,
Or let me die!
The child is father of the man;
And I could wish my days to be Bound each to each by natural piety.

WORDSWORTH.

The Index.

JUNE 24, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX.—Is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [Three Lectures.] 8. Lying Prevalence in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
TOLEDO, O., April, 1871. For the INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Our place of publication has been changed from the establishment of the Toledo Blade, 150 Summit Street, to that of the Toledo Printing Co., 90 St. Clair Street. This change was made solely for business reasons.

The proprietors and workmen at the Blade Office have always been extremely obliging. We think our readers will bear witness that they did their work well; and we take this opportunity to acknowledge our obligation for their constant endeavor to meet our wishes in all respects. Last week, however, THE INDEX was printed for the first time under the new arrangement; and we wonder how many of our readers noticed the improved look of the paper, resulting from the fact that an entire font of new type has been purchased for its publication. From the outset we have felt no little pride in the handsome typographical appearance of our little sheet, which has won many encomiums from the press; and under the new auspices there will be no deterioration, but rather gain, in this respect.

"You radicals are all adrift!" exclaims the timid conservative. As if the function of a ship was to ride forever at anchor! If Columbus had always hugged the shore, he would never have discovered America.

We would call attention to the advertisement, on our last page, of a teacher who desires a situation where Bible-reading is not required. His conditions are very reasonable.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Every friend of THE INDEX will be glad, we think, to see such proof of unmistakable earnestness in its support as is contained in the appended documents:—

This is to certify that the undersigned, EDWARD P. BASSETT, CALVIN CONE, PETER H. BATESON, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, and H. E. HOWE, residents of the City of Toledo, County of Lucas, and State of Ohio, have associated, and do hereby associate themselves, for the purpose of incorporation, under the laws of the State of Ohio, for the purpose of publishing books, pamphlets and other publications; also a weekly paper to be called "THE INDEX," to be devoted to FREE RELIGION.

The capital stock of this Association shall be One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000), to be divided into One Thousand Shares (1000) of One Hundred Dollars ($100) each.

The name and style by which the organization shall be known is "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION."

The principal office of said Association shall be located in the City of Toledo, County of Lucas, and State of Ohio, and the meeting of said Association shall be held on the first Saturday of June of each year.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, this tenth day of April, A. D. 1871.

5 cent
Int. Rev.
Stamp.

E. P. BASSETT, [L. S.]
CALVIN CONE, [L. S.]
PETER H. BATESON, [L. S.]
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, [L. S.]
H. E. HOWE, [L. S.]

THE STATE OF OHIO, }
Lucas County, ss. } Before me, DAVID E. MERRILL, a Justice of the Peace in and for the said County, personally appeared the within named EDWARD P. BASSETT, CALVIN CONE, PETER H. BATESON, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, and H. E. HOWE, and acknowledged the signing and sealing of the within instrument to be their voluntary act and deed for the purposes mentioned.

5 cent
Int. Rev.
Stamp.

IN TESTIMONY WHEREOF, I hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, this twelfth day of April, 1871.

D. E. MERRILL,
Justice of the Peace.

THE STATE OF OHIO, }
Lucas County, ss. } I, VICTOR KEEN, Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, the same being a Court of Record within and for said County and State, do hereby certify that DAVID E. MERRILL, before whom the annexed instrument was acknowledged, and to the Certificate whereof he has signed his name officially, in his own proper handwriting, was at the date thereof, and now is, a Justice of the Peace within and for said County of Lucas, duly commissioned and sworn as such, and by virtue of said office and the laws of the State of Ohio he was fully authorized to take the acknowledgement of deeds and other instruments of writing. I further certify, that the annexed instrument is duly executed and acknowledged as required by the laws of the State of Ohio. Also that I am acquainted with the handwriting of the above named Justice of the Peace, and believe his official signature to the annexed instrument is genuine.

[L. S.] IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have subscribed my name, and affixed the seal of the said Court, at the City of Toledo, this 13th day of April, A. D. 1871.

5 cent
Int. Rev.
Stamp.

VICTOR KEEN, Clerk.
By M. A. SIBLEY, Deputy.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO, }
Office of the Secretary of State. }

I, ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, Secretary of State of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the Certificate of Incorporation of "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION," filed in this office on the 15th day of April, 1871.

Great Seal of the State of Ohio.

IN TESTIMONY WHEREOF, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the Great Seal of the State of Ohio, at Columbus, the 17th day of April, A. D. 1871.

ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,
Secretary of State.

Authority is hereby given to FRANCIS E. ABBOT to open books for the subscription to the Capital Stock of "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION;" and, when ten (10) per cent of such Capital Stock shall have been subscribed, he is hereby authorized to publish a proper notice for the meeting of such Stock-holders, for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors, and adopting By-Laws for the government of said corporation.

P. H. BATESON,
CALVIN CONE,
H. E. HOWE.

Toledo, April 20th, 1871.

We, the undersigned, do hereby agree to take the number of shares of the Capital Stock of the Index Association set against our respective names, and to pay such instalments thereon as the Board of Directors shall determine:

PROVIDED,—That no assessment shall be made upon the said Stock until the full sum of Fifty Thousand Dollars ($50,000) shall have been subscribed, and that thereafter the annual assessment shall not exceed ten (10) per cent. per annum of the amount so subscribed; it being also understood and made a part of this agreement that no obligation shall be assumed by the Association until the full sum of Fifty Thousand Dollars ($50,000) shall have been subscribed, and that thereafter the Association shall incur no indebtedness during any current year which shall exceed ten (10) per cent. upon the amount of stock at such time actually subscribed.

Toledo, Ohio, April 10th, 1871.

D. R. Locke,	Twenty Shares of $100 each	$2000
C. Cone,	Ten " " "	1000
A. E. Macomber,	" " " "	1000
H. L. Holloway,	" " " "	1000
Guido Marx,	" " " "	1000
F. E. Abbot,	" " " "	1000
P. H. Bateson,	" " " "	1000
Edward Bissell,	" " " "	1000
E. P. Bassett,	" " " "	1000
H. E. Howe,	Three " " "	300
W. C. Fisk,	" " " "	300
J. M. Ritchie,	" " " "	300
William Kraus,	Five " " "	500

By these papers it will be seen that the Index Association have become a legally incorporated body, for the purpose of putting the continuance of THE INDEX beyond all reasonable doubt. The capital stock is set at one hundred thousand dollars, divided into one thousand shares of one hundred dollars each. No subscription will be payable until half of the capital stock has been actually subscribed; and then only ten per cent. need be paid annually, although the whole amount can be paid at once, if preferred. If the sum of fifty thousand dollars is subscribed, thus insuring an annual revenue to the Association of five thousand dollars, it is not expected that any assessment will be required after two years, or three at furthest; for within the next two years proper management of the paper will assuredly make it self-sustaining. It would have been self-sustaining already, if more care and attention could have been given to its business interests. Even under existing circumstances, with no one who could give his time to obtaining advertisements or working up a large circulation, THE INDEX has steadily gained from its establishment in the number of its subscribers; and, what is not a little remarkable, its receipts for the first year were four-fifths of its entire cost. Such a result could only have been secured by wise and economical management; and this it has certainly had. So favorable is the prospect, provided sufficient funds can be secured, for the establishment of a FIRST-CLASS RADICAL WEEKLY, that business men of Toledo, where the facts are known, have already subscribed nearly a quarter of the amount required. Instead of continuing to pay annual assessments of ten per cent. on their stock, they expect that within a very few years, provided fifty thousand dollars shall be subscribed, the shares will pay respectable dividends.

The paper is no longer an experiment. The want of such an organ of Free Religion is demonstrated by the effect it has already produced on public opinion, and by the uninterrupted stream of letters from all parts of the country expressing enthusiastic welcome to the ideas it enunciates. Nay, even from Europe similar letters are occasionally sent. Only yesterday we received from one of the greatest scientific men of England, whose name is famous throughout the entire civilized world, a private letter of which the following was the closing sentence:—

"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I believe that I agree to every word."

With such strong claims upon the support of the liberal public, the Index Association make a frank and direct appeal for subscriptions to their stock. The shareholders, as will be seen by the above documents, are carefully protected against all involvement in debt. No indebtedness can be incurred in any one year beyond the pledged revenue of that year. So long as we are personally connected with the Association, we give our word that this clause shall be faithfully obeyed. Rather than see it disobeyed, we shall resign our position at any and every cost; and no man who has had dealings with us will doubt the fulfilment of this promise. But there is no occasion for any apprehension that the confidence of distant stock-holders will be abused. The gentlemen composing the Association stand among the very first citizens of Toledo for business capacity and reputation; and their names are a guarantee to all who know them of honorable and judicious management.

In this age it is plain that the press is supplanting the pulpit, as a means of influencing public opinion; and the weekly paper brings its power to a focus. Whoever really has at heart the emancipation of America from degrading and blighting superstition, and the increase of liberal and ennobling principles in the land, must adopt this means. Friends, are you reasonably satisfied with THE INDEX, as an exponent of the ideas now urgently needed by the times? Do you believe that with proper assistance it can be developed into a great and powerful journal, going into every town and village of the country, and quickening all that is manly, noble, free, in human hearts and minds? Do you really wish to see such an agency at work, turning the ignorance and folly of the popular religion into the enlightenment and self-respect which alone befit free men and free women?

If you do, subscribe to at least one share in this enterprise; but, if possible, to more than one. Having given gratuitously our whole strength to THE INDEX for a year and a half, we do not want to see it die, believing that it is the germ of a mighty power in the cause of Free Religion; but unless it can be put now on a permanent basis, we shall decline to tax further the generosity of those who have thus far guaranteed its publication. They have done enough. If the liberal public do not want such a paper enough to support it, neither they nor we ought longer to bear the burden alone. But we expect better things. Noble friends have come forward to help us, some by paying all financial deficits, others by giving us outright the coinage of their brains, and others still by encouraging us with words of sympathy and hope. Not until convinced by experience shall we believe that there is not enough earnestness for ideas among American liberals to establish and sustain one first-class paper, free from all entangling alliances with isms, and devoted to truth in the pure spirit of science and practical religion.

In conclusion, we would say that subscriptions to stock will all be acknowledged in these columns, the names being given unless specially desired to be withheld. We hope that responses will not only be liberal, but also prompt. And with this last word we put the future of THE INDEX into the hands of our friends.

A RADICAL CONVENTION.

It was the privilege of the writer of this to attend the Yearly Meeting of the "Friends of Human Progress" recently held in Waterloo, N. Y. This organization, like that of the "Progressive Friends" at Longwood, Pa. (whose annual gathering occurred this year at the same time), originated nearly a quarter of a century ago in the zealous devotion of some members of the Society of Friends (or Quakers) to the Anti-Slavery cause. These earnest men and women, who, in the spirit of John Woolman, had consecrated themselves to the work of securing freedom and justice to the slave, could not be content with the lukewarmness and inefficient protests of the main body of the Society, but joined heart and hand with Garrison and the early abolitionists in the great struggle for emancipation. The result was that they were generally disowned by the regular Quaker organizations, became separated from the sect, and set up a meeting by themselves, where the cause of human rights could be freely discussed and philanthropy and reform should be made the prominent elements of religion. Hence came this Waterloo "Yearly Meeting of the Friends of Human Progress."

It seems that in the locality of Waterloo the progressive party, though a small minority compared with the whole body of the denomination, were in the ascendant, and kept possession of the meeting-house; and this Yearly Meeting continues to be held in the old time-worn Quaker meeting-house (which is the fac-simile of one where I was in the habit of attending meeting in my Quaker boyhood). But what a change in everything else! Many of those who helped organize the new order of things have passed away, and there is very little of the special Quaker element, so far as it is outwardly observable, now left in the meeting,—no broad brims, nor straight collars, nor long bonnets; yet there is a good degree of simplicity still in "dress and address," and a mighty emphasis of the ancient Quaker doctrine of being "moved by the Spirit." But (horror of horrors!) right in the middle of the ministers' gallery on one side of the house stands a cabinet-organ, which leads a very different kind of singing from that which lulled my boyish senses from that sacred, inaccessible loft; and instead of the solemn rows of silent people or the dull, formal "business" when the "shutters" were closed and the men and women were separated, here was a very active convention of men and women of the most radical type, energetically discussing for three days questions of the most direct and practical interest in social and civil reform, alert to state their points vigorously, applauding with both hands and feet the sentiments they liked, settling matters by vote, and presided over by a Chairman, for all the world like "the world's people," he also sitting in the ministers' gallery, and in the most sacred spot of all, where only the most aged or gifted preacher or gravest elder used to sit!

And at the meeting this year the Chairman was chosen from that race with whose interest the origin of the meeting was so closely identified. Charles Lenox Remond presided; and the fact was a symbol of the great victory for human rights that has been gained since this meeting was organized. To give any account of the discussions would lead beyond the limits of this article. Suffice it to say that the principles and ideas of the free religious movement, the Woman's Suffrage and Temperance Reforms, Prison Discipline and the treatment of criminals, the rights of children to good birth and education, were among the topics considered. There was earnest speaking and earnest listening, and the meeting cannot but result in good. It is hoped that the readers of THE INDEX will have from the Secretary of the convention the Resolutions that were passed, if not a fuller account of the proceedings. Long life and health to the "Waterloo Yearly Meeting."

W. J. P.

LETTER FROM WILLIAM HENRY CHANNING.

We had the pleasure of sending to THE INDEX recently a letter from William Henry Channing on the religious condition of England. A later letter, continuing the same subject, is gladly given below.

W. J. P.

LONDON, W.,
May 13, 1871.

My last letter spoke of the movement now threatening to overwhelm the "Established Church" of England and to sweep away the ancient dyke of union between church and state. The late debate in the House of Lords upon the "University Tests" Bill, and still more the debate on Mr. Miall's motion in the House of Commons—"That it is expedient at the earliest practicable period to apply the policy indicated by the disestablishment of the Irish Church by the act of 1869 to the other churches established by law in the United Kingdom,"—are signs of the resistless freshet that has broken up, once and forever, the thick-ribbed ice of conventional creeds and customs in the ecclesiastical world. True, in each case, the conservatives won an apparent triumph. But such confessions of hopeless weakness as were made by the staunchest defenders of the old system are felt to be fatal, all but universally. The sole question, as admitted on all sides, is this:—"What is the earliest practicable period?" Mr. Gladstone confesses as much, though not in so many words; and Disraeli could not deny it. To all intents and purposes it is decided that the "Established Church" of England and Scotland must follow in its downfall that of Ireland. The age of uniformity will give place to that of unity in variety. And in room of the composite artificial structure of the Tudors will appear the grand "National Church of the United Kingdom." As the former melts away,—beautiful as it was in its season, like the winter's frost-temple,—will appear upgrowing the stately forest, green with spring, amidst whose boughs shall breathe the spirit of the living God. This nation was never so really religious as now, so longing to be religious in very truth and deed.

Yet it was touching to hear the pathetic lament of the "Lords," offered in deep earnestness, over the infidelity of the times, especially as manifested among the young men of the Universities. The Marquis of Salisbury, who introduced the debate on the "University Tests" Bill (and, be it remembered, he is the real leader, by intellectual power, force of will, and high position, of the Conservative Party), frankly made the avowal: "It is not merely the general tendency of a particular class of thinkers toward infidelity with which you have to struggle. One of the most striking facts brought out by the investigation of the Committee has been, that in one of the Universities, at least, not only is there full response to whatever the infidel invitations of modern literature may hold out, but that the studies of the University are affected in a manner which, if it had free course given to it by the Bill, would lead to the most terrible and dangerous results." He then proceeded to quote a passage from the evidence of a "Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, and a gentleman of distinguished literary distinction, Mr. Charles Appleton," in which it is said: "So far as I know, the strictest and most delicate reticence is always observed in approaching the mind of a young man, so as not to upset his beliefs; but I believe the upsetting of his beliefs and the entire loosening of them from all their moorings is an inevitable consequence of the system of education which now exists at Oxford." This Mr. Appleton, who is a strong advocate of abolishing all Tests, and so quoted as one "whose evidence is all the more entitled to weight" by the Marquis of Salisbury, is the present Editor of the Academy,—a man of high culture and growing influence who will make his mark if he lives.

The Marquis continued his lamentation as follows: "Within three years it is expected that a man is to master difficult subjects of metaphysical study. He is expected, according to the same witness, to read Spinoza and Hobbes—I do not say all, of course, but portions of their writings; portions of Locke, of Berkeley and of Hume are also read; and the 'First Principles' and 'Psychology' of Mr. Herbert Spencer are beginning to be widely studied. Kant and Hegel are also among the authors read. The natural result is that, having to master these things within a limited time, and being forced to complete this line of study before the examination comes on, he has no time to enter into the opposite argument. Negative philosophy is the easiest to master, and will carry most honors in the schools, and that is all which the young man or those who press him forward care for."

Such is the tone of the leader in the House of Lords, whose earnest eloquence succeeded in obtaining only five votes majority against a bill for abolishing all tests in the Universities. Few words of comment are needed, when the chief breakwater against the "infidelity of the age" is despairingly planted down by this weak attempt to deter the "honor-men," that is, the foremost scholars of Oxford and Cambridge, from studying Spinoza and Berkeley, Herbert Spencer and Hume, Kant and Hegel. No wonder the Churchmen are troubled. But why can they not open their eyes to the plain fact that what these earnest youths are craving, as their very breath of life, is a credible creed and a practicable code of duty; and that what they loathe as deathly poison is Make-Belief and Mock-Belief? The "young England" of to-day is growing earnest; presently it will become heroic. And the prediction made in my former letter is confidently repeated:—"The end of this growing agitation will be a pure, fervent, free and energetic THEISM, full of reverence and devotion, rich in deeds of loving patriotism and humanity,—a real Reformation in spirit and in life."

Two days since, in a walk with Herbert Spencer, he unfolded to me some of his hopes for his nation. There is no time to repeat the conversation. But, in brief, he is full of good cheer, and thinks the signs of promise were never so bright for the people of Great Britain. He is greatly encouraged also by the wide circulation of Mr. Darwin's and Mr. Huxley's books in our republic, as tending to unite the thinkers of both nations. He believes, moreover, that the triumph of Germany will be the opening of a new era of peaceful progress on the continent of Europe. Altogether his prophecies were auspicious, though calmly given, as is his wont. Again, too, is my former statement renewed:—"Darwinism and Spencerism will not close in Atheism, or any merely negative scheme of opinion. True Science will evolve from the principles of organic unity, exhibited by Darwin and Spencer, a new revelation of the living God, of man's freedom, of immortal destiny, and of love as the law of life for all beings." A wonderful proof of the aspiration of this age of so-called "materialism" towards a "spiritual philosophy," is given in the publication of Jowett's masterly rendering into the purest English of Plato's Dialogues. Oh, for a Socrates to help towards birth the glorious idea of universal unity from the travail of our struggling age! What we need is Affirmation, pure and positive,—the radiant presentation of living realities, dispelling the clouds of sophistry and the darkness of doubt.

And so, in fraternal union and good hope, am I, as ever,

Yours sincerely,

WM. HENRY CHANNING.

"The Bhagvat-Geeta; or Dialogues of Kreeshna and Arjoon," Wilkins' translation, has been reprinted in very neat style by S. S. Jones, Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, Chicago. The Bhagavad-Gita (such is the orthography adopted by more modern scholars), which is an episode probably interpolated by a later poet in the ancient Hindu epic of the Mahabharata, is one of the finest products of Brahmanic thought, and contains passages of great sublimity. There is a later translation (J. C. Thomson, Hertford, 1855); but Wilkins' version has permanent value, and is well worth the price, $1.25. We subjoin a noble extract from page 53:—

"The Almighty createth neither the powers nor the deeds of mankind, nor the application of the fruits of action. Nature prevaileth. The Almighty receiveth neither the vices nor the virtues of any one. Mankind are led astray by their reasons being obscured by ignorance; but when that ignorance of their souls is destroyed by the force of reason, their wisdom shineth forth again with the glory of the sun, and causeth the Deity to appear. Those whose understandings are in him, whose souls are in him, whose confidence is in him, and whose asylum is in him, are by wisdom purified from all their offences, and go from whence they shall never return."

"In the old rumbling mansion of theology," says Mr. Weiss, "even the warming-pans and foot-stoves of shivering generations are hoarded up; now and then they are brought out to cosset some valetudinarian. But motion itself is the improved warming apparatus to an army in the field." We commend this sentence to the careful consideration of those who feel no "warmth" in Free Religion.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

FULTON AGAIN.

REV. J. D. FULTON, D. D., will preach in Tremont Temple next Sabbath, at 10½ A. M., and 3 P. M. Subject in the morning: Darwinism—infidel to God and humanity.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The discourse to-day on the above named subject was not an improvement upon last Sunday's effort. No argument was offered in support of any theory advanced, but the sermon abounded in unsupported assertions. The great fear manifested on this occasion was that, if the idea prevails that man has been developed from a mite, instead of being created noble at first and having afterward degenerated,—if different races sprang from various sources,—then the inferior races, being so nearly allied to the animal, might not come in for their share of salvation in Christ's blood. "A man without Christ's blood is like a picture without light. Christ is the light of the scientific world."

The Elder's fears were extreme lest, being made in the image of God, he should find in the Darwinian theory that his God was a monkey.

He compared Hugh Miller with Darwin, much to the advantage of the former and the disgrace of the latter.

But, Mr. Editor, permit me to enclose a letter written by myself to Doctor Fulton since hearing the discourse referred to.

You must first be informed that, previous to the discourse being given, Doctor Fulton read a petition addressed to the Governor and Mayor of this city, and begging them not to permit the Sabbath, June 18, to be desecrated by a military review and dress parade on the Common; also, that there appeared in our dailies yesterday this paragraph:—"This regiment (the 9th) have permission to go on the Common on Saturday, but by the rules for this year are excluded from having religious services there on Sunday."

It appears that Mr. Fulton was not aware of this fact, as he was very earnest that all the voters should come forward and sign the petition, urging them in this wise—"When God shall ask the Devil to preach, then will he invite Jim Fisk to conduct religious services on the Common on the Sabbath."

[Letter.]

BOSTON, June 11, 1871.

REV. DR. FULTON:—

Did you not make a mistake this morning in your petition and remarks, when you asked that religious services shall not be permitted on the Common on the Sabbath day, June 18?

June 18 is Sunday, not the Sabbath day. The Sabbath day is, or will be, Saturday, June 17, since that is the seventh day of the week. The first day of the week is Sunday, not the Sabbath day.

It is proper to keep these distinctions clear and well defined, since our eternal salvation depends on it, and our escape from that dreadful hell which you so eloquently dilated upon this morning.

Don't you remember, God said—"The SEVENTH day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God, &c.," and—"In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; therefore, the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it?"

Did he not command rest on the seventh day, and hallow that portion of time; and did he not command (Exod. 31, 13.) that whosoever defiled that seventh day should be put to death? Is not this command as binding on you as any other given to the Jews?

Suppose the Jews and Sabbatarians in Boston should forward a petition to Governor Claflin and Mayor Gaston, praying them not to permit a military parade on Saturday, June 17, their Sabbath day. Ought they not, if they grant your petition, also to grant theirs for the sake of the religious feelings of the Jews and Sabbatarians, as well as yours and those of the Christians?

During the entire war, priests, chaplains, ministers, and Christians of all denominations, participated in inspection and dress parade, both on Saturday and Sunday, the holy days of the Jews, Sabbatarians, Christians, without feeling that the day was desecrated.

Can you tell me why God makes it right in war times thus to prepare to kill men made in his image (not in the image of monkeys), and is so angry in regard to a military review and inspection next Sunday on Boston Common, as to depute you to get up a petition to prevent the same? Is it God who will be disturbed by this review, or you and the other Christians of Boston, who wish to have laws by which you shall be protected in your right to make all the noise you please, (witness Elder Knapp), while you wish to make laws forbidding others to do the same? The Christians, by changing the day of worship from the seventh day to the first, have destroyed all the sacredness attached to that day, and in fact to the institution itself.

Any sect has the same right to select a day of the week, and, if they can command a majority of votes and gain sufficient power, demand that Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday shall be kept as holy time.

Your discourse to-day reminded me of the opposition of the bigoted, ignorant Christians in the days of Galileo and Copernicus to the facts of science.

What you may believe or preach will not change science or facts; these will march on regardless of revelation, and the latter must bow and bend to them.

Why did you not to-day speak of the glorious Christian death of Hugh Miller, as well as of his glorious Christian life? Infidels and Free Religionists do not endeavor to wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction as did he in his suicidal death! Alas, alas for poor Yorick!

Enclosed please find a statement from the Boston Herald that the Common will not be used next Sunday by the 9th Regiment for military purposes; which information, had you been posted, would have obviated the necessity of your desecrating Sunday, June 11, by presenting a petition on secular matters on God's holy day—or rather on the holy day of a portion of the Christian world.

JUSTICE.

Now, Mr. Editor, if you can make any use of the above, please signify it to me, by granting the request made last week.

NOT A FREE RELIGIONIST.

CHRISTIAN JOY FACTITIOUS.

QUINCY, MASS., May 10, 1871.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

On reading your two essays on the "Warmth of Free Religion," I have been reminded of my own experiences in what is called Christian joy, and my observations of it for fifty years past. When younger than I am now, my own mind was victimized by revival dogmas; I was declared "born again," and baptized in the Narragansett Bay, as Jesus is said to have been in the river Jordan. Just as all other "sinners" have been dogmatized into Christian joy, so was I. The motive power by which the changes in my mind were brought about was my "faith" in the revival ideas. These were a vindictive God, the danger of an eternal hell, and the fear of an old "boss devil." The devil is preached in all religious revivals as really as Jesus is, or an angry God.

By experience I know what is meant by a "sinner under conviction," and the "change of heart" called the "new birth," and "conversion," by which it is said the "love of God is shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost given unto us." These revival ideas were dogmatized into my youthful mind, then uninformed as to Nature's laws; and, knowing no better, I "believed" what the minister told me and was baptized. Thus, in the excess of my credulity, I obtained a knowledge of what is called the "witness of the spirit," "peace in believing," and "joy in the Holy Ghost." In fact, all the faith and Christian joy ever experienced by any I have had.

Moreover, I know what it is to feel one's self "moved by the Holy Ghost" to preach hell fire and damnation as the remedy for sin and total depravity. I have had the bishop's hands laid twice upon my head, first as a "deacon," and then as an "elder," when the bishop, putting the Bible in my hands, while I was required to kneel before him, said to me:—

"Take thou authority to preach the word of God, and to administer the sacraments in the church of Christ."

As to those mental epidemics called "revivals of religion," I know what they are, and how they are "got up." From 1822 to 1837, I was myself thus employed, and I know better about these excitements than Knapp, Burchard, John N. Maffit, or any other revival minister could tell me. The first sermon I ever preached, my audience were so pathetized with the revival ideas addressed to their organs of credulity, fear and hope, that a dozen or more of them fell from their seats in convulsions upon the floor, "struck down," as it was said, "by the power of God." And for fifteen years similar phenomena followed my preaching throughout the New England states. In these sympathetic excitements, my "converts" became entranced, and manifested all the well-known nervous and mental phenomena now so common in modern mediumism. And if the people who attend Methodist meetings at the present time did really believe in these revival dogmas, as to hell, the devil, and a God run mad, it would be a shame that these ministers cannot now get up revivals such as were common in the days of Edwards, Whitefield, and Wesley. If I myself really believed in these dogmas, I would guarantee a "revival" in any neighborhood where the people were ignorant enough to believe what I said to them about an angry God, and that devil that "goeth about" pushing sinners into hell. But "revivals" are becoming more and more uncommon, and for the reason that the people are becoming more and more conscious as to the machinery by which they are "got up."

In my younger days the "camp-meeting," the "prayer-meeting," and the "love-feast" were places of my resort. And the Methodists who denounce me as an "apostate bound straight to perdition," have recently given me the credit of having been "a powerful itinerant" among them. True it is, I had such revivals after my preaching in different localities as we do not hear of at the present time. The glory of Methodism in this respect has departed. Nor have I any doubt but that my subsequent experimental lectures on Pathetism throughout the country from 1840 to 1852 contributed to this state of things, which renders it so difficult now-a-days to get up an old-fashioned Methodist revival. For in these lectures, I gave demonstrations as to the truthfulness of the theory of the human mind here referred to. No man, woman, or child who has any knowledge of Mental Philosophy could ever become a convert in a Methodist revival, I am sure.

I repeat that, if I do not know what "saving faith" is, then no man knows. If I do not know what my friend R. H. Howard means by the "Religion of the Heart," then he does not himself know. And I here refer to my own personal knowledge in this regard, as Mr. H. thinks that, because I am not a Methodist, I do not know what Christian joy is.

Now the point I make here is this:—What is called religious joy is purely factitious. It is merely such joy as comes from the artificial excitement of hope by faith in mysticism. It is not the permanent joy of a healthy, harmonious manhood; but it is fickle, varying, and evanescent, and liable to be annihilated in a moment by every wind of "temptation," which is believed to have come from the devil. And these "temptations" are a necessity for the Christian's good! Nay, without them no one can be a Christian. The lives of Christians in all ages have been noted for their conflicts with Satan. So much has this "fourth person in the trinity" to do in harassing all Christians, that most of their life is spent in these battles with "the powers that be;" and hence much of the Christian's joy is in the belief that this devil has been for the time being overcome, but not permanently, for the conflict is liable to be the very next hour renewed again. Hence the language so often quoted by the Christian when he says, "I shall one day fall by the hand of this enemy."

Hence faith is the motive power of all that joy which is purely Christian. Moreover, we must bear in mind that by faith in fiction joy is equally excited; that is, all such joy as is called Christian. Hence, all such joy, which depends on faith in mediumism, is factitious: and it falls far below the joy, the cheerful hope of a harmonious and perfected manhood. The laws that made me a man are in me; and on these laws I rely, because I know that they cannot fail. But not so with the Christian. At first he is dogmatized into the belief of error, and made to think that God is angry with him; and his faith becomes the motive power which causes a state of factitious distress, while he believes the devil is at his heels, ready to topple him over into hell. Now believing in one direction is doubting in an opposite direction. Convince the sinner that—

"If in God he dare believe,
That faith will bring the power!"—

by which his sins are forgiven; then follows this act of faith, which is called the Christian's joy. The danger threatened is imaginary, and all the joy which comes from the faith that believes the danger passed is factitious. The sinner is dogmatized into the belief that God changes from a state of furious madness to one of love; and this is the plan of salvation by Jesus, the Christian theory of bliss eternal. The Christian says that man is "justified," "sanctified," and "saved by faith." There is no angry God, no Jesus, no atonement, no joy, no escape from hell and the devil, without this faith. Thus we see that there is in all the so-called "means of grace" nothing but a useless fright; and the Christian's joy is nothing more nor less than what comes from the faith that he is saved from a danger to which he never was really exposed. Now all such joy and "religious warmth" are unnatural, and no more to be compared with the joy which the Religion of Humanity affords a perfect manhood than the rushlight is to be compared with the sun in the heavens.

"But," say the believers in ancient mediumistic revelations, "what is your source of joy, that warms up your soul with emotions of cheerfulness and hope?" And I answer, it is in a knowledge and love of the truth! It is in the love of virtue for virtue's sake. Man cannot be conscious of any more elevating, real joy than that which comes from loving goodness for goodness' sake, loving justice for the sake of justice. Truthfulness, goodness and justice, loved and lived out in the relations of life, are virtue, and the highest form of religion.

When we say that the true and the best religion is free, it is the same as if we were to say, man is free, the human mind is free, to think and adopt its own methods for securing its own highest good and the highest good of the race. Hence, as man is free, his religion must be free; and we say this is Humanity's Religion, because it grows out of the love relations of life into which man is born. In these relations we find the authority for virtue, and those causes which give the sense of duty. Hence man needs no "revelation" from any other world. His duty binds him to this world; and were mediumistic revelations necessary for man's religion, then the race existed uncounted millions of years before man could have had any knowledge of virtue! But man's obligations to virtue are instinctive, and co-existent with his being. Indeed, he loves the good long before his reason is sufficiently developed to render him conscious of the causes why he does so. Humanity's religion is not only the first, the oldest, and free, but it is the most wide-spread, because the love of goodness is not only in every mind, but it precedes the dawn even of infancy, and expands and grows with manhood as the sun increases in brightness more and more unto the perfect day.

Real joy results from harmony with Nature's higher laws in all the relations of life. It arises from the love of virtue, and it consists in a consciousness of the highest good, for myself and the whole human race. It is perfect love, and a permanent sense of absolute safety from all real harm. It is a knowledge of the immanence of the Divine Love, Force, and Wisdom, which made me what I am, and upon which I rely without fear, because I am sure that these laws can never fail. They are without "the shadow of turning or any indication of change."

LA ROY SUNDERLAND.

THE TERM "INFIDEL."

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—On reading the recent articles on this topic, I have been again struck with the evidently similar opinions of the disputants, and the difference between the spirit and the letter. I think I should not acknowledge myself to be an "infidel" without defining the term; and this reminds me of a singularly apropos scene in "Shirley."—

"'It is not,' she resumed, much excited, 'it is not that I hate you; you are a good sort of man; perhaps you mean well in your way; but we cannot suit; we are ever at variance; you annoy me with small meddling, with petty tyranny; you exasperate my temper. As to your small maxims, your narrow rules, your little prejudices, aversions, dogmas, bundle them off.' Mr. Symptom—go; offer them as a sacrifice to the deity you worship. I'll none of them. I wash my hands of the lot. I walk by another faith, light, creed, and hope than you."

'Another creed! I believe she is an infidel!'

'An infidel to your religion; an atheist to your God.'

For the age in which "Shirley" was written, this is the deepest-dyed radicalism. If Charlotte Brontë's soul lives now (and I believe it does), I have no doubt that she takes a great deal of interest in THE INDEX.
W. H. D.

"WARMTH OF RELIGION."

NEW HARMONY, INDIANA, June 1, 1871.

"Life is real; life is earnest.
And the grave is not its goal."

Strange, very strange does it seem to me that intelligent, intellectual man, in this grand universe, should lack objects to draw out his warmest sympathies.

The sublimest worship to which Humanity can give expression is manifested in the aim or wish to understand the great laws which govern the universe, and to increase the knowledge of them among our fellow beings. Knowledge, as the truly cultured of our race understand, will give to society grander and nobler ideas of all duties and cause men to contemplate with wonder the perhaps unknowable Source of All. It will keep in exercise all the thinking and inquiring faculties of our nature,—a field for warmth, for expansion of mind, from which the bondage of every narrowing sect excludes.

Free Religion alone can remove every chain. Such for many years has been my conviction, and this conviction is confirmed by the course of events.

Yours truly,
CHARLES H. WHITE.

CHRISTIANITY—THE POPULAR AND THE REAL.

F. E. ABBOT:

My Dear Friend,—In this intended short letter I propose to state some convictions concerning Christianity and your own attitude in relation thereto. First allow me to remark that Christianity (the doctrine of Jesus and its correlative practices) is one thing, and what is popularly known and accepted as Christianity quite another. Thus I view the matter. The first, as intimated, embraces all that was taught by Jesus and his apostles, it being admitted at the same time that many or all, if you please, of his precepts may be found in the writings of the founders of all of the various religions that preceded it. The second is a conglomerate, and embraces amongst many of the most excellent, many also (not to say all) of the worst elements of all the religions of the past, so far at least as any knowledge of them is accessible at the present time. It is also an enduring conviction of my mind that all of the truths constituting genuine Christianity constituted primitively (that is, at the period of their institution) the bases of each and every one of what are now called heathen religions; and this is the substantial reason why so often a striking resemblance is found in the principal features of all religions, heathen or Christian.

I have often thought, when you have called attention to what you call your position outside of Christianity, that after all it is only outside of its substituted imposture, the foretold Apostate Church of our day.

The fundamental precept of the religion of Jesus involves the recognition of the Paternity of God and, the brotherhood of man in its universal aspect and character; but, inasmuch as the greater embraces the lesser, there is also a special element involved which recognizes the special brotherhood of those who embrace and apply or use the faith, in its universal character and quality. Even gospel salvation is not alone, "but especially, for those who believe."

The outsides of Christianity are naturalism (or materialism) and the substitute for Christianity profanely called by its name; and this is the most stupendous fraud ever yet imposed upon the ignorance and credulity of man. First, because it is a SUBSTITUTE, and so bad an imitation, that it ought never to have deceived any body; and secondly, because it embraces in its demands a belief in utter impossibilities, which cannot be believed, and are as impossible with God as with man. Of what avail, then, would it be even to demonstrate this to those who would seek to evade it, by assuming that even impossibilities are possible with God? This would stultify the evidences of our God-constituted senses and God-given faculties.

The veritable religion of Jesus never was popular in the world, either before or since it was associated with and was baptized in his name. The meaning embodied in his saying—"few there be that find it," is as true now as when he uttered it, and for the identical reason assigned, that popular errors and their embodiments are more congenial ("they love darkness rather than light") with the cravings of the many, who are therefore drawn into the maelstrom of legitimately begotten consequences.

That which is sometimes adduced as evidence of the baseness of his teaching is by no means the weakest evidence of its grand and all-embracing character and estimable quality, namely, his entire repudiation of the obligations of all natural ties, holding the spiritual as of the first and almost only consideration, but subsequently admitting all into the same fellowship, and thus, by fulfilling the spirit of the law, fulfilling it in its true letter also. Doubtless all this was known in the world long before the advent of Jesus; but it had become obsolete at the time, as now, and his preaching was only a rediscovery of the truth, and its attempted enforcement by its own inherent power.

But I shall occupy too much space, and therefore abruptly close this, with the remark that I too am so far outside of popular Christianity, that I am never seen in it. Cordially thine, K. N.

PRE-NATAL MURDER.

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y., May 22, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—A lady of the gospel faith, mother of three fine daughters, called on me not long since, smiling with confidence as she requested me to assist her in the destruction of her unborn offspring. "I have been taking female pills for nearly two months without effect. Do not tell my husband, or any one, that I came to you for such a purpose, but be sure you help me out of my trouble and I will pay you well." Yes, my dear woman, you have come to just the right man. I am very glad to see you, and hope you will follow only my suggestions. You know I do not believe in endless misery as a punishment for sin, and therefore have no fear from that source. Nor do I fear anything but myself and my own remorse. God is Love; and why should we fear Infinite Love? But should I do as you wish, murder your unborn, I should have no better thought in memory of the deed, than that I am a murderer. The only way I can devise to avoid the torment of such a thought is to decline your request. As I am naturally of a benevolent turn of mind, I will tell you how you can accomplish your design, and come out faithful in the sight of an evangelical God and a Christian society. Three seats from where you sit in church on Sunday, you can see a physician worshipping and believing the same faith you do: who loves church and money better than human life, or an inward peace of mind. Go, offer him money, and he will fulfil your request. And when it is executed, and your mind is again free from the natural trouble of child-bearing, you and the Doctor can repent of the crime, and go on your way rejoicing in the Blood of Christ which washes all your sins away.

Should you change your mind, and believe as I do, you may have the maternal pleasure of receiving from this child, when grown to manhood or womanhood, the last drop of water, the last words of kindness and many pleasing attentions which so often bless the hour of death. And better than all else experienced on this earth, will be that pure love of a true mother's heart. Willing obedience to God's natural laws, when morally and intellectually understood, will bring to mothers their greatest earthly happiness.

TITUS L. BROWN.

How WAR INTERFERES WITH MISSIONS.—A correspondent of the London Times at the Prussian headquarters writes as follows:

"Last mail I received a letter from Egypt, in which there was a remark which struck me greatly—'How can you Christians,' asked the writer, 'expect us to pay the least attention to your missionaries, when we read of two of your greatest nations making war and committing all sorts of cruelties on each other, although you declare it is against your book to do so, and other great Christian nations not at war are making preparations for it and are in fear of being attacked? We, afar off, read and hear of your doings and beg you will keep your missionaries at home.'"

GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION.—Sectarian bigots are anxious that their idea of God should be recognized in the Constitution of the United States. He is the Constitution of the Universe, and will govern it, including the United States, by immutable law, without any assistance from those who have never recognized him where he is most manifest—IN THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

Recognize the citizenship of Woman in the Constitution of the United States, and more of God will be inserted therein than all the creeds of Christendom contain!—Dean Clark, in the Banner of Light.

"No man in England thinks of blacking his own boots," said a self-sufficient Englishman to Abraham Lincoln. "Whose boots do they black?" was the quiet rejoinder of the facetious President.

A mother had repeatedly called her little son to come and say his prayers, as it was bed time. Finally he stopped his play and said: "What's the matter, mamma? Is God in a hurry?"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WANTED—A SITUATION. The subscriber, who has had several years experience in teaching such studies as are generally pursued at Massachusetts High Schools, and also in giving piano-forte lessons, would accept a moderate compensation at a place where Bible-reading is not required in school, and where no attempt would be made to interfere with his religious convictions or with the management of his school. Address A. D. JACKSON, care of SAMUEL JACKSON, JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS. 78-88

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.: or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

ABSTRACT OF COLENO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLLENO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (allike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38yl

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE,

BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,

Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.

D. G. FRANCIS,

17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

75-87

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE $1.50.

64-78

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHAMBERLAIN, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on the "RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

THE ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Samaj;" also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England;" and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called). I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character? The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other. The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers. God's Justice and Mercy. Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all. Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery. Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended. Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father. Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People. What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People. Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman. Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear. The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing. Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.

Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.

"It Injures Our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion? Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God. These four for 10 cents.

70tf

CHAS. K. WHIPPLE, 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is TWO DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

Lecky's History of European Morals, 2 vols. . . . $6.00
Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols. . . 5.00
Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols. 5.00
Weiss's Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, 2 volumes. 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870 (price $2.50). Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

Darwin's Origin of Species, price. $2.00
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price. 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by Matthew Arnold, price. . . . 2.00
Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, with portrait, price. . . 2.00
Any volume of the writings of Theodore Parker or Henry D. Thoreau, each. 2.00
On the Heights, Auerbach. 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names. $50 in Greenbacks.
For 50 Names. $25 in Greenbacks.
For 25 Names. $15 in Greenbacks.
For 10 Names. $5 in Greenbacks.
For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,

LOCK BOX 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.	1
What is Free Religion?	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.	7
Sunday Schools.	8
Friendship	9
Grief and its Compensations.	11
The Hebrew Prophets.	12
Capital Punishment.	13
Human Ideals.	14
The Essence of Religion.	15
The Management of Children.	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. R. S. D.	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).	17
The Candle of the Lord.	18
Public Opinion.	19
Conscience.	20
The Pedigree of Man.	21
"Following Christ"	22
The Tongue.	23
The Golden Age.	24
What is Truth?	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Zee. W. W. Williams.	27
The Sunday Question.	28
Motes and Beams.	29
The Dove's Departure.	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.	31
Religious Freedom.	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.	33
Noise.	34
The Humility of Free Religion.	35
Chaos and Cosmos.	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.	38
War and Free Religion.	39
Religious Revivals.	40
Mary and Martha.	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.	42
Success.	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".	44
Spiritual Beauty.	45
The Book of Daniel.	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.	49
Parties and Party Spirit.	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.	52
Transient and Permanent.	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 26.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JULY 1, 1871.

WHOLE No. 79.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE VOYSEY CASE.

FROM AN HERETICAL STAND-POINT.

[By Rev. Moncure D. Conway, of London.]

If the National Church is unable to fill its pews, it has at least succeeded of late in filling the air with gossip. Its recent history has been a series of public scandals. The excommunication of a heretic is followed by the insult of the Bishops to a Unitarian invited by themselves to assist in the revision of the received version of the Bible, and this is succeeded by the legal reprimand of a Ritualist, all combining to impress the country with the idea that the Establishment has come to a pass when "apostolic blows and knocks" have become the normal condition of its existence. The most salient feature in the most important of these events was, perhaps, its inevitableness. The most zealous adherents of the church plainly recognized that, if Mr. Voysey were brought to trial, orthodoxy could not gain its case except at a heavy cost. They saw that the trial would be the means of circulating the heretic's opinions, and would invest him with the eminence of a martyr. But the church had no choice. If a clergyman with such views could retain his pulpit, there could be no reason why Socinians or simple Theists should not close their several chapels, and reinforce the rationalistic party in the church to an extent that would destroy its distinctive character and supernatural authority altogether. So the church was placed at the mercy of the Vicar of Healaugh, and could only be saved from reviving an antiquated procedure, sure to injure itself more than him, by the quiet resignation which he refused to accord. There is a Bavarian fable of a boy gathering strawberries, who treated with rudeness an aged woman who met him with a petition for some berries. In return for this unkindness the old woman gave the boy a fine casket, out of which, however, when the boy opened it, came two small worms, which grew in size until they coiled about the boy's limbs, and drew him far, and ever farther, into the dark forest, where he still wanders in the toils of the mighty serpents. The myth may express more than the lesson of Bavarian mothers that small sins swell into fatal habits; it may describe the miserable necessities which, in the course of time, may be evolved from the rich casket of power obtained by a church for its scorn of reason. Bound fast in the toils of that superstition and bigotry which it has preferred to progress and charity, it is drawn into the dark forest to which its selected masters belong, and cannot free itself even at the bidding of obvious self-interest. The trial came, and with it the incidents which have filled all heretics with delight. For some days Mr. Voysey virtually edited the London papers, and turned the Times into a rationalistic tract. There was enough orthodox irritation at this, but it is difficult to rage a fact out of existence. Nor can it be shown that this advantage was unfairly gained by Mr. Voysey and his fellow-freethinkers. This charge has been made in various quarters, and, since it involves the chief features of importance in the case, it may be well to consider it more closely.

Soon after the judgment of the Privy Council was delivered, the Times in a leading article atoned for the wide publicity which it had been the chief means of giving to the views of the heretic, by a remonstrance which states the case of those who censure Mr. Voysey's position plainly enough. The Times says:—

"Before the most conspicuous tribunal in the world—for Rome itself can show no such hearings, no such judgment, or so many readers—Mr. Voysey preaches the Universal Creator and the Loving Father of all, in clear and lucid contrariety to every doctrine that could seem to contradict, qualify, or obscure the first teaching of Nature, and, as he believes, the essential truth of Holy Writ. Nobody can complain that Mr. Voysey has this seeming advantage. Ours is an atmosphere of discussion. It is our boast to try all things, and hold fast to that which is good and true. But if Mr. Voysey, and free inquirers in general, may be congratulated upon a success which is the very utmost they can have expected,—the success of a fair trial and world-wide publicity,—it remains to doubt whether this success, such as it is, has been lawfully obtained, and whether Mr. Voysey's position be as good as he believes his teaching to be. Had he any right to deny all the distinctive doctrines of his church, claiming at the same time to be held an honest subscriber and faithful minister, with no other possible hope than that he might thereby proclaim his denial the louder and further to all the world? We cannot think so."

Passing by the naive confession implied in this passage, that the eminent prosecutors and the Lord Chancellor cannot hope to gain by publicity as much advantage for their orthodox views, as Mr. Voysey for his heresies, let us examine the main charge brought against the integrity of the expelled Vicar's position. It is no secret that Mr. Voysey had to make up his mind to press his appeal between parties which urged him to anticipate an inevitable sentence by a surrender, and those who besought him to demand the decision which has been obtained. The latter party probably regarded the course they advised as perfectly consistent with a belief that, even if Mr. Voysey had gained his case, it would have been his truest course to leave the church. Even if it could be shown that, by means of legal technicalities, a teacher of Mr. Voysey's opinions could manage to escape expulsion from the church, the far greater moral question remains, whether a man of earnest convictions, especially one who believes it is his especial task to maintain them publicly, is justifiable in adhering to formularies plainly not framed to represent those convictions, and, at best, capable of expressing them only by strained and unusual interpretations. But conceding that the thirty-nine articles are not the honest physiognomy of Mr. Voysey's faith, there were other elements in the relation in which he found himself to the church which rendered the practical question of duty far more complex than the theory of his accusers admits. It is by no means the whole of Mr. Voysey's case that he courted the publicity which a trial would secure for his views. As Vicar he was related not only to the church, but to the nation of people which that church is endeavoring to enlist in its service. His position made him for the moment the representative and spokesman of the religious rationalism of England, and the only one who could demand and wring from the church an answer to a question of paramount importance to every free inquirer in the land. The question is, What is the exact price which the National Church demands for its advantages? How much of the young man's freedom, how much of his natural reason and conscience, must be laid down at this step and at that step on the path of promotion?

Undoubtedly, it is deplorable that there should be any such question as this, but that it exists is not the fault of the rationalists in the country, but of the church itself. If the terms of the contract between the clergyman and the church have become so confused that it is no longer certain whether an entrance to holy orders signifies an acceptance of the articles in their ordinary sense, it is because the church itself has long been indulging its eminent beneficiaries in heresy. Such indulgence has not been without advantages to the church. If the church had, during the last two generations, separated, like sheep and goats, all who held to the creeds and articles in their popular sense, and those who subscribed them under unusual interpretations, it would certainly have lost the prelates and scholars who have most reached the heart of the people and won the attention of the world. But if it is an advantage for a church to be represented in the world of thought and literature by such men as Whately, Arnold, Baden Powell, Thirlwall, Stanley, Jowett, Maurice, and Kingsley, this is an advantage that, like every other, has to be paid for. The church has long paid for the champions thus drawn from the literary and philosophical classes by offering them terms upon which they could enjoy the large opportunities it could give them for their congenial work. This indulgence of heresy was extended even to the protection of the writers of the Essays and Reviews,—a book which denied the supernatural authority of the Bible, the depravity of man, the benefit of Foreign Missions, and miracles, and whose heresies were so formidable that even the American Unitarians declined to republish it in that country. And when the prosecution against Bishop Colenso also failed, it seemed as if there was no limit to the toleration of free thought in the church. The Unitarian and Theistic Chapels seemed left without a raison d'être, and such young men as were inclined to the ministry were freely saying, "Surely we can have no fear in entering a church which tolerates Arian and Theistic bishops, Darwinian deans, and Socialistic canons."

But inside and outside of the church there has been an increasing perception that this state of things was morally indefensible. The increase of casuistry was a ruinous rate at which to obtain toleration in the Establishment, and the prospect of securing a church representing all phases of religious thought was marred by the danger that such an institution when it came would equally represent the average Jesuitism of the nation. The real believers in the articles in their obvious sense, and they who utterly rejected them, alike felt that Dr. Colenso and Dr. Wilberforce could sit upon the same episcopal bench only by some mere trick, and to one or the other the creed was not a real face but a mask. Rumors were afloat to feed the misgivings of sincere men of all beliefs. It was whispered that one divine was in the habit of shifting the reading of prayers to his subordinates, and that a certain bishop was in the habit of prefacing his reading of the creeds with the announcement that he read them not as a believer in them, but as an officer of the Queen. It is creditable to the honesty of the country that those who were interested in keeping the standard of church orthodoxy vague, were not strong enough to overcome the determination that vagueness should end, and if the apparent policy of the church to embrace all varieties of opinion were proved to be final, that its formularies should be altered to suit the fact. To compel this issue and decision no case could have been more opportune than that of Mr. Voysey. The church had indeed tolerated all his heresies, but it had tolerated them as distributed through many individuals, each of whom held his segment of rationalism in connection with such an eminent or even courtly following, or held it with such dexterity of statement, that he could not be made a fair test, and remained in the church as its bait for clever young men. But all these heresies converged at last in one man. The honest orthodoxy of the church at last saw all the Broad Church heresies with one neck, that neck being Rev. Charles Voysey's; and the outside world saw that the destiny of the church depended upon whether that neck could be cut off or not.

This, then, was a much greater aim than that mere publicity for his opinions which, the Times says, was the utmost success Mr. Voysey could hope to obtain. He and his friends aimed to compel the Church to show its hand, and their right—their duty—to do so was as clear as their intention was manifest. Are we told that a man ought not, and need not, to enter holy orders without knowing distinctly the terms of the contract to which he commits himself, and that if he discovers afterwards that he cannot fulfil his part of it he should quietly resign the corresponding advantages? To this it may be replied (1.) that, for the reasons already stated, the clergyman cannot—or hitherto could not—know just what he was committing himself to. The Church itself, by the retention of the more eminent or dexterous heretics, has confused the sense of subscription at the very moment that it has increased the inducements to it. Does the subscriber commit himself to the opinions of Dr. Pusey or Professor Jowett?—to those of Dr. Liddon or those of Dean Stanley? It is not the Voyseys who have produced this confusion. Nay, (2.) so far from aiding the young divinity-student, before whom the same Church lays the Essays and Reviews and the Prayer-book, to avoid the error of committing himself to its work prematurely, it waylays him at a period of life when his future conclusions cannot be foreseen, and with proffered fellowships and livings bribes him to take the dangerous step. If he hesitate, the Church eagerly rebukes his hesitation, and lures him on to the false position, instead of encouraging the utmost caution. From the first moment that it gets hold of a single finger of him the Church watches him jealously to manipulate his mind for its own purposes. No sooner does the student begin to follow Archbishop Whately's advice, and misgives that he may not mistake, than the Church addresses itself to the work of repressing the misgivings, and furthering the mistake until it is irretrievable. No sooner does the youth begin to doubt and inquire than he is surrounded by inquiring friends and sighing parsons, who grieve over him and pray over him, until, envying perhaps the old martyrs who were simply burnt, the sensitive heart yields itself to fetters forged from its own affections. If any one thinks that this is an exaggerated statement of the fact, let him read the life of Dr. Arnold, written by Dr. Stanley. A sceptic from boyhood, Arnold no sooner turned his eyes upon the doctrine of a Trinity than he doubted it. Straightway clerical friends whisper, and mourn over him as if he had been guilty of some crime, and at length they hit upon a plan for him. It is not to warn him that if he enters the Church it will be a risk to his own character, and a danger to the Church: the scheme is,—and John Keble is to be credited with it,—Let us make haste and harness Arnold in the Church! Before he has time to think any more, get him a living, and committed to parish work! (3.) The youth thus bribed and ensnared into the Church, if, as in the case of Mr. Voysey and many others, he discover that he is out of his place, has been seriously wronged. The best years of his preparation for the work of life have been devoted to a career which he must now abandon; and this grave injury is enhanced by the grossly unjust disabilities which legally close against one who had entered holy orders the awards of political life, and the professions in which his special studies might still be of some service.

These, then, are the facts which have to be considered in estimating the rights and duties of a man in the position of Mr. Voysey, who, having entered the ministry of the church in good faith, arrives at conclusions whose consistency with the articles he has subscribed is questionable. Surely he has a right to decide how he can make the misstep, for which he is in the smallest degree responsible, the most conspicuous warning to other young men who are being lured into holy orders, of the fetters that await them; and it is difficult to see how he could do so more effectually than by compelling the Lord Chancellor to pronounce solemnly that the simple and clear views of natural religion held by himself are forbidden to the beneficiaries of the National Church. The decision is given, and our feet rest upon truth more firmly than before.

It remains to inquire whether that decision, while showing us more clearly where we stand, reveals a moral and religious state of things worthy of England, or worthy of the intelligence and the conscience of this age.

To what does the judgment of the Lord Chancellor amount?

It distinctly affirms, 1, that "Christ bore the punishment due to our sins, and suffered in our stead," and that "He was crucified to reconcile His Father to us (that is, to mankind), and was a sacrifice,"—sacrifice also being defined as an "offering to God." 2. It asserts the existence of "original or birth sin," that such sin "exists in every one descended from Adam;" that children are by nature "children of God's wrath;" and that it was for this original sin that Christ was a sacrifice. 3. It re-affirms the Nicene and Athanasian creeds, the doctrine of a Trinity, and declares that Jesus was supernaturally conceived, that he is to be worshipped as God, and that he will return as Judge of the earth on the last day. 4. It declares that no clergyman has a right, "upon his own taste and judgment, to assert that whole passages of the canonical books are without any authority whatever," or can "expound one part of Scripture as repugnant to another." These points represent the substance of the thirteen counts which have been sustained in the indictment against Mr. Voysey. They represent the plain creed freshly labelled upon every clergyman who stands in a pulpit of the National Church.

No one can read the passages from Mr. Voysey's Sling and Stone, which are held to be in contravention with the above creed, without recognizing that they are such as are familiar in the writings of the Broad Church clergy. No one acquainted with the teachings of the leaders of that school can doubt that the new heretic has fed upon them, or that he honestly represents the substance and tendency of their belief. It may be doubted whether Mr. Voysey, before leaving the church, might not have very properly availed himself of the opportunity for retraction offered him, and asserted that he believed the Thirty-nine Articles as they are interpreted by the distinguished theologians and officials of the church, whose opinions he quoted in his defence. When he offered those quotations, the court, unable to break their force, evaded it by saying that the line of argument implied that it should try the cases of each of the distinguished divines in question. The evasion was sufficient for the convenience of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; but it was insufficient to alter the fact that the court was necessarily trying the divines in question, and was compelled to sentence them along with Mr. Voysey. To each and all of them,—bishops, deans, canons, clergymen,—the Church and State with authoritative voice have said, "You hold your positions illegally and dishonestly, unless you believe that God is an angry and jealous monarch, and man a child of Satan, and unless you believe unreservedly all the statements contained in the Bible."

One word further about the offer to Mr. Voysey of any opportunity for retraction. How grand and worthy a proposition is this for a church representing the national morals to make! Only say you believe what you do not believe, says the church, and you are quite welcome to our pulpit! If Mr. Voysey had followed the example of Cranmer, and put forward a retraction to be itself retracted at the end, one can imagine its character to be somewhat as follows:—

"I hereby renounce and deplore my wicked belief that God is a loving Father. I affirm, on the contrary, my faith that He is a jealous and wrathful being, who will torture untold millions of men, women, and children by fire for ever. I hold accursed my former belief, that God is just and merciful, and affirm that even the eating of a piece of forbidden apple by a man who lived six thousand years ago, was enough to make Him damn the whole human race to eternal misery,—a curse which would have been carried into execution, had it not been for the timely interference of a certain Pontius Pilate, who, assisted by one Judas, sacrificed to God the blood of the most innocent being in the world, the sight of which blood so pleased God, that He was prevailed upon to save from the said damnation a select few at least of mankind. Asking forgiveness of the Church for all I have said to the contrary, I now declare my implicit belief that a certain Jewish peasant was born 1871 years ago without a human father, and that he was Almighty God. Also that three are one, and one is three. I believe that a serpent in Eden and Balaam's ass talked, and that Jonah resided three days and three nights in a whale's belly, whence he emerged quite safe. I believe that soothsayers turned rods to snakes; in the existence of sorcerers and witches and devils. I believe that all new-born babes are totally depraved, and that God looks upon them with feelings of anger. And finally, I believe that all who do not believe these things shall without doubt perish everlastingly!"

This is a retraction which every eminent clergyman of the Broad Church really makes in the hearing of the world every time he ascends the pulpit, or officiates in any way, since the Lord Chancellor's judgment. No protest against that judgment can tear off the creed which now adheres to each of them, plainly legible in the eyes of the world. There it will adhere until they can reverse the judgment, or bring themselves to say with John Sterling—Adieu, O Church! The world will await with anxiety, perhaps with some sternness, their action. It may sympathise with them as they approach the dreags of their cup, but the situation admits of no concealment, and the truth cannot be compromised. Mr. Voysey is their child. They have nourished and reared him. Whatever may be their views of the dogma of vicarious suffering, there will be no doubt as to their willingness to shelter themselves under it in earthly matters, if they shall now stand quietly by and see this one man suffer for sins of which they are all equally guilty. If they can do so, it will at least be necessary to define clerical honor as something different from common honor.

But in what position does this trial place the Church as a claimant to represent the national standards of morality and religion! The morality of its invitation to Mr. Voysey to deny his faith in order to fit himself for further ministerial work, has already been alluded to; but what shall be said of the implied standard of the Church as to the religious qualifications of a clergyman? The Church has weighed this heretic, and made manifest to the world what kind of man he is. It has been the means of revealing to us a zealous and devoted minister, whose love for God and man is such that he was anxious to continue in an obscure field of labor, with no payment but a parsonage and £108 per annum, though he had a wife, eight children, and an aged mother to support. It has revealed him as a man of earnestness, honesty, fidelity, ability, of fine acquirements, and of unquestioned piety and character. Such qualities as these any living Church would search far to discover; and when found, treasure as the noblest that could make a minister to men and women. But to these qualities the Church of England says—Depart! We have no place or task for such traits as these. What we desire is not the earnest boldness of conviction, but concealment and casuistry; not learning, but superstition; not character and humanity, but orthodoxy,—orthodoxy, pretended or real, we do not much care which!

When Anaxagoras was told, "The Athenians have condemned you to die," he replied, "and Nature them." It is not difficult to see that, as the Church has judged, so is it judged, and that its heavier sentence has fallen upon its own head.

THE RELATIONS OF CERTAIN PROMINENT PERSONAGES.—We are quite shocked to find so grave and scholastic a journal as the Herald assuring us that it was "the famous Berkeley who said that the battle of Waterloo put back the clock of progress half a century." It was not half a century, which is only fifty years, but sixty-two years that this "clock was put back," since Bishop Berkeley died in 1753 and Waterloo was fought in 1815. Bishop Berkeley is not commonly thought to have survived his burial, notwithstanding the immaterialism of his philosophy. The person who really made the admirable remark so happily cited by the Herald was Bishop Laud, who let it fall in a conversation with William the Conqueror, at Berkeley Castle, shortly after the determination of Napoleon Bonaparte to marry the daughter of Pope Pius VII., in the futile hope, as it proved, of reconciling the Emperor Nicholas, of Russia, with the Reformed Dutch Church of Houston, in Texas. Berkeley Castle, we may add, shortly afterward passed by the female line into the possession of Cardinal Wolsey, who established there a famous school for educating neglected grandmothers to suck eggs.—N. Y. World.

THE LATE DECISION OF THE COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL.

IN THE CASE OF THE REV. CHAS. VOYSEY, VICAR OF HEALAUGH.

[A sermon by Rev. J. D. La Touche, preached in the parish church of Stokesay, England, Feb. 19, 1871.]

"With me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you or of man's judgment; yea, I judge not mine own self: for I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified, but he that judgeth me is the Lord." 1 Cor. iv. 3, 4.

There never was, perhaps, a time when a preacher in the Church of England had more occasion to revert to the principle contained in these words than the present.

They are the words of a man who knew that his teaching was not acceptable to many of those he taught, but who felt that his mission was a higher than any which human power could confer—of one who was face to face with time-honored rites and customs, and modes of thought, fast withering before the purer light of an advancing morality—of one who, however, had made up his mind not to be awed by these opposing forces, but to speak what he knew in his heart to be the truth at all hazards. He therefore appeals to a higher than any human sanction; he will not allow himself to be judged by any man, yea, he will not pass judgment on himself; he appeals to his God who can make manifest the counsels of the heart, the secret springs of our motives, ay, of those springs which are a mystery and a marvel to ourselves.

What we know of St. Paul is quite in accordance with the sentiment of this passage; he acted practically upon it, and, regardless of fierce opposition and persecution, he kept firmly before him, throughout his career, his high mission. That the world, from time to time, needs men of such a spirit, history fully proves. The cause is clear; the old order continually changes, giving place to more light and more knowledge. God perpetually is revealing himself by enlightening men's minds with ever-brightening rays of his own most glorious nature. In the time of our Lord, the changes from the narrow and, in many cases, heathenish practices of the Jewish ceremonial, was closely connected with the more extended intercourse which then was springing into existence with the rest of the world, whereby old Jewish prejudices and caste were to be abolished. Then, again, the Reformation in England and on the Continent was closely connected with the diffusion of books consequent on the discovery of the art of printing. The power of Rome could not withstand the mental energy of those who read and thought for themselves. And, to come to our own time, it is not difficult to see whence comes the mighty ferment which undoubtedly is going on deeply and silently in the hearts of thousands. It is from the vast progress which true science has been making, even within the memory of most men—true science, which takes account of facts, not fancies; which simply, honestly, and truthfully applies the laws discovered by careful induction, to explain the various phenomena of nature, without that presumptuous attempt, so often made in an age just past, to build up baseless theories, and even compel acquiescence in them.

The age has not very long past when the motions of the heavenly bodies were believed to be under the control of a capricious will that might be influenced by incantations and spells, and that they had, on the other hand, a marvellous effect on human affairs. In many houses in this country are even still to be seen almanacs which profess to predict the future from the positions of the stars. Such books can only have weight with the most ignorant; any one who has any information can tell that there is no connection whatever between the two. What has dispelled these delusions? It is the progress of scientific knowledge. The Chinese think that when an eclipse of the sun takes place, a great dragon has seized upon the luminary, and they try, by incantations and prayers, to avert its utter destruction. This leads to superstition and servile submission to priests; and all such false views do the same; they engender superstition and the debasement of the mind. Those who think that human affairs are affected by the motions of the stars, must inevitably be at the mercy of false alarms, and, tracing events to causes with which they have no connection whatever, they cannot have that "quiet mind" and confidence in the eternal purposes of God which is so necessary to their serving him with steadfastness and perfect trust.

The age has not yet passed away, either, when to doubt the existence of a personal devil or that of the eternity of hell and everlasting torments is considered a symptom of a licentious and even atheistical turn of mind. The age, however, has passed when that which was the direct result and product of these notions can be persecuted with fire and sword—men and women can no longer be burnt and drowned for practising witchcraft. But it is not so very long ago that they might.

Now, what is the reason of this change? It is the progress of true science. Science has dispelled these phantoms of darkness and ignorance. Science is the teaching by which God has led the human race to abandon these monstrous and ultimately degrading ideas—has emancipated us from false terrors, and taught us that His laws are immutable, and that we can therefore implicitly trust to him, which we could not do, if we were at the mercy of caprice and chance.

Nor is it likely that this great advance which has within the last hundred years taken place in human thought and knowledge should leave any subject which could be brought before the mind, unaffected. The light brought to bear upon ancient historical events is entirely different to that which in ages past was deemed sufficient to establish them. Hitherto men have been satisfied with a very different amount of evidence for any historical fact to that which they demand now. Not many years ago the marvellous stories related in the early histories of Greece and Rome were thought to have at least some foundation in fact. But now they have, by means of scientific criticism, been reduced to their true proportion. They have been for the most part shown to be mere myths or legends, curious and interesting, indeed, but unworthy of any positive credence. Nor could we expect the articles of faith could either escape this universal effect. Like those eternal forces which are for ever acting on the surface of our earth, and moulding, carving out its valleys, and grinding down the hardest rocks to powder—the stream of science must flow onwards, influencing each subject of human thought, and if it cannot mould it by gentle action, will at last break through it with resistless violence.

Such is, such must be the case with the formularies of the Church—the Articles and Creeds and Liturgy. Unless from time to time they are brought into conformity with the demands of progressive reason and experience, they must share the fate of all things—especially of all human devices. Those who have travelled abroad tell us of vast structures called aqueducts, reared by the Romans to convey water into their great cities, but which are now mouldering year after year to decay: thus it is with the wisest and best devised of human plans. These articles and formularies were no doubt appointed for the spiritual good of the Church. Like the aqueducts of the Romans, they were made for the conveyance to all its members of a life-giving spring; but now too often they serve no such purpose; to attempt to resuscitate them is to set at nought the lessons which God has during all these ages been teaching the human race. The effort to restore them to their ancient purpose must be to precipitate their own downfall.

Within the last week a judgment has been passed by the highest Court of Appeal in the case of the Rev. Charles Voysey, the Vicar of Healaugh, upon which I must make some remarks, since it is not unknown to most in this parish that for my part I very cordially agree with many of the views held by that clergyman, and it may therefore naturally appear to them that the same judgment which condemns him, also condemns me; and that if he is obliged, in consequence of this judgment, as he is, to give up his living, I and others who, on the whole, agree with him, are also bound voluntarily to do the same. I think it is therefore only just and right, and a clear duty to my congregation, to state what course I have, so far, made up my mind to pursue in this difficult and trying matter.

I feel that in prospect of so serious a step, I have two things to think of—1st, My duty to the Church, of which I am a minister; and 2nd, My duty in a more worldly point of view. In relation to this last, I shall only say that I am sensible it ought to be quite subordinate to the former. No worldly consideration ought to make a man decline a clear duty; and knowing how weak my nature is, and how easily influenced by such thoughts, I can only pray earnestly that in the future, strength may be given me to act aright, if it is necessary to make so serious a choice.

But as for my duty to the Church, it is of course regulated by the promises I made when I was ordained. The chief of these have relation to a clergyman's duty as a preacher. He engages "to be ready with all faithful diligence to drive away all erroneous and strange doctrines contrary to God's word," and "to teach nothing as required of necessity to eternal salvation, but that which he is persuaded may be concluded and proved by the Scripture."

Now, very few words are necessary to expound these promises. The final and sole arbiter of truth with any man must be his own mind; indeed, this is clearly recognised in these words. Even those who believe in the infallibility of the Church have arrived at that final abandonment of the right of private judgment by an act of private judgment itself. Therefore when a clergyman vows to drive out strange doctrine, if he acts conscientiously on that promise, he must from time to time warn his hearers against what seems to him—"what he is persuaded"—is wrong in doctrine or practice: he must do this to the best of his ability, without consulting what may or may not be agreeable to them, but as nearly as he can in accordance with his own perception of what is true. He must use all means, of course, within his reach to guide his judgment; he is much to be blamed if he does not do so, if he forms hasty or rash conclusions; but once having deliberately and conscientiously convinced himself of the truth of his teaching, he is bound to declare it at all hazards, otherwise he is not acting up to his solemn ordination promise, to say nothing of his giving up the high position claimed by St. Paul for a teacher of religion.

Such has been my desire and effort since the day I made that solemn ordination vow; at the cost of a good deal of pain, I have done so, for it is a painful thing to speak what you know is opposed to the feelings and opinions of those whom you address. Not that instances were wanting, on the part of some of this congregation of a cordial approval of the views I have taught; such have existed and have helped greatly to support me in the course which I have pursued. Still, I cannot blind myself to the fact that these views must have appeared strange and even wrong to many (perhaps the majority); and I cannot express too earnestly the thankfulness I feel, that through evil and good report (for we have had to endure both), a good and kindly feeling has ever existed between my parishioners and myself in all our more intimate personal relations and intercourse.

I say, then, that from my point of view, a clergyman's plain duty is to preach what on due research he believes to be true, and to leave to his superiors the task, if necessary, of correcting him. If every clergyman were to throw up his living or cure whenever it seemed to himself or his neighbors that his views were not in exact accordance with those of the Prayer-book, probably, as the Dean of Westminster has well said, all would have to leave the Church, from the Archbishop to the Curate, since there is not one whose every view is exactly consistent with the multifarious teaching contained in the Articles and the Liturgy. The only resource, the only alternative is to throw the burden of enforcing compliance to their dogmas on the constituted authorities. The Bishops and their courts, and at the present time the Committee of Privy Council, are for this very purpose, and, for one, I shall not relieve them of their office; I shall not try myself and excommunicate myself when there are the regularly appointed means, if I have erred to perform those duties. One may well quote here a passage in the life of St. Paul; the magistrates of Thyatira had imprisoned and beaten in an illegal manner Paul and Silas, and when they discovered the mistake they had made, tried to get rid of them quietly, sending word to the keeper of the prison in which they were confined, to let them go. But Paul said unto them, "They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison, and now do they thrust us out privily? Nay, verily, but let them come themselves and fetch us out."

Human nature is the same now as then, and this is the course which many of the authorities in the Church would gladly have those pursue who think otherwise than they do; they would have them leave quietly and in peace. But the same answer may suffice now as then, "nay, verily, let them come and put us out."

And one word with regard to the judgment which has just been given; I, for one, do not complain of it. It was, perhaps, as some say, inevitable. It is not as yet at all clear to me what its ultimate consequences may be, but it is important to observe that the Committee has been careful to declare that discussion on the authenticity of Scripture, or even the divinity of Christ, is not forbidden by the Church. They also allow that a clergyman is justified in trying to correct popular errors on such points. For my part, I thankfully accept these admissions of liberty to discuss such points. It seems to me that most erroneous views are abroad on both of them. Some worship the Bible as if it were some magical book descended direct from heaven, and some pay to Christ an adoration which is quite inconsistent with Christ's own doctrines, and his plainest words, and which in some cases becomes a kind of sensual idolatry. It will therefore be, from time to time, as occasion seems to call for it, my endeavor to warn you against these unfounded and false views, and to set before you the true nature and function of Scripture, as well as the true nature of Christ as our Brother, and that, as he taught, we are children of the same Eternal Father. If any of these views are wrong, I shall only be too thankful to be corrected at any cost. But as long as I am spared to speak from this place, I shall not say what I do not think, or square my words to disguise important truths. And if hereafter I am unfortunately obliged for any reasons to abandon my post as a clergyman, I can only say, "Unhappy Church, which cannot bear the light of free and honest discussion!"

But the truth is, such a Church could not exist very long. Let it once be fully understood that the clergy are maintained and paid to support tenets which can not bear discussion, there must soon be an end of all confidence in them or the system they belong to. Whether such be, as some say it is, the real effect of the recent judgment remains to be seen. In the meantime it would seem to be a plain duty, which, with the help of God, I mean to follow, to speak what I think, and to leave to my Ecclesiastical superiors the duty, if need be, of correcting me. Nor can I ever complain, should any of this congregation feel aggrieved by my teaching, if they should appeal to the proper authorities in such matters for redress.

And now, my friends, I have done; it seemed to me right and necessary, to speak thus plainly to you upon this matter, in consequence of the late judgment, which no doubt affects us most materially.

Let me conclude by saying how deeply I feel the responsibility cast upon me in my present post. But in this I would follow the Apostle's words, "I judge not mine own self, for I know nothing by (or against) myself, yet I am not hereby justified, but he that judgeth me is the Lord." Above all human rites and formularies, above all courts of law and courts of appeal, is the great God, to whom, as thinking and rational creatures, we owe our first allegiance. Therefore while we are fully prepared to accord to "the powers that be" all the deference and submission which is their due, our first duty is to him who can alone judge the motives of the heart, to him who can alone judge whether we have truth or error on our side, who can alone determine whether the doctrine we preach is hay or stubble, or imperishable gold. In his hands are the issues; in his hands we may trust ourselves with implicit confidence, knowing that his purposes are from everlasting, and must prevail.

"How can I expand my chest?" asked a stingy fellow of a physician. "By carrying a larger heart in it," the doctor replied.—Golden Age.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I yesterday noticed a brief paragraph in the Daily Washington Republican, stating the establishment of your INDEX. The declared purpose of it struck me as not more novel than meritorious and desirable, considering the discreditably heterogeneous condition of thought in this professedly Christian land, on the most momentous of all imaginable subjects. The Editor of the Republican could not refuse his most hearty approval of your design (that is, if sincere), but seemed to look upon it as probably but one more added to the many previous contrivances whereby pretended believers, but real infidels, seek to insinuate their poison into the public mind. I do not feel myself justified in coming thus soon, at least, to so unfriendly a suspicion as the Republican. The statement of your object looks fair and honest; and it has so much in it that speaks right home to the unsectarian but religious heart that, even if your aim should ultimately disclose its hostility to religion and truth, charity must, as yet, not only hope but believe the very best. I may be permitted to say in very fact, that I have (in my limited sphere) for some time past been moving in precisely the same path you declare you have stricken out for yourselves; you will not wonder, therefore, if I desire to hear and see more of those who appear to be fellow-workers in what is, to my mind, a holy, and which may some day prove, a mighty cause. Be so good, then, as to favor me with numbers (successive weeks) of your INDEX, that I may be enabled to judge somewhat better than I now can of your general purpose and your manner of promoting it. I send what will probably be enough to pay for the same."

—"I am in love with the paper throughout. It hits my case exactly. What you say of 'young Radicals, full of enthusiasm for truth and humanity,' being forced out into the cold, shorn of influential friendship, is true of me. One year ago I was compelled to take a course for which I was peculiarly, at least, unfitted, and have suffered untold miseries since. It was the same story of Truth disturbing the smooth wave of complacent theology founded on Tradition—of finding a true bill of infidelity—of giving the verdict without hearing the victim's reasons, &c., &c. I have climbed up, and now stand on the top round of the ladder of radicalism. The moral air is sweet and pure, though cold, up where I am, and I fear no shadows. Your INDEX contains the food which my mind craves. Seldom have I found so much that is calculated to give tone and vigor to the Reformer's sturdy constitution."

—"Thank you for THE INDEX. It is a nice little paper, but for its size the articles are too long. It contains fine sentiments, but mixed up with too much mystification. I am glad it has thrown off the shackles of Christianity, and it will emancipate itself from the thralldom of Religion, a term belonging to the unknown tongue which every one uses and no one understands, and come on the broad and comprehensive platform of Humanity, understood by all that are human."

—"If I were able, I would give THE INDEX a few hundred dollars out and out, for I consider it altogether the best exponent of pure Theism in the country, and pure Theism is certainly the highest form of religion the world can ever know."

—"Will you be kind enough to send your paper to —, after next week, until I direct you otherwise? I expect to spend the summer there, and shall hardly feel at home without THE INDEX."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be suspended during the months of July and August. Special notice will be given of any occasional meetings that may be held.

RECEIVED.

THE GOSPEL OF TO-DAY. A Sermon by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, April 16th, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 22.

THE RADICAL. Published Monthly. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Bromfield St. $3.00 a Year. Single Numbers 30 cents. July, 1871.

THE MISSISSIPPI EDUCATIONAL JOURNAL. Devoted to Popular Instruction and Literature. Jackson, Miss.: H. T. FISHER, Editor and Publisher. $2.00 a Year. May, 1871.

THE AMERICAN EXCHANGE AND REVIEW. A Miscellany of Useful Knowledge and General Literature. FOWLER & MOON, N. W. Cor. Walnut & Fourth Sts., Philadelphia. J. H. C. WHITING, Business Manager. $3.00 a Year. June, 1871.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. Edited by Mrs. M. CORA BLAND. Indianapolis: June and July, 1871. $1.50 a Year.

PETERS' MUSICAL MONTHLY. J. L. PETERS, Publisher. 599 Broadway, New York. $3.00 a Year.

FOURTH ANNUAL SPECIMEN BOOK of Job Type and Borders, for Sale at the Daily Commercial Job Rooms. Toledo, Ohio.

Poetry,

ODE

FOR A COLLEGE CLASS-DAY.

Once again has the earth lightly whirled round the sun
In the jubilant dance of the spheres;
Ever youthful, another bright gem she has won,
To flash in her circlet of years.
But our spring-tide is ebbing, our morning is o'er;
The moment of parting draws nigh,
And our Mother—God bless her!—stands here at the door
To throw us a kiss and good-by.

Like the arches and spires that with marble of frost
The Winter-Elf builds on the pane,
Hope's castles may melt and in tear-drops be lost,
Ere our sun its proud zenith shall gain.
But Friendship has rung a sweet chime from her bells,
Whose echoes, when youth shall decay,
Like the music that lurks in the sighing sea-shells,
Will haunt us and cheer us for aye.

As the rain-drops that wed on the river's gray breast
Are divorced in the broad, heaving main,
From the north and the south and the east and the west
We have met but to scatter again.
The noble old elm waits our time-honored song,
Let us join "hand to hand, heart to heart;"
We have laughed and been merry together full long,
But the summons is come, and we part.

Yet the friendships of youth, like the Pleiads that weave
Their soft meshes of splendor on high,
O'er our paths a bright glory of starlight will leave,
And smile all the gloom from our sky.
Oh cleave to the love that has hallowed the past,—
It shall hallow the future's long years!
For to-day, ere Life blows her stern clarion blast,
We baptize it immortal with tears.

1859.

ASTERISK.

The Index.

JULY 1, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion.—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [Three Lectures.] 8. Lying Pretences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
For the INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO, O., April, 1871.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed: and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo, O.,	Twenty Shares of $100 each	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	Ten "	1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	1,000
GUIDO MARK,	"	"	1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	Three	300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	300
V. KEEN,	"	"	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	Five	500
ASA K. BUTTS,	N. Y. City,	Twenty	2,000

$14,000

GOOD AND BAD GUIDES.

Our Washington correspondent "W. H. B.," as appears from a communication printed elsewhere in this number of THE INDEX, is not satisfied with our reply to him concerning the historical existence of Jesus. To his criticism—"Perhaps you are unaware, as most people are, that all the proofs relied upon by Christians of the existence of Jesus, outside of the New Testament, have been demolished,"—we had replied [THE INDEX, No. 74] that he himself was "apparently unaware" of a passage in Tacitus which we proceeded to quote. He now says that he is "familiar with the whole passage." But since he professed knowledge only of proofs which had been "demolished," we had no option but to suppose him ignorant of it. Careful study will show him that the proof we adduced is very far from being "demolished."

"W. H. B.'s" entire argument against the genuineness of the disputed passage is drawn from the "Diegesis" of Robert Taylor, who devotes five pages to an argument against it. These five pages might properly be headed—"What I Know about Tacitus." He knows as much about Tacitus as Horace Greeley knows about farming.

The first statement which "W. H. B." quotes from Taylor affirms that the first publication of the "Annals" of Tacitus was by "Johannes de Spire," who printed it from a manuscript in his own possession which purported to have been written in the eighth century; and that all other manuscripts and printed copies of the works of Tacitus are derived from this. As it would occupy too much of our space to examine critically all of Taylor's statements, let us see how accurate and reliable he is in this. If his very first statement proves him to be a literary charlatan, it would be unprofitable to take up all that remain.

Now the oldest manuscript of the "Annals" discovered at the revival of learning was the Codex Corbeiensis, which Pope Leo X. bribed the monks with five hundred ducats to send from Germany to Rome, where it arrived in 1513. This manuscript is still preserved in the Laurentian library at Florence, and is the only ancient one that contains the first five books of this work of Tacitus. It is assigned by different scholars to the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries,—by none, so far as we know, to the eighth. Another ancient manuscript is the Codex Casinensis, which belongs to the eleventh century, contains only the last eleven books of the "Annals," and is deposited at Florence in the same library. This is less valuable than the other, since it contains corruptions, evidently by a Christian hand, which are rejected in all good editions now printed. Besides these two ancient manuscripts there are more than thirty others of more recent date, some of which are undoubtedly derived from the preceding, but not all; and these last, as well as the two more ancient ones, are used by modern scholars in editing the text of Tacitus. Taylor's profound ignorance on the subject, therefore, in declaring that all modern editions of the "Annals" are derived from the one manuscript of John of Spira (what this is, he omits to inform us) is sufficiently apparent; and the main "fact" on which "W. H. B." relies as an offset to Gibbon's emphatic endorsement of the disputed passage is no fact at all, but a gross blunder.

Taylor's insinuation, moreover, that John of Spira tampered with his text is baseless; and his other insinuation that the "authorities" adopted it as an "evidence of Christianity" is simply preposterous. John of Spira was the first, according to Hallam, who "applied the art [of printing] on an extensive scale to the publication of classical works;" and this he did, under the patronage of Venice, purely in the cause of ancient literature. Sanuto mentions a special order of the Venetian Senate in 1469 that John of Spira should enjoy a monopoly for five years as publisher of the epistles of Tully and Pliny. Taylor's only positive ground for suspecting him of corrupting the text of Tacitus in the interest of Christianity is that he had a chance to do so by having in his possession the only manuscript of the "Annals." This supposed fact we have seen to be a blunder, since two relatively ancient and over thirty more recent manuscripts of Tacitus are extant; but even admitting it to be true, is everybody to be adjudged guilty of a crime who has had a chance to commit it?

There is no positive evidence whatever that John of Spira was guilty of interpolation; and Taylor's twenty reasons for believing him guilty of it weigh absolutely nothing in comparison with the verdict of real scholars like Gibbon in favor of the disputed passage. Not depending at all on the edition of John of Spira, but editing the works of Tacitus from the manuscripts themselves, modern textual criticism has confirmed the judgment of Gibbon; and every respectable edition (in fact every edition, so far as we know) regards the passage we cited as genuine. Whoever wishes to know more on this subject may consult Friedrich Haase's treatise of sixty pages, "De Cornelii Taciti Vita, Ingenio, Scriptis Commentatio," prefixed to the Tauchnitz edition of the original text of Tacitus, which is (or was in our day) used at Harvard University as a standard text-book. In this learned treatise (p. xxx), Haase makes special reference to the passage in question, and treats it as undeniably genuine. Nothing is clearer than that Taylor is butting his head against a stone wall.

Our statement that, "had it not been for Paul, Jesus might never have been heard of," is not correctly understood by "W. H. B." We did not mean, as he supposes, that "the proof is narrowed down to the testimony of a single man who never saw Jesus." We meant that it was Paul who so expanded the Messianic idea as to give it importance in the world's eyes, and thus called attention to a sect that would otherwise probably have perished in obscurity. The gospels we referred to explicitly as at least establishing the leading facts in the career of Jesus, in the opinion of the best scholars. No one who has read Strauss, for instance, will accuse him of being unduly attached to the historical element in Christianity, it being his main object to explain this away by the "mythical theory." Yet in his latest work ["New Life of Jesus," Vol. 2, p. 434] he makes the following statements, with which we entirely agree:—

"I do not think that the case is so bad as has lately been maintained, as that we can not know for certain, of any one of the texts which are put into the mouth of Jesus in the gospels, whether he uttered them or not. I believe that there are some which we may ascribe to Jesus with all that amount of probability beyond which we cannot generally go in historical matters; and I have endeavored above to explain the signs by which we may recognize such. But this probability approaching to certainty does not extend far; and, with the exception of the journey of Jesus to Jerusalem and his death, the facts and circumstances of his life are unfavorably situated. There is little of which we can say for certain that it took place; and of all to which the faith of the Church especially attaches itself, the miraculous and supernatural matter in the facts and destinies of Jesus, it is far more certain that it did not take place."

It is a vast misfortune to the liberal cause that such books as Taylor's "Diegesis" should be published, circulated, or read. They contain just enough learning to deceive those who have no leisure to study independently for themselves into confidence in false facts and reckless reasoning. They throw discredit on liberalism itself in the eyes of every well-read man, and compel Christian scholars to treat its literature with contempt. Were it not for works of a better class than this, liberal thought could never make headway among educated men. The age demands exact scholarship and exact science; and whatever book disseminates inexact information simply plants weeds which must be ploughed up again. The world is overstocked with misleading and worse than worthless books. We wish that the great scholars would imitate the great scientific men, and issue popular works on their own special subjects as admirable in character as are Darwin's "Descent of Man," Huxley's "Lay Sermons," and Tyndall's "Fragments of Science." Max Mueller is doing work of incalculable value in this respect, and we hope his success will stimulate others of equal ability and distinction to do the same in other departments of study. There is a great need of works in English, summing up with precision the results of the best European scholarship, and not overloaded with details,—works that shall be comparatively cheap, and yet give accurate information brought down to the latest date. But such books as the "Diegesis" misguide all who trust in them.

A PREDICTED PERIL.

At the public business meeting of the Free Religious Association, a gentleman who seemed deeply interested in the aims of the society, expressed a fear lest the conservatives should think it worth while to avail themselves of the easy terms of admission, and so to change the principles and the very name of the organization as to make its instrumentalities work its own ruin. He professed to speak from large experience in similar undertakings. The instant they give hope of becoming popular and influential, the watchful enemy steals in with mining tools, he said; and to prevent that possibility in the case of the Free Religious Association, he proposed the insertion of a constitutional clause forbidding a change of name under any circumstances. That the proposition was not seconded or much heeded was perhaps due to the fact that the peril of popularity seemed less immediate to others than to the speaker, and that the value of the organization as a working power was not so keenly appreciated by the familiars of the institution as by this enthusiastic friend.

On the next day, however, a similar prophecy of danger was made from another quarter. A radical friend of the Association, not an officer or a member, took alarm at the presence on the platform of Mr. Ierson, the English Unitarian minister. That gentleman seemed to him a scout from the enemy's camp, and heralded possibly the advent of a conservative host.

Cheering as it was to think that the dawn of a Messianic day was nearer than some of us dreamed, the indications of it were not brilliant. The wealth of the Association does not yet offer temptation to speculators; nor did the appearance of Mr. Ierson portend an invasion from the Philistines. Considering what personages had sat, stood, and spoken on our platform, and had left it secure, the apparition of an English Unitarian clergyman was not calculated to excite dismay, the "mair by token" as he fell in quite cordially with the fundamental principle of the Association. Or is this the ground on which he should be feared?

Our day of popularity is still remote. There is no pressing necessity for guarding against the advent of that danger in particular. But it may be as well to bear in mind the undesirableness of seeming to invite it. The critical period in the history of an Association like ours is the formative period, during which the elements are held in solution preparing to crystallize. That period should be protracted as long as possible in order that under the perfect action of the law of freedom the germinating idea of the institution may have free play for all its possibilities of suggestion. The wish for more complete organization I do not share. The call for closer administrative co-operation I do not echo. The thought we possess is so radical and wide, it demands such full liberty, it is so clearly its first need to be developed and understood, it bears its fructifying power so peculiarly in itself, does its work by means of its own intellectual and moral virtue to so unwonted an extent, that to imprison it or try to manipulate it too early would inflict on it far more than the ordinary disasters incident to working sects. The narrow thought may be allowed to embody itself quickly, for only by embodying itself can it live. But the wide thought, which is nothing if not wide, whose quality is breadth, whose law is diffusion, must be faithfully secured from the fascinating compromises which the passion for instant efficiency suggests.

Fidelity to the purposes of the Free Religious Association demands the firmest loyalty to its most radical principles. We must fear a too ready acquiescence, and must be scrupulously careful to keep from dangerous entanglements with other forms of thought having a certain similarity. It is not time yet, nor will it soon be time, to cease rasping feelings and shocking prejudices by the plainness of our speech. We must keep ourselves unpopular as long as we can generously do so,—absolutely refusing popularity till it comes to us on our own terms.

The vitality of our idea has proved itself to be very remarkable. Remembering the few advantages it has enjoyed of obviousness, countenance, numerical and pecuniary support, its success has been wonderful. Its continued success will depend on the determination its friends show to hold it down to its proper work. If they are true to its nature, its name will take care of itself. If they are true to its principles, they can be trusted to attract those who belong to them, and to repel those who do not.

O. B. F.

THE DANGER OF IT.

At the Free Religious Convention in Boston a year ago, when the use of the Bible in public schools was under discussion, a speaker from the audience defended it, and asked what harm it could do, even if it did no good? "Who would say that he was ever injured by the Bible?" And those present will not forget the prompt and eloquent way in which Rabbi Wise responded, in behalf of his people, that they were injured all the time by its being read as an infallible book. "The beautiful sentiment of it," he said, "was soon worn off, and it became an empty form. Then it would do harm. The harm was in reading it as the Word of God, while the child could not be taught to discriminate and understand it. The Bible so considered was the parent of sectarianism and bloody strife."

It is easy to see the good results that have followed from the Bible, the Church and the clergy. It is not so easy to remember the reverse of the picture—the persecution, the torture, the agony that all exclusive beliefs have caused. All the atrocities of the French revolutions (from first to last) were but a slight reproduction of the greater atrocities of the Inquisition.

We say that the period of religious persecution has passed. But it is not long since it subsided, and there is latent in every church the desire to revive it, if men dared. At this moment there is imprisoned in Australia an Englishman, of character unimpeached, who is hammering stone within the prison-walls, wearing a prison-dress, and with hair cropped short, for the sole offence of denying the inspiration of the Scriptures. While a single such case exists, those who love free thought can no more relax their efforts than Republicans can relax theirs while Toombs and Jefferson Davis live. These are the living witnesses of a danger not yet past.

It is worth while to dwell on this extraordinary and most instructive case. Mr. Wm. L. Jones, a sculptor and a member of the Royal Academy of the Arts, lives in the town of Parametta, near Sydney. In a conversation with a clergyman, he asserted that the Bible was to be read and judged like any other ancient book; that some portions of it were unfit for children to read; that Moses confessedly committed both falsehood and theft; that David was terribly cruel. This was proved on the testimony of the clergyman. On the part of the defence it was proved that Mr. Jones spoke of God "with great reverence," and declared Jesus Christ to be "the highest and purest character known in history." Evidence as to good moral character in the defendant was ruled out. The jury without leaving their seats returned a verdict of "guilty" of the crime of blasphemy. Mr. Jones was sentenced to two years' imprisonment at hard labor, and to pay a fine of two hundred pounds.

You say—this could not happen in America. In a few states, as Rhode Island, it is perhaps forbidden by the organic law. But the very newspaper from which I take these facts points out that this greater mildness is only the result of “a demoralized public sentiment and an unseemly weakness,” and exults in the thought that the movement for the constitutional recognition of “the Bible as the Supreme Authority of the Land” will set all this right. “When that is accomplished, we shall be a step in advance of our Australian friends,—for the Bible punishment for blasphemy is death.”

It is not likely that this result will ever arrive; but it is the logical conclusion of almost every existing church from Pope to Popeling,—from Pius IX. down to Bellows and Miner. Almost every minister, almost every church-member, if consistent with his own theory, would sit upon the jury in a case like that of Jones and say—“Guilty.” It is not so long since similar cases were threatened among ourselves. It is not fifty years since that eminent Unitarian scholar, Rev. G. R. Noyes, D. D., was threatened with just such a prosecution, and the preliminary steps were taken (so he himself told me) to lay the case before the grand jury. Policy and the fear of ridicule suppressed the effort; but does any one doubt that those who conduct Zion's Herald or the Chicago Advance would do the same to any advocate of “Free Religion,” to-morrow, if they dared?

Nor are the laws wanting. It is stated by Hon. R. G. Ingersoll, of Illinois, in a recent pamphlet, that the following law was in force in Maryland until within a century and a half, and is still in force in the District of Columbia:—

“Be it enacted by the Right Honorable, the Lord Proprietor, by and with the advice and consent of his lordship's governor, and the upper and lower houses of the Assembly, and the authority of the same:

“That if any person shall hereafter, within this province, wittingly, maliciously, and advisedly, by writing or speaking, blaspheme or curse God, or deny our Savior, Jesus Christ, to be the son of God, or shall deny the Holy Trinity, the Father, Son, and the Holy Ghost, or the God-head of any of the three persons, or the unity of the God-head, or shall utter any profane words concerning the Holy Trinity, or any of the persons thereof, and shall thereof be convicted by verdict, he shall for the first offence be bored through the tongue, and fined twenty-five pounds to be levied of his body. And for the second offence, the offender shall be stigmatized by burning in the forehead with the letter B, and fined forty pounds. And that for the third offence, the offender shall suffer death without the benefit of clergy.

To whom do we owe it that similar laws do not control the whole nation? In the words of that eminently evangelical sheet, the Lebanon Shaker, “it is to the sceptical classes that we are largely indebted for the religious and civil liberty we enjoy.” We owe it to Franklin, Jefferson and Paine. We owe its preservation not only to Channing, Emerson and Parker, but also to Frances Wright and Abner Kneeland. The vilest and most vulgar “infidel,” whose words are most distasteful, not only to superstitious ears but to refined ears, has yet done his part (often at great personal sacrifice) in defending religious freedom. He cannot do less credit to his side than the Rev. Dr. Fulton does to the other; and if a man must be angry and foul-mouthed, it is something that he should love freedom rather than superstition. The trouble is that a man of low tone is rarely reliable; and a man who begins by reviling even falsehood is apt to end, like the well-remembered

Joseph Barker, in reviling the very truths he himself has preached.

The end of the matter is, that superstition would be only a touching and pathetic weakness but for the danger it contains. Beginning in the prayer of a single dreaming enthusiast, it may end in a decree like that of the Inquisition, dated Feb. 15, 1568, condemning a whole nation to death for heresy. Motley calls it “the most concise death-warrant ever-written,—three million people sentenced in three lines.”

T. W. H.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

My last work was in Abington, Ashfield, and Florence, Mass., and Milford, N. H.

Abington was formerly one of the strongholds of Anti-Slavery. No truer, braver abolitionists lived or moved anywhere than there. And they did live and move, and slave-holders and their northern abettors felt and dreaded their power. Now some of the best of them are continuing their labors in the cause of human emancipation as a society of Spiritualists; others associated with them. And an excellent work and warfare they are carrying on in behalf of Temperance, Rights of Woman, of Labor, and of religious emancipation and toleration. Though identified with the Spiritualists in no way, still it gives me pleasure to bear witness that wherever I go, no other single association is doing more, if so much, for human emancipation and elevation. None surely are so brave as they in asserting and maintaining the freedom of speech irrespective of opinion or of sex.

Abington gave me two excellent audiences, though the day was the hottest, so far, of the whole season. I also attended a funeral between our public services; an exercise I did not feel at liberty to decline. The world will yet learn that it is safe to be born, married, or buried, without the intervention of an ordained, pompous, pretentious priesthood.

Two Sundays I gave to Florence. By some mistake, my appointments on the first were, Florence at two, and Ashfield at half past five in the afternoon, the towns being seventeen miles apart. But both engagements were met, lectures over an hour each. I told my driver I was glad Mr. Bergh did not live on the road; but he assured me his horse was equal to the task, as indeed he proved himself. Should I meet that noble animal in Paradise (as Mr. Beecher thinks I may), I can assure him there, that I appreciated and admired the manner in which he did that “Sabbath day's journey.”

Ashfield is a beautiful, retired hermitage of a town, up to which many city people wisely turn their steps in summer. Among others, Mr. George William Curtis has a delightful villa there, brooded over by trees that would have graced the garden of Eden. And best of all about him is, he is truly generous in his encouragement and support of the brave little band of Free Religionists, organized there a year or two since.

Florence seems now the banner town of New England in support of the new faith. Mr. Charles C. Burleigh has labored there for some fifteen years, I believe; and no place in the whole country exhibits more proofs of good work well done in the cause of Freedom, Virtue and Righteousness.

And Florence has just now made another innovation in the installation as colleague with Mr. Burleigh of Miss Elizabeth M. Powell, late a Professor in Vassar College. Miss Powell is to have entire charge of the Sunday School, now very numerous and flourishing, and will supply the Sunday lecture once a month. A better selection could not have been made, and I was glad to learn that a number of the regular Unitarian ministers in the region around have already proposed to Miss Powell an exchange of pulpits for a Sunday; one or two of which she has already accepted.

I am sorry my “Notes” overstep the column so generously allotted me. I hope these will not.

P. P.

Will the writer of the first extract in our column of “Voices from the People,” in THE INDEX for June 17, No 77, be so kind as to send us his address? The letter from which the extract was copied cannot be found, and we are unable to answer the request of a subscriber who desires to write to the author of it.

Especial attention is called to a new column advertisement of first-class books on our last page. They contain the very cream of modern thought, and most are of such a character as we can unqualifiedly recommend. Mr. Stebbins is an enterprising, reliable, and honorable business man; and whoever orders any of his books by mail may depend on their being carefully protected from all injury in transmission. These are works that ought to be read and re-read by every one desirous of becoming acquainted with the best minds of to-day.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE RELATION OF SCIENCE AND INTUITION.

I am deeply interested in the discussion of terms, as applied to radicals and their modes of thought and investigation, especially those supposed to be so distinctive in their nature and character as “the intuitional and scientific schools.” I have been trying to determine to which of them I belong, and conclude that some how I belong to both branches of the radical family, with quite a near relationship to the spiritualists. And while I am not a fanatic in the defence of either, I own to something of an enthusiastic love for them all. I find that Webster defines intuition as “the act by which the mind perceives the agreement or disagreement of two ideas, or the truth of things, immediately, or the moment they are presented, without the intervention of other ideas, or without reasoning and deduction.” And science he defines to be “in a general sense the comprehension or understanding of truth or facts by the mind; and in philosophy, a collection of the general principles and leading truths arranged in systematical order.” He adds “that pure science is built on self-evident truths,” and again, “that science is also applied to other subjects founded on generally acknowledged truths, as metaphysics, or experiment and observation, as chemistry and natural philosophy.” I acknowledge that it seems strange to me, that to the cultivated minds of leading radicals intuition and science should appear in any sense as opposed to each other. To my comparatively uncultivated mind, they complement each other; and if we would arrive at a mathematical certainty concerning any given truth, we must submit our intuitions to the searching investigations of Scientific Philosophy. That is, we must investigate the phenomena of intuition, and assign rational cause for its existence. My intuitional nature accepts this as a self-evident fact, while my reasoning nature demands it.

Thus when Prof. Huxley explains to us his theory of “protoplasm,” I am interested and instructed; but I see a fact connected therewith that also demands scientific investigation, namely, the action of my mind that intuitively comprehends his theory. Also the subtle power that enables me here in America, with the ocean rolling between us, to see the protoplasm in the nettle with its perpetual motion as he sees it, while examining it through his microscope in England. I wish to know how I do this? Here is a self-evident fact. We intuitively recognize it by appealing to this faculty when we present to others our ideas, or state to them the result of our investigations. The reciprocity of thought—what is it? A series of innumerable questions awaits the developing science of mind. One knows not where to begin; but they are summed up in that greatest of all questions—who, and what, and where is God? My brother, I acknowledge that science will one day answer this question much more lucidly than intuition now does to the clearest seer of the present time. Nor does it appear to me to require a great amount of humility to go back of "protoplasm," and investigate the evidence of design that it exhibits to our intuition.

We hear also much said concerning spiritual and material, as if they were two distinct elements acting in opposition to each other; and what seems very absurd to my untutored thought, each one assumes to reject the other. Pray tell me, has any one seen a material thing without the spiritual element combined therewith? Or a spiritual element, essence or being, distinct from and independent of the material? I mean by spirit, "vital essence," and not as defined by Webster, life or living substance independent of corporeal existence, intelligence apart from physical organization; vital essence, force, or energy, distinct from matter. It is no doubt true "that fools rush in where angels fear to tread," and this may be the reason why I, after thirty years' experience in the schools of authority, called orthodox, and "dyed in the wool," dare to turn therefrom to our much abused mother Nature; while even the immortal and almost infallible Webster ceases to be to me absolute authority, when he differs from her. So I ask again and again, what do we know of matter or spirit distinct from each other? It seems to me like a play upon words. So also with intuition and science. What know we of intuition separate from reason, save as science has classified and arranged these elements of the human mind? Or what do we know of science without its basis of intuition or self-evident truths? So if I am an intuitionist, I am also a scientist, so far as I am capable of being one. And if I am a spiritualist, I am also a materialist, and the foundation of my faith in the one is the same for my belief in the other, science being the rule or method by which I prove all the sums in the arithmetic of human life. For it alone takes up principles and truths derived from self-evident facts, strips them of the artificial clothing with which ignorance, superstition, and bigotry have obscured them, and in their naked simplicity and beauty places them in the temples of wisdom, where they are like apples of gold in pictures of silver, of intrinsic value to humanity. To me, as one of the masses, belonging to and of the common people, there is a beautiful unity in all this variety.

I cannot conceive of a wise, scientific materialist who is not also an intuitionist. The one involves the other. If intuition is the ultimate of human wisdom, then why has Nature given us reasoning powers with which to test the intuitions? I see science reaching back to intuition, unlocking life's mysteries for us, showing us its separate parts, and putting them together again in their proper order and relations, after removing the dust and impurities that have marred their action; and thus enabling them to direct and control human relations with much greater accuracy. And again I see what purports to be science ignoring intuition, and it is an ignis fatuus, a false light, or bit of phosphorescent, rotten wood, brilliant in the darkness but worthless as an illuminator in the hour of our needs.

I seek after mind in the abstract, meaning thereby a power that chooses, inclines, desires, likes, intends, purposes, wills. I go back of reason to intuition, and I see it in the earliest dawns of the human race, before the reasoning powers are strong enough to give birth to science. All these elements are manifested in them through the action, if I may so call it, of the energies of pure intuition. I go back of intuition, and I find mind exhibited in the animal kingdom, and science calls it instinct; and it, too, exercises all these elements of mind seemingly unconsciously. Even purpose and will are not wanting, for instinct selects and appropriates that which is necessary to existence. So also do I see mind in the vegetable kingdom, fully as marked as in the others, as is seen in the familiar grape-vine or potato. They travel far, when necessary, to seek for and appropriate the food essential to growth and development, with much more directness than human beings exercise with their intuitions. Still farther back I go, exploring the labyrinths of Nature, asking every where for evidences of mind; and link after link appears. An Almighty force has welded them indissolubly together. On and on I go, searching ever, until I come to the minutest atom my mind can take cognizance of; and here, too, in its infinitesimal perfection, I see the embodiment of mind, and in its simple form is wrapt up the nucleus of worlds. Yet I have not found any where mind distinct from matter, nor matter independent of mind. Nor do I find any evidence of either in the most learned treatises of science. The idea evidently arises from a fragmentary view of Nature, and the insufficient power of the lens through which we look to compass the Infinite.

Can I be other than religious, after making these researches in the volume of life? Life! Life! All is life! There is no death, says Nature. Form changes, and we call it death, yet everywhere "death is swallowed up of life!"

Oh my brother, I cannot express my appreciation of your little INDEX. The spirit of life and liberty breathes in every column. The spirit of progress and development inspires its contributors and its editor. There are no unnatural bars in Free Religion, and I rejoice that we have a High Priest to minister at its altars, who will never say to humanity—"Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther;" one who listens reverently to the intuitions of his own soul, acknowledging and adoring the Infinite Father, and yet waiting patiently and hopefully for the highest known representative of the Infinite, the reasoning powers in humanity, to unfold and explain the intuitional knowledge of God, and with scientific certainty to prove his existence, nature, and character; one who feels that he has not reached the limit of human investigation, and stands calmly on the threshold of a new era in the history of his race, when humanity, outgrown its swaddling bands, springs forth like a youthful athlete, strong to contend with and overcome error; and finally, one who holds in his right hand the kernel of historical religions, inviting to the feast of reason and the highest development of soul.

SARAH M. MILLS.

[The above thoughtful article expresses some surprise that intuition and science should ever be opposed to each other. They need not be, if intuition is rightly understood. But the claims of intuition are pushed to an extravagant length by what we have called the "intuitional school," inasmuch as this school holds it to be a special faculty superior to reason, by which the existence of God and the certainty of immortality are immediately known without the necessity of proof. The limitations we observed in our own use of the word have been unnoticed, and perhaps some little confusion has ensued. Taken in its true sense, intuition is indispensable to science; but in this sense we have said nothing about it, since we should be obliged to enter upon questions unfitted for discussion in these columns. It was only the abuse of intuition, which we carefully explained, that we criticised in our late lecture.

That a lady so highly intelligent as Mrs. Mills evidently is should be moved to express herself so warmly in approbation of THE INDEX, may well stimulate us to renewed exertion; and we rejoice if any words of ours have been of value to any one. But it concerns the very essence of Free Religion that no individual servant of it should for one moment consent to regard himself as its "High Priest." The day of priests, high and low, is passing rapidly away. Henceforth Humanity shall be its own "High Priest," and whatever worker for Free Religion allows himself, even in his own secret thought, to arrogate or accept any such office, plays the part of Judas, and betrays it with a kiss. With deep earnestness we must disclaim any such insane pretension on our part, and emphasize our oft-uttered conviction that the new era will know no individual "leader." We have no higher ambition than that of throwing into the universal treasury of the age the mite of our private thought.—Ed.]

THE HISTORICAL EXISTENCE OF JESUS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 28, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:—In reply to my brief communication in which I stated that "all the proofs relied upon by Christians of the existence of Jesus outside of the New Testament have been demolished," you cite a passage from Tacitus of which you say I am "apparently unaware." On the contrary, I was perfectly familiar with the whole passage of which you give a fragment.

If you will turn to pages 393—397 of "The Diegesis" by the Rev. Robert Taylor, written in 1829 and published by J. P. Mendum, Boston, in 1860, you will find what seems to me a very convincing argument against the integrity of that passage, which the learned Gibbon too hastily, I think, admitted. And as you may not have a copy of the "Diegesis," perhaps you will indulge me in transcribing a part of Mr. Taylor's argument. He says:—

"The first publication of any part of the 'Annals' of Tacitus was by Johannes de Spire, at Venice, in the year 1468, his imprint being made from a single manuscript in his own power and possession only, and purporting to have been written in the eighth century. From this manuscript, which none but the most learned would know of, none but the most curious would investigate, and none but the most interested would transcribe, or be allowed to transcribe,—and that, too, in an age and country when and where to have suggested but a doubt against the authenticity of any document which the authorities had once chosen to adopt as evidence of Christianity would have subjected the conscientious sceptic to the faggot—from this all other manuscripts and printed copies of the works of Tacitus are derived."

This fact, if true, is a sufficient answer to Gibbon's admission as to the integrity of the passage.

But Robert Taylor, not content with this fact alone, gives twenty more reasons for rejecting the passage as spurious, among which I select and gather the following in substantially the author's own words:

1. This passage, which would have served the purpose of Christian quotation better than any other in all the writings of Tacitus, or of any Pagan writer whatever, is not quoted by any of the Christian Fathers, nor by any writer whatever prior to the 15th century.

2. The passage itself, though unquestionably the work of a master, betrayed the penchant of that delight in blood and in descriptions of bloody horrors, as peculiarly characteristic of the Christian disposition as it was abhorrent to the mild and gentle mind and highly cultivated taste of Tacitus.

3. It is falsified by the apology of Tertullian and the far more respectable testimony of Melito, Bishop of Sardis, who explicitly states that the Christians up to his time, the third [second] century, had never been victims of persecution.

4. Tacitus has in no other part of his writings made the least allusion to Christ or Christians.

Then in regard to the testimony of Suetonius, who lived about the year 110, and whose diligence and accuracy Gibbon relies on to prove the persecution which Tacitus describes, Robert Taylor effectually demolishes that testimony on pages 397—399 of his "Diegesis."

But the testimony of Paul you deem sufficient to establish the fact of the historical existence of Jesus. Indeed, with the exception of the single passage in Tacitus, which, if not spurious, fails to prove absolutely that such a person existed, but that a Christian sect so held, you fall back on the testimony of Paul alone, and say:—"Had it not been for him, Jesus might never have been heard of."

So, then, the proof has been narrowed down to the testimony of a single man who never saw Jesus except in miraculous vision, who never met but two of the apostles, namely, Peter and James (Gal. I, 18, 19), abiding with the former only fifteen days, and who, ignoring the regular election or appointment of Matthias as the twelfth apostle (Acts I, 26) claimed to be an apostle miraculously appointed, though subsequently denounced by John as a liar in setting up that claim (Rev. II, 1, 2).

But what is Paul's testimony to the existence of Jesus? He says he "was raised from the dead according to my Gospel" (2 Tim. II, 9). That gospel was of course prior to either of the four we now have, and there is some probability at least that it was based upon writings that existed before the date of the crucifixion. There certainly did exist a gospel and perhaps several gospels prior to any that have come down to us, and from these prior records the four gospels of the New Testament are compiled. How else can we explain Christ's speaking of building his church (Mat. XVI, 18), and of neglecting to hear the church (XVIII, 17)?

Now the sect of Essenes existed long prior to the Christian era, and it was from them, no doubt, that Paul imbibed his theology. That theology was a mysticism, and had its symbols and mythical personages. Among these was the Christos, the anointed, the crucified, an imaginary being, whose history had been in India ages before. Mr. Graves, of Ohio, wants to print a book proving from history that sixteen Christs have suffered death on the cross. There may have been one such in Judaea; but is it certain that we are to understand Paul in a literal sense when he speaks of that person? Robert Taylor and others have given some very cogent reasons for believing that the whole story of Christ's life, death, and resurrection is an astronomical fiction. Some of the earliest Christian sects denied the existence of Jesus. In 1 John IV, 2, and 2 John 7, that denial is censured as a heresy. In the Gospel of the apostle Barnabas, it is asserted that "Jesus Christ was not crucified, but was taken up into the third heavens" (Diegesis, p. 373). Cerdon and Marcion taught that he was not born, and that he only appeared as a man (ibid., 369). Other so-called heretics vehemently denied his humanity.

I have never read Archbishop Whately's satire on this disbelief; but I presume I should be as much amused with it as I was with reading Bishop Watson's reply to Paine. You, Mr. Editor, I suspect, read it without having been familiar with the argument on the other side. Hence you affirm so confidently that "scepticism as to the bare fact of Jesus' life and death has nothing to show for itself except uncritical suspicion;" when the fact is asserted by Robert Taylor "that the being of no other individual mentioned in history ever labored under such a deficiency of evidence as to its reality." W. H. B.

SOCIAL EQUALITY.—Mr. Dickson, a colored barber in one of the largest towns in Massachusetts, was one morning shaving one of his customers, a respectable citizen, when a conversation occurred between them respecting Mr. Dickson's former connection with a colored church in the place.

"I believe you are connected with the church in Elm street, Mr. Dickson?" said the customer.

"No, sah, not at all."

"Why, are you not a member of the African church?"

"Not dis year, sah."

"Why did you leave their communion, Mr. Dickson, if I may be permitted to ask?"

"Why, I tell you, sah," said Mr. Dickson, strapping a concave razor on the palm of his hand, "it was jes like dis. I jined dat church, in good fait. I gib ten dollars toward de stated preachin' of de Gospel de fuss year, and de people all call me Brudder Dickson. De second year my business not good, and I only gib five dollars. Dat year de church people call me Mr. Dickson. Dis razor hurt you, sah?"

"No, sir, goes tolerably well."

"Well, sah, de third year I feel berry poor—sickness in my family—an' I gib noffin for preaching. Well, sah, arter dat day call me Ole Nigger Dickson, and I leff 'em!"—Harper's Drawer.

At the meeting to promote universal peace, Mrs. Lucretia Mott regretted that the examples of David, Samuel and other revengful and cruel men of a semi-barbarous age should be introduced to our children to influence their minds and instil into them a familiarity with such unchristian thoughts. She advocated pruning the Bible, as she said the Quakers in Philadelphia had done, by cutting out some of the most beautiful psalms even, because they breathed a revengful spirit.—Toledo Blade.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WOOD & HOLBROOK'S PUBLICATIONS.

HERALD OF HEALTH.

Sixty Pages. $2.00 a Year. 20 Cts. a Number.

Three Months on Trial, Twenty-Five Cts.

$1 a Year to Clergymen, Teachers and Invalids who request it. New subscribers who send $2 for 1871 will be entitled to a book of 300 pages and 100 Engravings, entitled PHYSICAL PERFECTION, or Hints toward Human Beauty, showing how to acquire and retain Bodily Symmetry, Health and Vigor, and to avoid the infirmities and deformities of age, worth $1 50. The Scientific American says, "THE HERALD OF HEALTH contains more sensible articles than any monthly that comes to our sanctum."

PHYSICAL PERFECTION.—Containing Chapters on Structure of the Human Body; the Perfect Man and Woman; the Temperaments; Laws of Human Configuration; Embryology; Childhood; Effects of Mental Culture; Moral and Emotional Influences; Social Conditions and Occupations; Effects of Climate and Locality; Direct Physical Culture; Practical Hygiene; Womanhood; the Secret of Longevity; the Arts of Beauty; External Indications of Figure, etc., etc. Beautifully Illustrated with 100 Engravings, and handsomely bound. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This work has been through many editions, and has given great satisfaction to thousands. A copy is given free to subscribers to the HERALD OF HEALTH, who send $2 at once.

MINNESOTA AND ITS CLIMATE, as adapted to Consumptives, Invalids, and all who wish to make the State a Home. By Ledyard Bill, author of "A Winter in Florida." Price $1.25 post-paid, by mail.

This book, while a godsend to invalids and consumptives, will be found equally interesting to sportsmen and settlers, who would find a home in this far-famed State. It contains a beautiful view of Minnehaha Falls, and also chapters on the climate of all those places which are most desirable as resorts for invalids, including Florida, Nassau, the Adirondacks, California, San Diego, Fayal, etc., etc.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL, AND PHYSICAL CULTURE; OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRUE LIVING. By Professor F. G. Welch, Superintendent in Yale College. It contains over 400 pages, and is beautifully bound. Price, by mail, $3 25.

This book is the most perfect Encyclopedia of Gymnastic exercises of the most approved method known. It tells in plain language how to do everything, from the building of a gymnasium and choosing apparatus to doing the exercises. The series of exercises with the Indian clubs alone, is the best ever published. Those who want a good work on gymnastic culture should not fail to get this one. Dr. Dio Lewis says, "This is an admirable guide to physical culture."

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS.—Hints on Getting Well and Keeping Well. By Mrs. E. B. Gleason, M. D.

Woman agents wanted everywhere. Thousands are being sold. Full contents and terms of agency sent on application. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This book is designed mainly for women of all ages. It treats principally on the diseases of women, and includes chapters on Child-bearing and the Care of Children. Harper's Magazine, in reviewing the work, says:

"Mrs. Gleason is able to say something to wives and to mothers which no man could say. There can be no difference of opinion about the value of the practical suggestions she affords, which are characterized by sound philosophy and clear, good sterling common sense. We wish the chapter, 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract, and sent to every mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sayles, after reading it, says: "I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

No woman can read it without being made wiser and better, and without being better qualified for all the duties of life.

For any or all of the above works, address,
WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
67ew81 13 & 15 Laight St., New York.

WANTED—A SITUATION. The subscriber, who has had several years experience in teaching such studies as are generally pursued at Massachusetts High Schools, and also in giving piano-forte lessons, would accept a moderate compensation at a place where Bible-reading is not required in school, and where no attempt would be made to interfere with his religious convictions or with the management of his school. Address A. D. JACKSON, care of SAMUEL JACKSON, JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS. 78-83

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, $20 per day to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the wonder feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides) and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88y1

M. R. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE,
BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,

Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.

D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Publisher & Bookseller,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

The Origin of Species , By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
The Descent of Man , By DARWIN, 2 vols, each.... 2 00
Wallace on Natural Selection , (London)..... 2 00
Mivart on the Genesis of Species 1 00
Man's Place in Nature , By HUXLEY..... 1 25
Origin of Species , By HUXLEY..... 1 00
Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condition of Man , Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
The Earthward Pilgrimage , By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
History of European Morals , from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols. 8vo..... 6 00
Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews , By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
Chips from a German Workshop , By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
The Old Roman World , By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
Short Studies on Great Subjects , By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE..... 1 50
Lecture on Calvinism , By the same..... 75
The Heavens , An illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
Words and their Uses , By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
Steps of Belief , By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
Nature and Life , By REV. ROBERT COLLYER..... 1 50
Sartor Resartus , By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edition..... 90
The Choice of Books , Same..... 75
Essays of Elia , By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
Thoughts about Art , By PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON..... 2 00
Words of Weight on the Woman Question , (London)..... 2 25
The Friendships of Woman , By W. R. ALGER... 2 00
A Day by the Fire , LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
Sanctum Sanctorum , THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
Carlyle's Essays , Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
Among My Books , By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson , 2 vols..... 5 00
Society and Solitude , By the same..... 2 00
Topics of the Times , By JAMES PARTON..... 2 00
Success and its Conditions , By E. P. WHIPPLE... 1 50
Literature and Life , By same..... 1 50
Tablets , By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
Companions of My Solitude , By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
Organization in Daily Life , Same..... 1 50
Realma , By the same..... 1 50
War and Culture , By same..... 1 50
Ten Great Religions , By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
Light and Electricity , By TYNDALL..... 1 25
Our Girls , By DIO LEWIS..... 1 50
Studies in Literature , By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms , By same.... 1 25
Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read ,—NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
Principles of Psychology , By HERBERT SPENCER..... 2 50
American Religion , By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
Fragments of Science for Unscientific People , By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Light Science for Leisure Hours , By R. A. PROCTOR.... 3 00
Handbook of Legendary and Mythological Art , By Mrs. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 3 50
Hereditary Genius—Its Laws and Consequences , By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
The Races of the Old World , By CHAS. L. BRACE..... 2 00
Little Women , By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
Wallace's Review of Darwin's Descent of Man , PAPER..... 25

Address,

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher and Bookseller.
Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is TWO DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:
Lecky's History of European Morals, 2 vols.....$6.00
Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols... 5.00
Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
Weiss's Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870 (price $2.50). Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

Darwin's Origin of Species, price.....$2.00
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by Matthew Arnold, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of Theodore Parker or Henry D. Thoreau, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, Auerbach..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.
For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.
For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.
For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.
For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	1
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones.....	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed-Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 27.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JULY 8, 1871.

WHOLE No. 80.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

JONAH.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, April 2, 1871.]

"Now I cannot but think it necessary for me, who have promised to give an accurate account of our affairs, to describe the actions of this prophet, so far as I have found them written down in the Hebrew books.

Jonah had been commanded by God to go to the kingdom of Nineveh; and, when he was there, to publish it in that city, how it should lose the dominion it had over the nations. But he went not, out of fear; nay, he ran away from God to the city of Joppa, and, finding a ship there, he went into it and sailed to Tarsus, to Cilicia: and upon the rise of a most terrible storm, which was so great that the ship was in danger of sinking, the mariners, the master, and the pilot himself made prayers and vows, in case they escaped the sea. But Jonah lay still and covered [in the ship], without imitating anything the others did; but as the waves grew greater, and the sea became more violent by the winds, they suspected, as is usual in such cases, that some one of the persons that sailed with them, was the occasion of this storm, and agreed to discover by lot which of them it was. When they had cast lots, the lot fell upon the prophet; and when they asked him whence he came, and what he had done, he replied that he was an Hebrew by nation, and a prophet of Almighty God; and he persuaded them to cast him into the sea, if they would escape the danger they were in, for that he was the occasion of the storm which was upon them. Now at the first they durst not do so, as esteeming it a wicked thing to cast a man who was a stranger, and who had committed his life to them, into such manifest perdition; but at last, when their misfortunes overbore them, and the ship was just going to be drowned, and when they were animated to do it by the prophet himself, and by the fear concerning their own safety, they cast him into the sea; upon which the sea became calm.

It is also related that Jonah was swallowed down by a whale, and that, when he had been there three days and as many nights, he was vomited out upon the Euxine Sea, and this alive, and without any hurt upon his body; and there, on his prayer to God, he obtained pardon for his sins, and went to the city Nineveh, where he stood so as to be heard, and preached that in a very little time they should lose the dominion of Asia; and when he had published this he returned. Now I have given this account about him as I found it written [in our books]."

JOSEPHUS, Antiquities of the Jews, Bk. IX, Ch. X, §3.

The book of Jonah is of unknown authorship; but, as shown by the Aramaean and other late forms of expression scattered through it, it probably had its origin soon after the Babylonian Captivity, in the sixth century before Christ. The second book of Kings [XIV, 25] mentions a prophet by the name of Jonah who flourished at the commencement of the reign of the second Jeroboam, about 825 B. C. The book known by his name, therefore, could not, as commonly imagined, have been composed by him [Bleek, Einleitung in das Alte Testament, S. 571]; and he ought to be profoundly grateful to modern scholarship for having thus relieved him of all responsibility for some exceedingly tough stories.

The book itself, however, notwithstanding the strikingly Muenchhausen-like character of its contents, is by no means unworthy the attention of radicals. Before we get through with it, I hope we shall discover that, like the kernels of grain buried for thousands of years in Egyptian mummy-cases, it is capable of sprouting and bearing fruit, when dropped into the soil of radical ideas.

Until a comparatively recent period, both the Jews and Christians believed that the marvellous and grotesque narratives of the book of Jonah were authentic history. A large number of German and nearly all English and American theologians manifest the same charming simplicity. Having once been received among the canonical writings of the "Word of God," it would of course be very dangerous to admit any doubt of its contents; for, argue the doctors of divinity, if we begin by doubting the truth of a part of the Bible, we shall end by disbelieving the whole of it. So orthodoxy still swears by Jonah and his whale. This argument, however, for believing a story which requires a still vaster esophagus in its recipients than the story itself requires in the whale, is singularly weak. Men do not do business on any such principle. For instance, a bank cashier is paying across his counter a large sum of money in legal tender. On examining the bills, he discovers one which has a very suspicious look. Supposing him to follow the logic of our learned theologians, he would say to himself:—"If I admit that this bill is a counterfeit, I shall make this gentleman throw out all the others as equally bad, and thus ruin the credit of the bank. No, no—that will never do. Sir, you must take all or none—to reject one of these bills is to reject them all." How long would it be before a bank conducted on this principle would be forced to suspend? Yet the Church has been doing business on this principle for nearly a score of centuries, and vast multitudes of people still accept without protest all its worn-out and counterfeit bills.

Josephus, however, whose account of Jonah varies considerably from the book as we have it, calls the record a logos, a Greek word which signifies equally a true or false story, and is sometimes used, like mythos, to designate a fable or myth. Although the Jewish Targum and Talmud endorsed it as history, Abarbanel, a Portuguese Jew who wrote several valuable commentaries in the fifteenth century, regarded the book as a dream; while Kimchi, a renowned Spanish rabbi of the twelfth century who ranks as high authority among biblical scholars of all beliefs, held it to be a moral rather than an historical work. In fact, common sense refuses so instinctively to treat tales of this character as history, that there has been no lack of sceptics even from the earliest times. It must be admitted, however, that, if the New Testament as it is fairly represents the beliefs of Jesus, he very unambiguously endorses the story of Jonah:—"A wicked and adulterous generation is seeking for a sign; and no sign will be given to it but the sign of Jonah the prophet. For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the great fish, so will the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. The men of Nineveh will stand up in the judgment with this generation, and will condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonah; and lo! something more than Jonah is here." [Matt. XII, 39-40, Noyes' translation. Compare Matt. XVI, 4; and Luke XI, 29. All these passages are in Tischendorf's text.]

This unqualified endorsement by the New Testament Jesus of Jonah's marine adventures and successful missionary tour is one main reason why theologians cannot afford to allow any doubt of their truth; for while nothing could be more natural on radical principles than that Jesus should share the universal errors of his people, orthodoxy cannot for a moment concede that the omniscient God would set his signet-seal to a fable. Hence the great orthodox theologians, from Augustine down, have felt constrained to believe what Jesus himself so explicitly sanctioned.

Being thus bound to defend the historic truth of the book of Jonah, orthodoxy makes the most of it, and endeavors to dignify the most astounding fish-story of antiquity by interpreting Jonah's escape from the whale's belly as a solemn, providential type or prophecy of the resurrection of Christ, and by expounding his errand to the Ninevites as foreshadowing the admission of the Gentiles to Christ's salvation through the preaching of the apostles. This, they declare, was what Jesus meant by saying that no "sign" should be given to the Jews but the "sign of Jonah the prophet;" and they accordingly regard the prophet's career as an essential part of what they call the "Divine economy." It is not known whether poor Jonah himself, ignorant of these mysterious reasons why he should be shot without warning into a whale's digestive cavity, considered this "Divine economy" as very economical of his comfort. But his comfort was no part of this "economy." He himself was of no consequence. The object to be secured was the furnishing a "sign" to sceptical Jews several hundreds of years later; and although he would doubtless have felt himself highly honored by being selected for this very important purpose, if he had only understood it at the time, he may be pardoned for some bewilderment and vexation under the circumstances.

Compare, however, for a moment, the sign and the thing signified, and see to what ridiculous shifts orthodoxy is driven in order to preserve its faith in an infallible Bible. Orthodox theology teaches that the second Person of the Trinity, the infinite God himself, moved by compassion for a perishing world, descended from the throne of the universe, assumed the human form, submitted to countless insults and cruelties from wicked men, allowed himself to be put to a shameful death, lay three days in the tomb, rose again from the dead, ascended into heaven, and thus opened a way of salvation to all who would flee from the "wrath to come." Strained and unnatural as the whole theory is, it is at least not undignified; it appeals powerfully to the imagination; it has even a certain dramatic sublimity of conception, which has inspired some of the noblest poems ever produced by human genius. Now put this theory by the side of the story of Jonah, and see how grotesque and infinitely absurd it makes this story look, if taken as a Divinely intended "sign" or foreshadowing of the grand drama of salvation. The voluntary entrance of the omnipotent God of all the universe into the awful mystery and darkness of death, for the purpose of rescuing from eternal woe a lost and helpless humanity,—this, forsooth, is symbolized by a handful of scared sailors pitching a passenger over the ship's side into the gullet of a big fish! The victorious exit of the King of Kings and Lord of Lords from the gates of Hades and his triumphal re-ascension to the glory and splendor of his own everlasting throne,—this is symbolized, forsooth, by the spasmodic throes of a sick whale in a fit of vomiting, and his efforts to get rid, in the easiest possible manner, of prey that sat ill on his stomach! And this disgusting scene was the best "sign" or symbol that could be devised by the Almighty himself, in order to typify his own august part in the solemn drama of the Crucifixion and Resurrection! That he should wish to introduce the great and terrible tragedy of Mount Calvary by a contemptible little farce played eight hundred years before, out of sight of all mankind, on the shore of a far distant sea, is so ridiculous a notion that orthodoxy itself, out of regard for the dignity of its own "scheme of redemption," should find some way of ejecting it,—by the whale's way, if no better offers. According to every rule of literary criticism, it is impossible that the farce of Jonah and the tragedy of the Cross should be attributed to the same author. A "sign" so ludicrously incongruous with the thing signified is manifestly due to the desperate efforts of orthodoxy to save the infallibility of its Bible.

Some modern commentators, as Gesenius, De Wette, Rosenmueller, Friedrichsen, and others, have been disposed to see in the story of Jonah and the whale a transformation or modification of two Greek myths, although the hypothesis is extremely unlikely. When Neptune and Apollo had built the walls of Troy, and been refused by Laomedon, king of Troy, the promised reward, Neptune sent a terrible sea-monster to ravage the coasts of the country. As the only means of freeing the people from this scourge, Laomedon, in obedience to the oracle, exposed his own daughter Hesione, bound to a crag by the sea-shore, as a prey to the monster. Hercules, returning luckily just at this time in his vessel from the Euxine, slew the monster, and thus rescued the maiden from her peril. This is the story as told by Ovid, Diodorus Siculus, and Apollodorus. In later writers, as in Lycophron's Cassandra (whom Niebuhr places in the second century after Christ), it is told that Hercules was himself swallowed by the monster, or even leaped voluntarily into his open jaws; and still later it is said by Christian writers that he was three days in the creature's belly. But these later additions do not belong to the original Greek myth, and they may have been suggested by the story of Jonah itself. The other Greek myth—that of the rescue of Andromeda from a similar monster near Joppa by Perseus, who turned him to stone with the head of Medusa—is probably a variation of the one just mentioned, and has no likeness to the story of Jonah excepting in the name of the locality where the beast appeared. F. Baur discovers in the story the traces of a Babylonian myth, which describes a monster called Oannes, half man and half fish, as coming daily from the Red Sea into the neighborhood of Babylon, and as teaching the people the arts, sciences, and religion. The points of resemblance are in the names Jonah and Oannes, and in the preaching of religion by both; and while I think this a more plausible origin of the Jonah story than either of the Greek myths I have referred to, I doubt much it is the true one. Most likely the author of the book drew either on his own imagination or on some legend floating among his own people.

The book of Jonah, however, if regarded according to the probable intention of its author, is by no means devoid of merit. Of course it has no claim to be considered as historical, nor do I feel at all sure that it was meant to be so considered; and I cannot agree with those who think there may possibly have been some small basis of fact for the alleged mission of Jonah to the Assyrians. The work was in all likelihood designed to teach a moral lesson in the pure form of a parable or apologue. Its chief aim, at any rate, is didactic, and not historical. The Assyrians remained idolaters to the end; and there is no evidence of any such mission as that of Jonah to any Gentile nation. This would contradict point-blank the narrow Judaic notion that the Hebrews were the chosen people, the sole favorites of Jehovah. In fact, the object of the book seems to have been to make this very contradiction,—“to oppose the narrow religious egotism [Particularismus] which prevailed throughout the bulk of the Jewish people—the conception of Jehovah, the one true God worshipped by themselves, as being only their own God, as having his abode only in their own land, and as embracing only their own nation in his paternal love; the conception that it was right to cherish towards all other nations, as such, only hostile feelings, and instead of their conversion to wish only for their destruction.” [Bleek, p. 574]. The truth is that the grand moral of the book of Jonah is to teach, in a manner far more catholic and impressive than that of any other book of the Old Testament, the universal, all-comprehensive love of God towards all mankind, heathen as well as Jews; and in this it is a very striking anticipation of the noblest idea taught by Paul, the great apostle to the Gentiles, namely, that God has no respect for persons or nations, but regards all the human race as equally his children. Nay, its spirit is even broader and more liberal than that of Paul; for, while Paul required all men to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ as their savior, the book of Jonah would require them only to believe on God, and to seek his favor by simply abandoning the evil of their ways. These, surely, were great and grand ideas; and if modern thought goes farther still, abolishing that fear of God which was the motive appealed to by the hero of the parable, they are none the less remarkable in that early period, and none the less entitled to respect because mixed up with wild and childish imaginations of ichthyological impossibilities.

The story of Jonah is, of course, historically incredible and scientifically absurd; but none the less is its moral teaching in many respects sublime. Clothed in the uncouth imagery of oriental fiction, and yet strikingly free from the spasmodic, overstrained, and distorted language which is the vice of modern poetizers, the moral sentiments of the Jewish people, as expressed by their prophets, psalmists, and even chroniclers, took on a form sometimes grotesque but always impressive and commanding. The older I grow and the more radical I become, the more profoundly am I filled with admiration for the massiveness, the ruggedness, and the strength of the faith with which those old Hebrews believed in the moral law. To be sure, they often present very gross symbols of their Jehovah, and paint him as a huge, brawny, muscular giant, riding about on clouds and whirlwinds, shaking the mountains with earthquakes, and melting the hills with fire. But nevertheless was he to them a moral being—their personified, though imperfect, ideal of justice and purity. It may be superstition; but I am grateful to them for thus cleaving to the great truth that THE UNIVERSE HAS A CONSCIENCE—that right and wrong are not identical to Eternal Being—that in his moral consciousness Man is an epitome of the All of Things. With all their childish anthropomorphism, this thought in their minds struggled to find expression; and when I ponder upon it, I find that, before its stupendous majesty, we too are but as babbling babes. He that sees the most shall be able to say the least.

Making, then, all due allowance for the fantastic exterior of the book of Jonah, I wish to get at its core. Let me try to tell you of some solid truths I find in the general tenor, bearing, and spirit of the tale; and if I use it freely, it is to bring out what I dare say it was not in the conscious intent of the author to express, but what nevertheless must have lain, as it were, in the background of his consciousness. We never, perhaps, fully intend the best things in our best sayings; but if others find in any of our words any fine thought or large truth, the chances are that it at least lay in embryo in our minds. I credit the author of this book, therefore, with having taught a better lesson, after all, than he was aware of; and it is this I want to get at. Taking his story as I find it, I want to see what gold can be got from the ore,—what moral values it can be made to yield.

Now the summons to preach to the Assyrians a disagreeable, unpopular, and dangerous message, from which Jonah tried to escape by flight, may be taken as illustrating all ugly and hard duties. Jonah is unwilling to make the long journey and run its risks. So the poor fool shirks the task—tries to run away from God—forgets that God is within him, and can by no possibility be left behind. The deserter from duty deserts nothing but his own integrity and peace of mind. These he may leave in his rear; but the omnipresent obligation, the internal avenger in his own soul, embarks on ship-board with him. Go where he may, this is his travelling companion, constant as his shadow. When a man swallows poison, there is no cure in flight, no safety in fleetness of foot. But a spurned and dodged duty is arsenic in the soul itself; and though the delinquent takes refuge in Patagonia or Kamtschatka or the farthest isle of the Pacific, there is no antidote but in performance. So Jonah found that, by fleeing from God, from the present duty, he had only become a curse to himself. Is not that a good lesson—as good for radicals as for bibliolaters?

But not only did he become a curse to himself, but also to his companions. The ship is overtaken by a hurricane, and all are in equal peril. The Fates pursue him, and would sink the ninety and nine innocent rather than let go the one guilty. The belief that a criminal or unholy person on ship-board endangered the vessel's safety was a common one in antiquity. The Greeks of Samothrace believed that no one initiated in the ancient mysteries of their island had ever suffered shipwreck: and Theophrastus tells of a timid man who, going to Athens to celebrate the world-renowned Eleusinian mysteries, first anxiously asked each of his fellow passengers on the vessel if he had been initiated,—thereby implying a belief that the presence of even a single uninitiated person might send the ship to the bottom. Thus the renegade Jonah, by his guilt, brought the lightnings of God on his companions. Granting the superstition, is there no truth here? If you and I did but realize how our private goodness or wickedness involves the welfare of our fellow-men,—if we could but trace the ramifications of the evil in which we allow ourselves, out to its consequences in our neighbors and (above all) in our children and children's children,—if we could but perceive that we ascend life's mountain as tourists climb the Alps, each lashed to his fellow, and that the stumbling of one may be the destruction of all,—then, depend upon it, we should be less lax in the judgment we pass on our own hidden infidelities to the still, small voice. Concealment is but postponement of detection. We cheat nobody in the end, for the evil we secretly cherish at last stares the world in the face in the wretchedness of our neighbors or our posterity. There is a solidarity of moral destiny as well as of present interests among mankind. So much of truth there is in the old dogma of “Adam's federal headship of the race.” No ship's crew is safe with a Jonah on board. The storm that came upon the luckless voyagers in the story is but the dramatic statement of a great natural law. It is true in substance that the wrong we do recoils in woe, not only on ourselves, but on others, even on our best-beloved. The drunkard drinks death not to himself alone; the forger signs away his own integrity and the prospects of his family; the liar taints with insincerity the very air we breathe; the murderer stabs society in his victim. Of whatever nature it may be, the degradation we inflict upon ourselves brings a curse upon humanity, and may shipwreck those with whom we sail the voyage of life. So I see a terrible truth in the storm that threatened to engulf the fugitive Jonah and the whole ship's crew in one and the same destruction. A stern law, you say; but man did not make it and cannot repeal it. Set it down as hardest fact that, while we are morally asleep or off our guard, the woe that darkens silently over our misdeeds may burst with all the fury of a cyclone on the heads that we would most anxiously shield from harm.

With the insight of moral genius, the writer makes Jonah himself betray the hitherto close-guarded secret of his own conscience. The God he was fleeing from he bore all the time in his own bosom. “I know,” says he, “that for my sake this great tempest is upon you.” As murderers sometimes voluntarily confess, and out of sheer self-torment beg to be hung, so Jonah bids the crew to fling him overboard. He would rather perish alone than in a hecatomb of his own victims. In the story, however, all goes as in a novel, merrily as a marriage bell. The storm is quelled, the ship is saved, and Jonah is installed in a private state-room in a quite unprecedented craft, with free transportation to the end of his voyage. I confess I cannot get much meaning, moral or otherwise, out of that fish episode. It turns the doctrine of a special Providence into a broad burlesque. The learning of Agassiz himself would be baffled in the attempt to determine the species of the fish. Some believe it to have been a whale, others a porpoise, others a dolphin, others a peculiar kind of shark with an enormous throat, others a creature specially fitted up for the occasion to serve as a travelling submarine hotel. The problem is too deep for ichthyology. To escape the disagreeable suppositions naturally connected with the sojourn in a stomach that discharged its proper functions and thus to rescue the prophet from a bath of gastric juice, Bishop Jebb fancied that the whale put Jonah into a cavity of its throat, a receptacle capable, as he says, according to naturalists, of containing a merchant ship's jolly-boat full of men,—though the boat would surpass Mark Tapley himself, if it continued to be “jolly” under such circumstances. Jonah found leisure, it seems, in his snug retreat, to compose a metrical psalm or poem (in reality no proper part of the book as we have it) of thanksgiving for his deliverance from the sea, which he would hardly have felt inspired to do unless he had found his quarters reasonably comfortable. Out of this marvellous adventure I can extract no other moral than this, that, whenever a man is swallowed by a whale, the most useful occupation of his spare time is to write hymns. This will at least save him from temptation of prying too closely into the domestic arrangements of his host.

One of the most surprising features of the story is the immediate conversion of all the inhabitants of the great Assyrian city on hearing the warnings of Jonah. They at once repented en masse of all their wickedness, proclaimed a public fast, and put on sackcloth from the least to the greatest. The king left his throne and sat down on an ash-heap, and proclaimed that neither man nor beast should eat or drink, but that both “man and beast should be covered with sackcloth and cry mightily unto God.” A Greek historian relates that on one occasion the Persians cut the hair of their animals as well as their own hair in token of public mourning (Herodotus, Calliope, cap. 24); but the furnishing of every beast with a suit of sackcloth seems to have been original with the king of Nineveh. The tailors must have made money out of Jonah's preaching. Perhaps the camels were allowed to appear in camel's-hair shawls. At any rate the people were converted, and God forbore to execute his threat of destroying the city. Never was missionary or revivalist so wonderfully successful as Jonah. Elder Knapp has been lately trying to convert all Boston; but his success appears thus far to have been very limited. He ought to take lessons of Jonah. The truth is that great cities are seldom converted by wholesale. Yet good orthodox people believe the story of the conversion of Nineveh who would be as sceptical as you or I of the conversion of Chicago or New York. Miracles of this sort are credible to-day, even by those who most strenuously defend them, only when located in very distant places and times.

But the story nevertheless brings out a most natural trait of character in Jonah by representing him as disappointed at the success of his own mission. He had told the Assyrians that God would destroy their city in forty days, and seems quite mortified that his prediction was not fulfilled. Their conversion deprived him of the luxury of saying with exultation—“I told you so!” So he grew angry with God on account of his mercy, and had on the occasion a severe fit of the sulks. This is very true to human nature in some of its aspects. Jonah had been driven into the ministry by fear of the consequences to himself, not drawn into it by love of his fellow-men. He had tried to shirk his duty, and had been coerced into fulfilling it by three days' imprisonment in an improvised lock-up. Hence he took no pleasure in the salvation of the poor heathen whom he was sent to save, and yielded to the selfish promptings of his character. How true it is that serving a noble cause will ennoble those only who serve it nobly! Many a man went into our own civil war with purely selfish motives, and came out of it unbaptized by the grand inspirations of a struggle for the rights of man. It is quite possible to serve mechanically or selfishly the divinest of causes; and he who does so remains unconsecrated by the unselfish sacrifice of private interests to the universal welfare. There is many a Jonah among those who profess to be toiling for humanity. In reality they are only toiling for themselves. The martyr wins no crown if he fails to forget himself in the cause for which he suffers. His vanity or his selfishness neutralizes the merit of all his sacrifices. There are deep lessons here in the story of the soured prophet. The great cause must be served with the dignity and moral grandeur of self-forgetfulness. It is enough to have spoken our best and bravest word, to have done our truest and noblest act. Whoever goes beyond this and looks for reward, is no worthy servant of truth. The great Power that rules the universe follows a higher law than our selfish expectation, and becomes a cat's-paw to no private egotism of man. This is the grand moral of Jonah's peevishness and its rebuke; and it is a lesson everlastingly true. If we carry home a fuller appreciation of it from a little thought on this quaint old book of Jonah, I think we shall not have spent our hour this morning in vain.

PREMISES NOT WELL TAKEN.

[From the Christian Radical, of Pittsburgh, Pa., May 13.]

If it did not involve such serious consequences, it would be diverting to see how the editor of the Toledo INDEX builds up men of paper and straw, and then levels on them, at long range, his heaviest guns. Of course, when he fires, they fall. He set them up to fall when he should shoot. This looks martial, imparts effect, and gives him the appearance of the “heroic.” Straw men are not hard to grapple. Paper men offer no resistance. This is a cheap way some men have of acquiring celebrity. But it is a coward's way after all.

Soberly, the editor of THE INDEX makes grievous and fatal mistakes in his premises. And at last our argument is much or little, great or small, as we premise well. The tact of the reasoner cannot alleviate the false premise. The INDEX editor argues well, acutely. He is a very Aristotle, and more, in logic. So subtle is he, indeed, that “He can distinguish and divide

A hair, 'twixt South and Southwest side.”

His conclusions no one can complain of; they are sound. Never hound followed scent with more instinctive accuracy than he does the “thread of the argument.” But it seems to us he does not take his premises well. Error here gets into all succeeding processes of discourse, enters like air into every word and thought. For at last there is something above logic, and there is a faculty sphered higher than the understanding. And so, after all the editor's tact and toil and persistence, his conclusion is vitiated, and the result he has wrought out is a baseless fabric; the house he builds stands down in the sand. And the history of all such houses is that they fall down at last.

It is known that Mr. Abbot has "taken up arms against" Christ and the Gospel. These must be displaced, and bow to Free Religion. But it seems to us that learned, scholarly, and self-assured as he is, he gets no clear, full vision of the original historic Christ. More: it seems to us he lacks the function to apprehend the most beautiful and loftiest stars in the spiritual firmament. He imagines a Christ and a Christianity. He has a conceit. This, or he sets his camera upon and takes a reflex of the sect's Christ—the Romanist Christ, or the Protestant Christ, or the Calvinistic Christ, or the Lutheran Christ. That from one or all of these there should be envisaged in his consciousness an ill-omened, lean, unseemly, unnatural, discordant and incomplete Jesus, is manifest enough. And that the editor of THE INDEX should get out of all humor with such a person, is not particularly surprising. If this were all, we would be silent.

But he mistakes at a more vital point. The sect's Christ is not God's Christ. The Christ of the creed is not the Christ of God; the Christ of the New Testament is not the Christ of Trent, Augsburg, or Westminster. And any one who knows the original Christ in his true sources, in his normal character, could not infer or conclude upon such a poor dwarf as the INDEX editor conceives and writes out in his discourses of Free Religion. Take an instance from a late issue of the paper. "Last Sunday," says the editor in his sermon, "I tried to show that the Christian notion of a human God," &c. Christianity is certainly not responsible for Mr. Abbot's "human God." This is his foolish arrangement, not Christ's. He may have got it from orthodoxy, but by what process he could grind it out of the Record we are unable to see. Higher than this he never rises. Mr. Abbot talks vaguely and arbitrarily about what Reason is, in utter and arbitrary contempt of facts; Christ, recognizing the facts as written in history and testified to in universal consciousness, reveals what Reason is able and willing to do in view of them. No such Christ as Mr. Abbot outlines and announces is held in the record of the Revelation of God; no such Christ ever stood on the earth, or instructed the people or pronounced a religion. Mr. A. does not deal fairly with the Son of God.

But there is a sublime record with all the ordinary proofs of genuineness and authenticity, that reveals us a great Christ, so perennial, and of such beauty, strength, purity, freedom, insight, reason and sympathy with the universe, as nature and spirit, and withal of such mighty utterance and deed and such all-embracing and helpful life, that to be out of accord with him, to refuse him, to break with him, to have a desire averse to him, indicates fearful spiritual lapse, and in spite of one's conceit, a fatal lack of good sense, and in whose great presence it looks pedantic to talk learnedly of Nature and Law and Reason as if He too did not know of these in their normal condition and possibility, and so what was eternally due to them.

To these original sources and with an unbiased mind Mr. Abbot certainly has never gone. He could not so have gone, we think, and come away with the picture he gives us, or bring back to us such a heartless result. What he calls Christianity is the merest fancy, the most chaotic dream. It may come well enough from the dead creeds or the shallow and selfish life of the mere churchman, but it can no more come from the Lord Jesus Christ than you can get night out of the sun in the high noon of summer, or miscarriage and wreck out of the high and rhythmic order of the stars. "Outside of such Christianity" as he has wrought out or concluded upon he may well "stand," as he declares. We too do "stand outside" of it. From such unnatural, unhistoric and barren Christ as he conceives he may well stand absolved. So do we, indeed. There is no kinship between him and the Christ we have found in the Testament.

But there is a Christianity whose zone is limitless, that includes all, is inward to all, that is answer to all quest of heart and reason, "outside" of which we would not stand if we could, "outside" of which Mr. Abbot cannot stand if he would. And there is a Christ, so self-centred, so in travail of creative work and purpose, so conditional of all there is in nature and soul, so deep and universal in his heart-throbs, and so primal in character and being as to be Law, Nature, Reason in their Cause and Germ. From Him we would not be absolved. From Him Mr. Abbot cannot. This Christ is great enough and paternal enough to pity him, to pity us all—and to be patient with his folly; but after the editor of THE INDEX has closed his bitter crusade against Him, Jesus will still live on, regnant and royal, in the highest type of souls.

[Mr. Schindler, the editor of the Christian Radical, is a man of ability, and frequently of real liberality of feeling, though sometimes he writes very weak, very arrogant, and very bitter paragraphs. He should learn that sarcasm, to be effective, must be courteous. This we say with no special reference to the above article, though not wholly inapplicable to it.

The "Christ of the new Testament" is not the idealized Christ of Mr. Schindler, who worships a figment of his own brain. We stick to the record, and find many false and foolish things attributed to Jesus in it. But the Christ of Orthodoxy is neither that of the New Testament nor that of the Christian Radical, but rather that of the great Christian creeds believed by all sects. These affirm that the man Jesus is the incarnate eternal God. Will Mr. Schindler venture to deny this? Yet what is such a God, if not "human," as we said? Mr. Schindler must excuse us if we decline to accept his sporadic and "radical" thought as the standard of Christianity. For this we turn to history and existing institutions. That the "human God" is still worshipped all about us, the following article is a good illustration.—Ed.]

JESUS CHRIST IS GOD.

[From the Milwaukee Index, May 4.]

The human race, in every age and nation, have felt the necessity of a God made manifest or demonstrated to the senses. To the majority, and perhaps to all, the invisible is not quite satisfactory. The philosopher who has calculated and located his hitherto undiscovered star rests not until his eye beholds it through his glass. So urgent have been the wants for a physical manifestation of Jehovah, that some have selected one thing and some another, and have called it God, and have worshipped it. The sun, the stars, the universe are his handiwork; but no one in all of them is Himself. Had it been clearly revealed to us that our sun were actually God, intelligently ruling and spreading his benevolence abroad, we would cheerfully acquiesce, and would not even urge or suggest that it might have been better, had He appeared in human form so as to talk and reason and sympathize with us. In the divine wisdom it was considered best that God should manifest Himself to Man in the person of Jesus Christ. No philosophy, human or divine, has ever yet shown how it might have been bettered. Was he a mere man? If yea, then any other great man would have done as well. He might have furnished a substitute, or conciliated Pilate and Herod and the populace, and avoided a crucifixion. As a man, he was no greater than John the Baptist, a contemporary than whom "a greater had not arisen;" a man of god-like heroism, and possessed of all the qualities and elements which constitute the noblest specimen of humanity. John was a perfect man. Jesus Christ was more—a perfect God—the invisible—the Unknown by himself—made visible to the physical senses: taking upon himself the penalty incurred and the judgment which had been pronounced against mankind. By his own inherent power He arose, leading captivity captive, and is now and will be the eternal, visible manifestation of God to the redeemed in the realms above, as he was to His disciples on earth.

How can this be? How can it be other wise?

God is reasonable toward His subjects; so reasonable that He has ever been logically demonstrating Himself to us by repeated experiments, miracles and suggestions. He has not commanded even the wisest man to comprehend Him as an abstraction. But when he comes in human form, and talks, and reasons, and by his wonderful acts, which in the nature of things can be done and performed by omnipotence alone, proves and demonstrates to the physical and mental senses, that all power in the universe is possessed by him, is it unreasonable that He should ask and expect us to believe,—aye, to worship Him, and to endorse His declaration—"I and my Father are one."

A new religious sect has made its appearance in Vienna, says the Pall Mall Gazette and has notified its existence and programme to Ministerial authorities. The new community will bear the names of "Confessors of the Message of Truth, Liberty, and Love," and their creed is as follows: 1. We acknowledge the world to be a unity of infinite space and time, the creative energy of which we call "Weltgeist." 2. We acknowledge that humanity is one of the innumerable forms in which the "Weltgeist" manifested himself in the series of his developments. We acknowledge that humanity is progressing in all ways, and we declare it to be every man's task to assist in this improvement with all his powers. 3. We acknowledge the indestructibility of the Essence in all the phenomena of the "Weltgeist," and, consequently, also in men; and we therefore consider death to be only the transition into a new form of temporal existence. 4. We acknowledge that there must be a retribution for all actions, but this is only a temporal nature. 5. We acknowledge that all those actions are good which are in harmony with the principle of the Essence, equality of all men, and which tend to the progress of humanity. All actions not in accordance with this are objectionable. 6. We acknowledge the notion of "God," as the idea of absolute perfection, to be a postulate of human reason. The ethics of the "Message" are: 1. The commands of liberty: Be moderate, be calm, be true, be clean, be industrious, be economical. 2. The commands of justice are: Offend not, ill-treat not, kill not, cheat not, steal not, rob not. 3. The commands of love are: Be courteous to all, be compassionate with the unhappy, be cheerful with the happy, assist the poor, tend the sick, protect the weak. The head of the new sect is Dr. Hippolyt Tauschinsky, and its president, the weaver, Herr Kajetan Schadle, of Funfhaus, Vienna. Nothing is as yet stated regarding the form of worship to be adopted in the new community, or as to the number of its adherents.—Cincinnati Israelite.

Sincerity, in all senses, seems to me the merit of the Koran; what has rendered it precious to the wild Arab men.—Carlyle.

The worst way to improve the world is to condemn it.—Pestus.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"Some kind friend has ordered THE INDEX sent to my address for the current year, and I assure you it is a present that is very much valued and appreciated. I would not be without it for five times its price. It seems to me that a new era is dawning in the history of man, as regards his religious belief. But a few years ago, the clergy even in this enlightened part of the country preached the everlasting torture of hell-fire and brimstone as the inevitable doom of the great majority of the human race, in its most literal sense. They preached it because a majority of the people were credulous enough, superstitious enough, and sufficiently priest-bound, to believe it. But now, since a majority of the people here have thrown off some of the old shackles that bound them to such monstrous ideas, and indulged in a little more free thought and investigation, this doctrine has become rather unpopular, and therefore the clergy have, as a rule, quit preaching it in its literal sense. Priestcraft advances just as fast as science, intelligence, free thought, &c., compel it to, and not a bit faster; and it is ever trying to drag them off the great road of progress into the mire and ditches of ignorance and superstition. But it does my soul good to know that there are such noble and fearless men as the editor and contributors to the editorial columns of THE INDEX, Parker Pillsbury, J. P. Mendum, J. W. Pike, and many others whose boundless love of truth and fearless determination to find it and publish it and proclaim it to the world, is destined to revolutionize the ideas of the people, and cause them sooner or later to free themselves from this bondage of soul and thought and make them happier, better, nobler."

—"Am very sorry to trouble you, but must have THE INDEX, if it should cost another subscription. In this section there are but three regular readers of THE INDEX, and they are becoming noted for their 'Infidelity.' I am glad of it, for one, and hope I can induce a few $2 out of some that cannot explain miracles and other Christian ideas to their own satisfaction or any one's else. In fear of being contaminated with the 'wicked little sheet,' they will not touch it, until they are cornered, and you know popular influence controls them, and must be broken before we can have success."

—"Enclosed find ten cents, for which send me ten copies of the tract containing 'Truths for the Times.' Being in harness from early to late, I have no time to devote to other work, even for THE INDEX, though in that case it would be a labor of love. I think, however, I can distribute ten copies to advantage, and if you receive only one subscriber as the result, I shall feel amply repaid."

—"Please send me a specimen copy of THE INDEX. I have read an article in the World which interests me, and I want to subscribe to your paper, if it is not too 'Orthodox.' I have been writing articles for some years in our village papers, but they refuse the best, because they rather go against the general run of ideas."

—"I will send the rest of yearly subscription in a few days, for I cannot do without THE INDEX. It is what I have thirsted for since 1855, when I outgrew Orthodoxy. May Free Religion have pure advocates, free from all trickery, outspoken, truth-loving men and women, ever desires yours in love of truth."

—"I rejoice in the success of your paper, and am personally very grateful to you."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be suspended during the months of July and August. Special notice will be given of any occasional meetings that may be held.

RECEIVED.

THE LIFE OF HERNANDO CORTES. By Arthur Helps. Author of the "Spanish Conquest of America." New York: G. P. PUTNAM & SONS, Association Building. 1871. 12mo. Two vols. in one; pp. 277, 307.

OLD AND NEW. Special Number for "Commencement," July, 1871. Published Monthly. Boston: Roberts Brothers, 142 Washington St. $4.00 a Year.

THE HERALD OF HEALTHS AND JOURNAL OF PHYSICAL CULTURE. New York: WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers, 13 & 15 Laight St. $2.00 a Year.

HOME AND HEALTH. A Monthly Magazine devoted to Health and the Home Circle. W. R. DU PUY & BROTHER, Publishers, 805 Broadway, New York. $1.50 a Year.

INAUGURATION at Baldwin University, Berea, Ohio, Thursday, June 8, 1871. Addresses, &c. Cleveland, O.: Printed at the "Christian Advance" Office, 14 & 16 South Water St. 1871.

CONCERNING THE MANAGEMENT OF THE BOSTON YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION. [New Tract by CHARLES K. WHEELER, 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.]

Poetry.

[For THE INDEX.]

THE STATUE.

BY FREDERIC R. MARVIN.

For Art with busy hand I wrought:
I held the chisel day by day,
Until the stone I saw assume
The form that I had shaped in clay.

Alone I wrought, nor would I see
The friends that I had known before;
I could not love them less, but O,
I loved the marble statue more!

The stone I shaped with cunning skill,
And formed the limbs with tender grace;
My passion strange and deep I wrought
In love upon the upturned face.

But while I wrought, a silver cloud
Came softly from the bending sky,—
A spirit sent from God to dwell
And beam within the tender eye.

So he who leaves the busy world,
In silence shapes a noble thought,
From God a life shall see descend
Upon the statue he hath wrought.

The Index.

JULY 8, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX" is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed; and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	Oh.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten "	1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	500
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	One	100
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	Oh.,	"	100
"	Defiance,	"	"	100
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	100
J. SEDGEBER,	Painesville,	Oh.,	"	100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	500
				$16,600

Mr. Frothingham sailed for Europe on June 24, to be absent three months on a well-earned vacation. But he has very kindly left several articles for THE INDEX, written in advance, which will appear from time to time during the summer.

"THE EXAMINER."

The July number of the Examiner republishes, as its leading article, Miss Cobbe's charming preface to her "Alone to the Alone." Following this is a long and strong article by the editor, entitled "The Nazarene Faticism; or the Errors of Jesus and of Primitive Christianity,"—a paper of remarkable incisiveness, ability, and vigor. It brings forward an array of passages from the New Testament proving incontestably, in our opinion, that the Messianic claim was the great object and dominant idea of the preaching of Jesus. Mr. Towne says (and we agree with his statement in the main) that "the question of Christianity is in no sense whatever, not even in the very least degree, a question of the individual who has so long been called the Christ, the Lord Christ, and even the God Christ." The real history of Christianity, however, is the history of the Christ-idea,—not, as Mr. Towne probably means, the history of pure spiritual religion. The personal Jesus is of small account in this history; but his function as Emperor in the great spiritual imperialism of Christianity is all-important.

Considering the superstitious idolatry of Jesus engendered by his supposed royalty, it may be well to handle him roughly and smite him hip and thigh; and this Mr. Towne does as if he wielded the hammer of Thor himself. We never have seen any one so thoroughly snubbed and hustled about as Jesus is in this article. "Deficient intelligence,"—"extreme narrowness of understanding,"—"gross ignorance,"—"ignorant madman,"—"intense, not to say excessively bitter spirit,"—"believed in nothing but himself,"—"vagrant pretender,"—"attempt to redeem Jesus from the just opprobrium of mankind,"—"vagrant fanatic,"—"baffled pretender,"—"consummate egotism,"—"harlots whom the physico-spiritual character of his sympathy seems to have attracted and helped,"—"of woman, in any fine sense, or as other than the human female, he knew little or nothing,"—such are some of the strokes by which Mr. Towne sketches the character of Jesus; and they make us marvel why he should so indignantly repel the charge of regarding Jesus as an "inferior man." We have no interest whatever in the views to be taken of the personal Jesus otherwise than as a matter of historic justice; but this requires, we think, a different treatment.

Radicalism is not measured by the vehemence of its attacks on individuals, but rather by the degree of its comprehension of universal principles and its insight into the tendencies of the age. We should consider our friend more radical, if he perceived the decadence of all historical religions in modern times, and the rising power of that religion of humanity which is fated, despite all indignant or despairing protests, to supersede them all and establish itself upon their ruins.

"New Testament Types of Religiousness," by W. C. Gannett,—which is a fine study of character,—a letter from Dr. Bartol, a poem from England, and over thirty pages of book notices, conclude the number. The latter department is very ably managed, and shows Mr. Towne's literary ability to great advantage. Trenchant and perfectly fearless, he makes his reviews exceedingly pu ant; and one feels that the writer is giving his most honest thought. Altogether, this number of the Examiner is one of the best thus far issued.

INDIANS AND DOGS.

The massacre of the Apaches women and children at Camp Grant, Arizona, was simply horrible. Trusting to the promised protection of the United States government, five hundred of the Apaches were in good faith making an attempt to live in industry and peace, when the white adventurers of the frontiers, who make money out of every Indian war, attacked them, burnt their huts, butchered their women and children, and drove the few survivors to the mountains. If a tenth part of the treasure expended in making war upon the Indians were devoted to protecting them from the fangs of these white wolves, the other nine-tenths could be saved; and the skirts of America would not be drenched with the blood of these wretched victims of her barbarity and rapacity.

We do not idealize the Indians; they are savages and need to be civilized, if possible. Even if they cannot be civilized (a conclusion based not on experience, but on hard-hearted selfishness), and if, as indeed seems certain, they are fated to pass away before the whites, they should be nevertheless treated meanwhile with justice. It is the fashion with too many Western journals to sneer at the "sentimentality" of the East over the Indians. It is not a question of sentiment, but of justice. The Indians have a right to decent and fair treatment. Who ever heard of a white man punished for shooting an Indian? Even a dog will bite, if you kick him. It would be a mean dog that would not. Is not an Indian as good as a dog? What the Indians want most of all is protection; and he who would withhold this from them is one of the murderers who slew the poor women and children of the Apaches.

At a convention held recently in Sturgis, Michigan, under the auspices of the Spiritualists, the following resolution was adopted among others, as reported in the Present Age:—

"Resolved, That we recognize and approve the liberal spirit and high aims of the Free Religious Association which lately held its Anniversary in Boston; and should any of its speakers again visit the West, we tender them our aid and co-operation in their efforts to educate the people in religious freedom."

Without having or wishing to have any authority to speak for the Association, we would return our thanks, as an individual member of it, for these courteous and cordial words. Although no more a Spiritualist than a Materialist, we have sincere sympathy with every one, man, woman, and child, who loves freedom and wants to use it nobly; and we gratefully accept the fellowship of all who are large-minded enough to forget their private idiosyncracies of belief when the universal interests of mankind are at stake. Let us by all means cherish every strong conviction as sacred; but let us not exact assent to our own opinions as the condition of working with others who are equally devoted to the same general objects. If men can agree on ends and means, they have all the necessary elements of unity in action; and whoever then steps forward to catechize his fellows as to their religious beliefs is a caricature of the Grand Inquisitor. The Michigan Spiritualists have set a nobler example.

PIOUS FRAUDS.

The Jesuitical doctrine that the end justifies the means has had many avowed advocates in Christianity, and many more who practised secretly what they dared not preach publicly. Lecky says that the "Fathers" of the Church laid down as a distinct proposition that pious frauds (that is, lies told in the supposed interest of truth) were justifiable and even laudable. He thinks it was a necessary consequence of the doctrine of exclusive salvation. It seems not improbable. If I believe, really and firmly believe, that the future life and happiness of my brother man hangs on the thread of some doctrinal belief, it is probable that I shall resort to any means to compel him to believe in order to save his soul. To get that saving thread around his neck, I would even hang him by a rope till he is "dead," if necessary. Rather than suffer his spirit to burn through eternity hereafter, I would burn his body at the stake here. The end, salvation, is so all-important that I doubt if I should scruple at any means.

Why should I? Is there scripture anywhere which forbids it? Did Jesus anywhere teach that the end does not justify the means,—that you should not at any time and on any account deceive, lie, and cheat, for the sake of a seat in the kingdom of heaven? He teaches benevolence, charity, and love to man—all good, very good; but where does he expressly condemn pious frauds? As to the doctrine of love, the Jesuit may reply—"I do love my brother man; I love him so much that I will trick and trap him into salvation, if necessary; I love him so much that I will sacrifice honesty to my love, principle to my affection; or rather I will adopt another principle, that honesty is not at all times the best policy, but that pious frauds are justifiable."

How will Christianity answer him? It has no answer. The reason is that, with all the truth there is in Christianity, with all its rich element of love and charity, it is lacking in the anti-jesuitical spirit, the spirit of inquiry and the spirit of truthfulness. The consequence is that there are one hundred sermons preached from Christian pulpits on the duty of charity and love where there is one preached on the duty of honesty. We have our "homes for little wanderers," our hospitals and asylums and benevolent institutions of all kinds, for which we must acknowledge ourselves greatly indebted to the love-spirit so prominent in Christianity. But at the same time we have our religious, commercial and political Jesuits, the men who do evil that good may come to our church or our party; and Christianity is dumb. She has no weapons of tongue or hand to raise against them. She is utterly powerless to reach our bank-defaulters, our legal swindlers who fail rich, our Jim Fiske Jrs., and Judge Barnards and other good-natured, generous, gentlemanly public robbers. What do they care for the Sermon on the Mount or Paul's epistle on Faith, Hope and Charity? It doesn't touch their sins.

Jim Fiske gives; that is what the Scriptures command. It is true he gives stolen money; but what of that? Does the New Testament particularize about how you should get your money? Not at all. It merely says love, love, love; give, give, give; and with the exception of a few isolated passages it says nothing about dishonesty, untruthfulness or Jesuitism.

I do not say that the Christian doctrine of love is chargeable with the great sin of dishonesty—the weakness, if not the characteristic of this age. But I do say that the Christian doctrine of damnation to unbelievers is, in a great measure, the direct or indirect cause of Jesuitical morals and practices. As I have said, the "Fathers" of the Church laid it down as a distinct proposition that pious frauds are justifiable. In my next I will consider what the "Fathers" did, and how some of their doctrinal children in Protestant churches are imitating their examples.

W. H. S.

SPIRITUALISM AND SUPERSTITION.

The essayist who opened the evening discussion on Dogmatism and Superstition at the recent convention of the Free Religious Association in Boston ventured the assertion that an immense possibility of superstition lay dormant, not altogether dormant either, in Spiritism—or Spiritualism, as its adherents less fittingly name it. The belief in the immediate presence of spirits and the possibility of holding intercourse with them, is practically inseparable from a desire to cultivate such intercourse. The cultivation of the intercourse has invariably, in every generation and among all sorts of people, led to some, if not to all, of the various kinds of necromancy,—the uneducated, yes, even the partially educated, feeling instinctively impelled to believe that disembodied spirits, having passed behind the veil laid by the limitations of the body and been introduced into the sphere with which the untaught imagination always associates light, must know many things no mortal can know and must be inclined to tell what they know to their friends who grope and stumble on earth.

To disabuse the mind of this ancient and deep-seated persuasion requires an intellectual discernment that very few possess, and a moral effort that very few can make. It is hard for the thoughtful and cultured to escape the impression which thousands of years of Christian and other teaching has stamped in the very texture of the mind. Involuntarily we think of spirits as angels, and of angels as illuminated. So far from being simply "men with their jackets off," as Professor Denton called them, they are generally regarded as more than men, in that they have revealed to them what mortal eyes are not permitted to see. The "putting off of their jackets" may not enhance their intellectual powers, but it is supposed to introduce them to a wider world. Their eyes may be no keener, but if new objects are presented, more will be seen. There is probably not a "Spiritualist" in a thousand who does not entertain the notion that commerce with the disembodied will bring new light upon dark problems.

That multitudes do entertain such a notion is a fact of such familiar experience that Prof. Denton's assertion that he never saw any such took me by surprise. I have had in my library large volumes containing alleged revelations of speculative truth from eminent philosophers and teachers long since departed. I know more than one man who never undertakes a financial enterprise until the familiar spirit approves. Nothing is so common in my acquaintance with "Spiritualists" as the profession of faith in the superior intelligence of minds that were quite immature when the change of death came. Parents accept instruction from their children. Husbands listen to counsel from wives and wives from husbands, whom on earth they did not habitually consult or implicitly rely upon.

The Spiritualist philosophy is often, if not always, represented as a philosophy learned in the other world and communicated by the inhabitants of it. Of the attendants at the public meetings of Spiritualists, a large number, as they listen to the trance speaker, suppose themselves to be listening to wisdom from a higher than human source. The speaker is regarded as a seer, a prophet, a power through whom the superior intelligences communicate their thoughts. This is simply a matter of personal knowledge, not at all of opinion. Others may have had a different experience, but this has been mine; and any other than this would have been unaccountable in view of the natural credulity and the general ignorance of mankind.

It is now several years since I declined changing places on Sunday with a speaker engaged by a congregation of Spiritualists. The ground of my reluctance was fairly stated to be the spiritualistic method of arriving at truth by the passive reception of ideas or impressions communicated to the speaker, whether in the trance state or otherwise, by spirits no longer in the body. That method seemed to me irrational and dangerous, and I could not seem to countenance it by allowing one of its servants to occupy my platform. The reason given was quietly accepted. No denial of its position was ventured. Indeed, the applicant himself acknowledged the fact on which my objection was based.

Now here is the ground-work for a complete structure of superstition. Through this opening every kind of delusion may come in, guardian angel, persecuting fiend, divination, fortune-telling, prophecy, seership, private missions, illuminations, enthusiasms and fanaticism; and there is no protection against them but such common sense, prudence, conscience, or culture as few possess. The many will follow fancy to the ruin of reason. That Spiritualism necessarily involves all this I do not say or think; for hundreds of Spiritualists are content with the assurance of their friends' existence and presence, and are never tempted to cross-question them on matters of speculative truth, or to call them in as counsellors and guides in affairs of practical experience. It is not a belief in the real existence or actual presence of spirits that constitutes superstition, but belief in their direct agency in the control of human concerns. The former belief does not necessarily imply the latter; but that it suggests it, leads to it, and encourages it, can scarcely be denied. The step from the one to the other is short and easy. The multitude take it thoughtlessly. Not to take it all requires either an incurious mind or a well-balanced one.

There is the danger, a danger great and imminent, against which all reasonable men and women, whether Spiritualists or not, will anxiously guard. They who have at heart so peculiarly the faith in immortality as our friends the Spiritualists have, should be very jealous of its purity, and should deprecate earnestly the reproach that may be cast on it by clearly rational minds, as a promoter of some of the worst evils that have afflicted mankind. If they would secure the favor of sensible people, they must let them see that they are not at war with good sense. The foes of superstition will pursue it into its hiding places, seize it at the very doors of the altar, and mercilessly slay it in the presence of its idols and on the floor of its sanctuary. Temples from which it can not be exorcised will be pulled down. Beliefs from which its virus cannot be washed, extracted or expelled by any disinfecting agent, will be burned like tainted clothing. We must, at all costs, be rid of superstition. It is a plague which no sanctity can justify, which no faith can neutralize. It were better that very sacred and dear beliefs should go than that this enemy of all rational belief should remain. Let us prefer to have no other world than to have another world full of teasing, troublesome, meddlesome beings who interfere with the rational order of the world we dwell in.

O. B. F.

The "Friends of Human Progress," at their late convention in Waterloo, N. Y., passed a series of nine resolutions, the first of which is as follows:—

"Resolved, That we most heartily welcome all movements, everywhere, in behalf of the freedom, enlightenment, and elevation of man, and that we are greatly encouraged by the increasing signs of the times which indicate the advance of rational, unsectarian, and philanthropic religion—of a religion that is thoroughly emancipated from bondage to creeds, superstition, and ecclesiastical authority, and declares itself in pure character and good works,—that is free to use rationally and helpfully the Scriptures of all faiths and the wisdom of all the world's great prophets and teachers; that allows itself to employ all days for the best service of mankind, and to use all institutions as if they were made for man, and not man for them; that is at full liberty to follow the investigations and accept the results of science; that is competent to form its own organizations untrammelled by the systems of the past, and that is so broad in its fellowship as to embrace all souls throughout the world who are seeking to know the truth and are inspired with the love of humanity."

The other resolutions advocate the suppression of the liquor traffic by the ballot; the disuse of tobacco; prison reform; woman suffrage; equal rights of the sexes in all respects; the reconciliation of capital and labor; vigilant protection of all citizens in their rights, especially at the South; and the continuance of President Grant's Indian policy. While sincerely endorsing most of these resolutions, particularly the first, we should not have voted for the second or the third. Prohibition laws, in our opinion, are false in principle and pernicious in practice; and deeply as we deplore the evils of intemperance, we have no sympathy whatever with the effort to put it down by law. As to tobacco, its use may or not be injurious; that is still an open question among persons equally honest and upright. But we believe that poor ventilation, bad cookery, insufficient clothing, and a thousand other evils, affect the public health vastly more than the use of tobacco. The resolution states more than we consider to be true. With these two exceptions, we cordially approve the substance of the resolutions; and we regret our necessary absence from the Meeting.

Mrs. Sara A. Underwood is plainly a lady of mental power and moral courage, as appears from a couple of articles in two Illinois papers, for which, we presume, we are indebted to her. She avows her radical convictions with a bravery and dignity which might well shame many of those who regard themselves as of the "stronger sex."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

MR. PILLSBURY IN FLORENCE.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS., June 26, 1871.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

Parker Pillsbury, an apostle of the "new departure" in religion, or rather of the new return to the simplicity, freedom, and purity of natural religion, occupied the desk of the Free Congregational Society of Florence, on the 11th and 18th inst., giving three lectures in all. He spoke impressively to good audiences. Mr. P. is well fitted by education and experience to pull down the strongholds of superstition. A graduate of one of the most prominent "evangelical" divinity schools, and for many years a devoted anti-slavery lecturer, he knows whereof he speaks. When he went forth to do battle for the slave, he found the ways barricaded by churches in league with the buyers and sellers of men.

At Mr. P.'s meeting in Florence, on the 11th and 18th inst., two of the upholders of "orthodox" creeds, availed themselves of the privilege accorded by the Florence Society, but denied to them by the churches, to speak in reply to the lecturer;—a good evidence of the power which Mr. Pillsbury brought to bear against church despotism.

Yours truly,

SETH HUNT.

TWO LETTERS.

PAINESVILLE, O., June 12, 1871.

FRIEND F. E. ABBOT:—

I address you as a friend because of the bold and fearless stand you have taken for the advancement of mental freedom and the abolition of creeds and priesthood, as set forth in THE INDEX; and to promote the success of your enterprise. I have endeavored (and will still continue) to assist you in the cause.

But as I am an outspoken Materialist of the Boston Investigator school, and have been for over twenty-five years past, and am daily increasing in confidence that our principles are correct, I write you in the most brotherly feeling to adopt a plan for a perfect reconciliation between yourself and Mr. Seaver. I myself felt the severity of your denunciation of an Infidel, as the great body of free-thinking Materialists take the same view of the modern meaning of the term Infidel that Mr. Seaver does. Cannot you retract a little, and smooth down the rough points in dispute, so as to finally end in substantial friendship as formerly?

Our school are your friends; and many of us have more or less aided the circulation of THE INDEX. We desire to go hand in hand with you. So let us have peace. You were first to wound; now be first to heal. And consider me your friend

Most truly,

J. SEDGEBEER.

BOSTON, June 15, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,— I cannot let this opportunity pass without saying a few words in regard to that most unfortunate disagreement between yourself and Mr. Seaver in regard to the use of the term "Infidel."

I cannot find a word of fault with you, and it seems strange to me that any sane man could so misapprehend you as he persists in doing. Yet being here in Boston, where I have an opportunity of judging, I can say that Mr. Seaver should be allowed a great deal of charity. He is a man who has grown old and gray in the service of an unpopular cause, and labored through years when to belong to an unpopular cause was considered almost, if not quite, criminal; and in that service the amount of insult, misrepresentation, and abuse he has had to bear would have completely soured many a man of more than ordinary patience.

I think the poor man is embittered to a great extent from the lack of appreciation from those who should have been his friends. You know how apt mild radicalism is to court conservatism by joining in denunciation of the more ultra radicalism. You know how it was all through the slavery agitation, and you know, too, that many pharisaical fingers have been pointed at Mr. Seaver with the saying—"I am better than he." I think, taking all the circumstances into consideration, that after all it is not so very strange that now, in passing into his second childhood, he should have become somewhat distrustful and mulish (as he most certainly has). He is becoming, I think, daily more imbued with the idea of his Ishmaelitic position, and incapable of judging who his real friends are.

How painful and pitiful it seems to see the poor man, in attending the liberal meetings in Music Hall, shrink meekly into some obscure corner, as though he were unwelcome there! Personally I am not acquainted with Mr. Seaver; but for his noble, self-sacrificing life, his devotion and industry in laboring for what to him are principles of truth, the martyrdom he has undergone in a thousand ways, however we may disagree in ideas with him, is sufficient to induce me to beg of you, Mr. Abbot, to heal, if possible by any means without sacrifice of your own honor, this breach which has been made by this unfortunate controversy.

I fear it is impossible, he is so obstinate and unreasoning in the matter. I fear that nothing but a square withdrawal from your position would satisfy him—which, of course, you ought under no circumstances, except by conviction, to do. Yet perhaps you might possibly, in some gentle manner, with your able and candid mind convince him that it is not the thing, but the name, that you object to.

Please excuse the liberty with which I address you, and attribute all failings to lack of ability rather than of intention

Respectfully,

R.—.

[Both of these letters are from gentlemen we have never seen; but they have both given generous and sympathetic support to THE INDEX, for which we most sincerely thank them. In reply to these urgent appeals, we ought to speak with entire frankness.

1. The article which so unnecessarily irritated Mr. Seaver was simply a rebuke to an evangelical paper for accusing members of the Free Religious Association of dishonesty, because they do not call themselves "infidels." Instead of "attacking the infidels," that is, the free-thinkers of the Investigator school, it defended them. It criticised the name "infidel" as a term of abuse used by bigots: but it defended the men who adopt this name, as being better than their slanderers. In making this criticism on the word, we neither said, hinted, nor thought anything whatever in the slightest degree derogatory to the Investigator, its editor, or any of its friends. We only said it was a mistake for liberals to call themselves "infidels," and gave good reasons for saying so which the Investigator has never ventured to discuss.

2. On the contrary, Mr. Seaver, ever since the appearance of this article, has been clamorously and bitterly accusing us of "attacking" him and his friends. This accusation we denied. That is the whole of the "unfortunate disagreement," so far as we are concerned. It was much easier to charge us with "attacking the infidels" than it was to answer our objections to adopting their name; and, although Mr. Seaver has for at least a year and a half been continually sneering at "Free Religion" without provoking any complaint on our part, he is so sensitive about his own chosen designation as to be unable to discriminate between criticism of this and attacks on himself.

3. What, then, have we to "retract?" Unkind slurs upon those who call themselves "infidels?" We have cast none. Or our statements about the proper meaning and use of the name? We cannot do this except for reasons; and no sufficient ones have been offered. If it is a grievance to any one that we consider the word "infidel" as a term of abuse, and not a fit designation of any honest man, we are very sorry, but cannot help it. There is nothing we can "retract." It is for Mr. Seaver, as a candid man, to "retract" his injurious accusation. But this he refuses to do, notwithstanding our explicit re-statement of our meaning. The utmost in our power is to overlook the injury, which we willingly do for the reasons so well expressed above by Mr. R.

4. It is true that we have found many good friends among those who call themselves "infidels." But if their friendship depends on our accepting their favorite name, we must relinquish it. We prefer to accept no party name at all. We have never even called ourselves a Free Religionist. The Free Religion we believe in we find among men of all names, and we know of no party that monopolizes it. Whatever odium is thrown upon any man for his fidelity to freedom, we will gladly share; we will stand by his side through thick and thin, and let bigots pelt us equally with what nicknames they please. But we do not propose to pick up the mud they throw and plaster it over our own face, nor yet to applaud our companion for doing this. To endure abuse without complaint is one thing; to endorse it by acceptance is a very different thing. Self-respect, a true dignity of character, and severe regard for the truth of things forbid any concession to those who would make thought a reproach and freedom itself a disgrace. We mean to stand by Materialist and Spiritualist, Atheist and Theist, and every man or woman who loves liberty enough to live by it; but we shall do this independently, not feeling bound to sanction their opinions or accept their names. These we shall criticise as freely as we please, submitting willingly to reciprocal criticism. If on these terms we cannot have friends, then we will go without them to the day of our death.

5. Everything that we can honorably do to restore pleasant relations with Mr. Seaver we have done. Nothing stands in their way but his own persistence in an injustice. We sincerely honor him for his past services in freedom's cause, and stand prepared to share any odium that may have been their reward. If any shrink from his side because he is called an Atheist, a Materialist, an Infidel, not so will we. He has a right to his own honest opinion and his own chosen name for it. But he has no right to bear false witness against his neighbor; and neither for peace's sake nor policy's sake can we concede that his witness against us is true. The moment he rights this wrong, harmony is restored. If, as Mr. Sedgebeer imagines, we had been "the first to wound," we would most certainly be "the first to heal." But this is a mistake. We cannot heal an imaginary wound we never inflicted.—ED.]

"LET US HAVE PEACE."

TITUSVILLE, PA., May 21, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Deeply regretting the prolonged and useless warfare between yourself and Mr. Seaver of the Boston Investigator, I beg leave to put this disagreeable matter in its true light, give each of the combatants his due, and ask of them a perpetual truce. Pardon me, however, if, in so doing, I shall be obliged to censure you both a little, though in a most friendly manner; you for an overstrained interpretation of the meaning of the word "infidel," Mr. Seaver for "taking it so hard" and keeping up so large and irritated a family-feud. It is true, though, that the word "infidel" may be interpreted as you interpret it; and if I could take only its etymological significance, I should have to side with you, and could not blame you at all. But, my dear sir, you will certainly allow that, in our days, that word "infidelity" has almost totally lost its etymological significance, and is now, not only by Infidels, but also by Christians, very generally understood and used synonymously with "disbelief in the Christian religion." It is also true that very orthodox Christians stand still to hold fast to its etymological significance only, and thus to fasten reproach and odiousness to it, because they believe and try to make out that Infidelity is a crime. And no doubt, if they had still the power as in by-gone times, they would not only try to make it a crime, but also punish it as such, and every infidel as a criminal; just as they did, when they had the power, with "heresy" and "heretics." This word, however, has no such etymological reproachfulness as the word "infidel," but literally signifies merely what this latter now generally means, that is, to choose, to think for oneself, to disbelieve. You were, then, merely mistaken in being for once orthodox, and in criticising those who use the word otherwise.

That is all I have to censure you for. For to suppose, as friend Seaver does, that you ever intended in your article in No. 66 of THE INDEX to accuse Infidels of faithlessness,—I never dreamed of this nor could I believe it for a moment; because—well, because you are Mr. Abbot, and could not thus stultify yourself; and because you are confessedly as much an Infidel as Mr. Seaver himself in point of fact. Hence I have to blame friend Seaver for misconstruing your meaning, and attributing to you what you could not have meant, although you said:—"That [faithlessness, &c.] is the theory behind the word 'infidel,' which is unconsciously endorsed by him who accepts the name." I have to blame Mr. Seaver also for keeping up so long and irritated a quarrel about nothing, when he might and I think ought to have done wiser and better by merely remonstrating good-naturedly against any possible accusation of Infidels through your interpretation of the name, and by giving his own version of it. I think even this, however, not altogether correct, because of his qualifying it by "as we believe." This, it is true, puts it in stronger opposition to "Mr. Abbot believes," but is wrong just for that individual explanation. Better, I think, would it have been, if he had said—"as it is now generally understood and believed," in spite of its literal sense.

You will perceive, my dear Mr. Abbot, that I make rather free in giving each of you his due censure; because I esteem you both too highly for such an uncalled-for, irritated quarrel, which I, and I believe every sensible reader of THE INDEX or the Investigator, and every true friend of each or both of you, must sincerely regret, as well on your own account as on account of the cause you are both equally earnestly and ably engaged in. I, for my part at least, acknowledge gratefully the eminent services you have been and are still both rendering to the cause of Mental Freedom—a cause dear to me and to every sincere Liberal—one that has too many foes yet to overcome; wherefore I think it much wiser and better to combat them jointly than to waste your ammunition against its and your mutual friends and thus make it and your enemies rejoice.

I have, perhaps, been speaking too freely in expressing my views of the deplorable feud between you and Mr. Seaver; will you allow me to express them as freely regarding your respective journals, THE INDEX and the Investigator, and their respective merits and demerits? I will promise you to do it impartially and in a most friendly spirit. I have been a subscriber to the Investigator for nearly twenty years, and to THE INDEX, as you well know, from its start, and think very well of both papers; yet, considering them both as journals merely, I prize the younger INDEX higher than its older brother, the Investigator, on account of its greater erudition, and its more scientific and better finished articles, and especially your own essays and those of your editorial associates—an advantage, you will admit, which the larger Investigator has not. I think also the general "communications" of THE INDEX, on the average, superior to those of the other paper. However, while I thus adjudge the prize to THE INDEX as a journal, I consider the Investigator far more advanced in its views, aims, and tendencies, and it would certainly be superior to THE INDEX every way, if its articles had that erudition and finish that makes THE INDEX so pleasant reading. While you still believe in God, Immortality, Religion, &c., these are considered by the Investigator as merely what they really are—unproved and unprovable "notions," and thus more or less distinctly and positively denied, which is certainly the better course. You believe in "God," although you cannot, any more or any better than Mr. Seaver, say what it is. I say deliberately "what it is;" for your God is not a he, like the Christians' God, who is a personal Being, if only a monster. Why, then, will you still insist on using the word, when it means—and you mean when using it—something else than it generally means, is intended and generally understood to mean? Is this not a worse misuse of a word than you attribute to those calling themselves Infidels, against which you protest? Far better not to believe in a thing we do not and cannot know, than to call it by a name that does not belong to it, or by a word that means something else. Immortality, too, in which you also believe (not because you are sure or know there will be immortality, but because you "wish and hope for it"), must also become, to say the very least, doubtful by this doubt of the existence of a God, must become at least as doubtful as this I-know-not-what of a God, and impossible by the nature and dependence, not to say identity, of the mind or "soul" on or with matter, as science proves it. And Religion, finally, you believe to be a part of human nature and necessary for man, while the Investigator considers it merely a superstition and an evil, and history proves it to have been both, from the commencement of history to this very day. (See the "Review" in my book lately published on the "Origin and Development of Religious Ideas.") Even "Free Religion" I cannot except, and therefore also not accept, though I readily admit it to be the best, or rather the least reprehensible, form of religion; especially as defined, understood, and rationalized by you. But not all "Free Religionists" are Abbots; nor is "Free Religion" with all who profess to believe in it as free, liberal, and rational as with you. I may, perhaps, at some future time, send you an article, in which I may treat of this subject, or these subjects, more extensively than I can in this already too long article.

Now, my dear Mr. Abbot, I have spoken with great (perhaps too great) freedom in the foregoing article. Believe me, however, in spite of my well-meant censure, with greatest esteem and sincerity

Truly yours,

MORRIS EINHSTEIN.

[We have said elsewhere all that is necessary about the "deplorable feud" referred to. We have no "feud" with any one.

Mr. Einstein could not have written with a kinder tone, nor could he have manifested a more candid spirit. His criticisms are very welcome, as all such criticisms will always be, and no apology is needed for a freedom that is used so sincerely and so courteously.

Which is really the more advanced position, that of the Investigator, or that of THE INDEX? This is a question of general interest, since these two papers only represent large general movements of thought.

1. The position of the Investigator, as stated above, is that of NEGATIVE DOGMATISM. God and Immortality are not only "unproved," but also "unprovable;" that is, no increase of human knowledge, no discoveries of science, no enlargement of the human mind, can possibly give men a reasonable ground of belief in either. Hence both God and Immortality are "more or less positively denied." This positive denial of them is logically necessitated by the principle that they are "unprovable;" for if they are truths of existence, it would be inexcusable presumption to say that they can never be proved or known. Further, the Investigator regards Religion as nothing but unmixed "evil and superstition," and therefore opposes it in every form.

Now this position we regard as unscientific, narrow, and antiquated. It is unscientific, because it is dogmatic and shuts off all unprejudiced inquiry on the highest subjects,—narrow, because it treats with contempt one of the noblest traits of man, his religious nature,—antiquated, because it is at least a hundred years behind the position of the great masters of modern thought. We think neither better nor worse of a man for being an Atheist, since every man should be judged by his character, not his opinions. But we object to dogmatic Atheism, because it is behind the age,—not up to the times. Herbert Spencer says:—"The Atheistic theory is not only absolutely unthinkable, but, even if it were thinkable, would not be a solution." Referring to the representatives of modern science, Prof. Tyndall says:—"They have as little fellowship with the Atheist who says there is no God as with the Theist who professes to know the mind of God." Such is the attitude of the best modern minds. Even progressive Atheism has ceased to be dogmatic, and got out of the ruts of blank denial. From the London Reasoner, started in 1846 and edited by the famous George Jacob Holyoake, and from his other writings, we quote a few passages which indicate a far more liberal and advanced philosophy, though still atheistic, than that of the Investigator:—

"Infidelity has been too long a mere negation."

"To the doctrine of a Deity and prospect of immortality I have, and can have, no aversion. Indeed, I gladly see such conjectures strengthened, and admissible evidence belonging thereto matured. As an intelligent speculation, it [Theology] will ever be one of the most absorbing in which mankind can be engaged."

"Those who regard Atheism as a mere negation of religion, regard it in its narrowest point of view."

"This [moral earnestness and endeavor] is one of the enlargements of Atheism which seems to be imperatively called for."

"What I am anxious to guard against is the impression that we acknowledge as of our party that numerous class of persons in this country who are simply ignorant of, or indifferent to, religion; who will cavil at a prophecy, or sneer at a humble believer, but who are susceptible of no generous inspiration of moral truth, nor make any sacrifices to enlighten those whom they affect to regard as superstitious. . . . Those we do not count, nor even another class who are simply neutral and negative. We only include those whose Atheism is active and fruitful—those who are Atheists, not from reaction, but from examination and conviction, and whose rejection of Christian tenets is translatable into a clearer moral life, and into systematic and patient endeavors for the benefit of others."

"If we do but pierce beneath the antagonism from which all development issues, we shall see how, both with the Christian and the Freethinker, the same intention is ever at the bottom."

"Though we regard human duties as commencing from man, we consider the promotion of human happiness, purity, and progress as something which would meet the approval of Deity. If there is not the recognition of God in Secularism, there is, as in all pure Moralism, the contingency of God. If Deity be not with us a dogma, it is reverted to as an ideality. Recognizing Nature as the great Self-Existence, we say, if there be a God of personal attributes, Nature is God. And if THE ALL be conscious, intelligent, humane, and equitable, our sincerity and our endeavors will be in harmony with the Universal Nature. We regard God, when we realize the idea of his possible existence, as the infinite enlargement of man's purest nature and highest faculties. . . . In this relative and ethical sense we might claim to be considered religious. For, if Secularism does not proceed upon the knowledge of a God Actual, it moves towards a God Possible."

This Secularistic Atheism of Holyoake is vastly more progressive, liberal and vital than the dogmatic Atheism of the Investigator. It comes very nearly into harmony with the earnest and reverential spirit of the nineteenth century; while the Investigator reflects chiefly the spirit of the eighteenth century. Even in its own line, it is behind the age.

2. The position of THE INDEX is that of SCIENTIFIC INQUIRY. It holds that Religion, instead of being merely a "superstition and an evil," contains even in its lowest forms something good and wholesome, which needs to be developed, educated, and emancipated, but not extirpated. It holds that the being of God and the reality of a future life are the profoundest problems of human thought; and it encourages the most faithful, hopeful, and fearless study of them in the spirit of modern science. It neither says "Yes!" nor "No!" but "Think!" It does not dogmatize either affirmatively or negatively; it respects the principle of "universal mental liberty" too deeply and consistently to fall into dogmatism of either kind. It believes that the human race, which grows more religious as it grows more intelligent, is not getting deeper into the mire, but, by making Religion free, is destined at last to make it also true. It looks with courage and infinite hope upon the scarcely-begun application of the scientific method to Religion, as sure to elicit truth far grander than we can now conceive; and this truth it believes will ennoble, not degrade, the human soul. It does not profess to see very far as yet, in this early twilight of human knowledge; but it has great faith that the light is increasing. It certainly will never shut its eyes, and cry—"It is night! It is night!"

Which of these two positions is the more advanced and liberal, we leave to the decision of those who best understand the spirit, wants, and tendencies of this age.—ED.]

Melancholy attends on the best joys of a merely ideal life.—Margaret Fuller.

INGENIOUS ANSWER.—Euclid being asked what the gods were, and wherein they delighted—"Of all things else concerning them," said he, "I am ignorant; but this I know, that they hate inquisitive persons;"—an answer which at that time, and remembering the sad fate of Socrates, showed his prudence at least.—Exchange.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WANTED—A SITUATION. The subscriber, who has had several years experience in teaching such studies as are generally pursued at Massachusetts High Schools, and also in giving piano-forte lessons, would accept a moderate compensation at a place where Bible-reading is not required in school, and where no attempt would be made to interfere with his religious convictions or with the management of his school. Address A. D. JACKSON, care of SAMUEL JACKSON, JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS. 78-83

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 731f

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 731f.

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COL- ENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not histori- cally true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Com- pany, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38yl

M. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE, BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS, Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published. D. G. FRANCIS, 75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGIN- SON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on the "RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELA- TION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Samaj;" also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England;" and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called). I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character? The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other. The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers. God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the welfare of all. Infidelity: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery. Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended. Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father. Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People. What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People. Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the profes- sional tricks of a Clergyman. Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear. The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing. Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath- keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.

Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath- keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Supersti- tion.

"It Injures Our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion? Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.

These four for 10 cents. Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE, 43 Bowdoin St., Boston. 701f

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Publisher & Bookseller,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

- The Origin of Species, By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
The Descent of Man, By DARWIN, 2 vols, each.... 2 00
Wallace on Natural Selection, (London)..... 2 00
Mivart on the Genesis of Species. 1 00
Man's Place in Nature, By HUXLEY..... 1 25
Origin of Species, By HUXLEY..... 1 00
Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condi- tion of Man, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
The Earthward Pilgrimage, By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
History of European Morals, from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols. 8vo..... 6 00
Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
Chips from a German Workshop, By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
The Old Roman World, By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
Short Studies on Great Subjects, By JAMES AN- THONY FROUDE..... 1 50
Lecture on Calvinism, By the same..... 75
The Heavens, An illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
Words and their Uses, By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
Steps of Belief, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
Nature and Life, By Rev. ROBERT COLLYER..... 1 50
Sartor Resartus, By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edi- tion 90
The Choice of Books, Same..... 75
Essays of Elia, By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
Thoughts about Art, By PHILIP GILBERT HAM- ERTON 2 00
Words of Weight on the Woman Question, (London)..... 2 25
The Friendships of Woman, By W. R. ALGER... 2 00
A Day by the Fire, LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
Sanctum Sanctorum, THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
Carlyle's Essays, Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
Among My Books, By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emer- son, 2 vols..... 5 00
Society and Solitude, By the same..... 2 00
Topics of the Times, By JAMES PARTON..... 2 00
Success and its Conditions, By E. P. WHIPPLE... 1 50
Literature and Life, By same..... 1 50
Tablets, By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
Companions of My Solitude, By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
Organization in Daily Life, Same..... 1 50
Realmah, By the same..... 1 50
War and Culture, By same..... 1 50
Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms, By same.... 1 25
Ten Great Religions, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
Light and Electricity, By TYNDALL..... 1 25
Our Girls, By DIO LEWIS..... 1 50
Studies in Literature, By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read,— NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
Principles of Psychology, By HERBERT SPENCER... 2 50
American Religion, By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
Fragments Of Science For Unscientific People, By TYN- DALL..... 2 00
Light Science For Leisure Hours, By R. A. PROCTOR... 3 00
Handbook Of Legendary And Mythological Art, By Mrs. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 3 50
Hereditary Genius—Its Laws and Consequences, By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
The Races of The Old World, By CHAS. L. BRACE.... 2 00
Little Women, By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
Wallace's Review Of Darwin's Descent Of Man, PA- PER..... 25

Address,

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Publisher and Bookseller.

Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten vol- umes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sew- ing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

Lecky's History of European Morals, 2 vols.....$6.00
Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols.....5.00
Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols.....5.00
Weiss's Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, 2 volumes.....6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870 (price $2.50). Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

Darwin's Origin of Species, price.....$2.00
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price.....2.00
Essays in Criticism, by Matthew Arnold, price.....2.00
Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, with portrait, price.....2.00
Any volume of the writings of Theodore Parker or Hen- ry D. Thoreau, each.....2.00
On the Heights, Auerbach.....2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.
For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.
For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.
For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.
For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,

LOCK BOX 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner- Stones.....	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Es- sential Spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. E. S. D.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Supersti- tion.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	48
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 28.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JULY 15, 1871.

WHOLE No. 81.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE CLERGY.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, June 25, 1871.]

A few days ago, Toledo had the honor of a visit from the renowned "Col. Dan Rice" and his circus. Throughout the city, enormous placards were posted on all the bill-boards whose dimensions were ample enough to accommodate them, picturing to the eyes of the admiring public the various attractions of the great show. One of these placards contained a life-size portrait of the white horse Excelsior, which "Dan Rice" professes to hold only a little less precious than "his wife and his religion;" and underneath the horse's likeness was the highly dramatic inscription—"I am Blind, yet I Speak!"

While contemplating the glories of this great work of art, and reading with due reverence the impressive legend beneath it, it occurred to me that "Dan Rice's" horse was an unconscious satire on the clergy. On the front of every pulpit, just below the cushioned Bible and with the addition, perhaps, of an index-hand pointing upward to the officiating clergyman, should be inscribed in large characters—"I am Blind, yet I Speak!" There is no class of men in modern times who see less and talk more than the clergy. There is no class of men whose eyes are so completely shut to the dominant ideas, purposes, and tendencies of the age, and who yet presume to give so much advice concerning the conduct of life. In fact, I think the blind horse Excelsior talked to better purpose than most clergymen. He was content to shake his head, affirmatively or negatively, in answer to direct questions; he kept his lips decorously shut all the while, and ventured no observations on matters he did not understand. Can as much be said of the clergy? During the past ten years I have heard or read a vast number of clerical utterances; every mail brings me numerous papers containing the distilled wisdom of their most deliberate thought; and yet in honesty I must confess that, rather than be a regular listener to the most distinguished Doctor of Divinity in the land, I should choose to sit under the preaching of "Dan Rice's" horse.

In saying this, I have no wish whatever to cast any reflections upon the personal character of the clergy, as a class. There are, of course, in their ranks, more wolves than one in sheep's clothing—more than one hypocrite who makes a cloak of his profession to pursue selfish or even infamous objects. Every now and then the whole community is shocked by the discovery of some clerical rascality or scandal; and the disgrace of it is sought to be extended by some even over those who are utterly innocent of offence.

There is something very mean in that spirit which would judge a whole class of men by the misconduct of one of their number; and it makes no difference whether Christians judge "infidels" or "infidels" judge Christians in this manner. Some papers that I see are in the habit of collecting the details of such cases of individual clerical delinquency, as if they were arguments of great force against clerical notions; but I see in these disgusting collections a proof of nothing except the malice and venom of the collectors. The simple truth is that clergymen as a class are neither better nor worse than the rest of mankind. They have their especial virtues and their especial failings; and while I recognize these, I think the only just course is to judge every man, clergyman or layman, as an individual only. The traditional superiority of moral character in the clergy I believe to be illusory; and I say this as one who has enjoyed exceptional advantages of observation. But I also believe that the jealous suspicion of all clergymen entertained by many liberals is equally illusory, and leads often to great practical injustice. The great majority of clergymen are, I doubt not, honest and well-intentioned men, quite as much disposed to do their whole duty in sincerity of heart as any other class of men whatever. Having been educated as a clergyman myself, and, after several years' service as such, having devoted myself to the life of an independent and unprofessional worker for ideas, I should repel as a slander the suggestion that my resignation of the clerical name and office had its origin in any increase of honesty or decrease of hypocrisy. No more can I doubt the entire sincerity of the great body of clergymen throughout the country. Little as I now sympathize with clerical ideas and objects, I still regard clergymen on the average as the moral equals of any other class, whose peculiar failings are offset by peculiar virtues; and when a question is raised concerning the character of any one of them, I should insist on his right to be judged as an individual man, instead of being hastily acquitted or condemned as a member of a particular profession.

At the same time, while conceding the average equality of the clerical character with that of the other classes of the community, I hold that the clerical education and routine of duties are especially unfavorable to a healthy expansion of mind. Clergymen move within a circle of ideas so narrow that I wonder more and more that any one of their number ever bursts through its restraints. Their influence, based on these ideas, is hostile to the whole movement of modern society; it would perpetuate a mode of thought and of activity which belonged to the Dark Ages, and would make the nineteenth century as dark as the ninth, were it not that science and civilization are more and more completely nullifying its effects. In truth the clergy very little understand the source of what influence they still wield to-day. If men did not, through the power of early education, continue to associate the fundamental ideas of morals with the traditional doctrines of Christianity,—if they did not still believe, however mistakenly, that the world would go to rack and ruin but for the good moral influence of Christian preaching,—the clergy would soon lose all hold on the heart of this generation.

The extent of secret unbelief among nominally Christian congregations is amazing; and it is daily increasing. Clergymen themselves are feeling its reflex influence; and this reflex influence is the true explanation of such disturbances as the Tyng and Cheney imbroglios among the Episcopalians. A small minority of clergymen are heading a revolt in the Church which directly tends to break up all clerical prestige whatever. They are really traitors to their order; and, with the same instinct which characterizes all oligarchies, the dominant authorities strive to crush them. The revolt is at heart a rationalistic protest against the antique and decaying supernaturalism of Christianity. If suffered to go on, it will by degrees break up, not only the entire system of Christian doctrine, but also the entire system of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. Strike out of religion its supernatural element—emancipate the moral or universal principles of Christianity from their present subjection to dogmatic creeds,—and the final result will be the total decay of the Church as an institution. This danger is as clearly seen by the conservative clergy as by Strauss, when he says:—"A supernatural religion of mysteries and sacramental graces necessarily brings with it an order of priests elevated above the congregation. He who would banish priests from the Church must first banish miracles from religion." [New Life of Jesus, Vol. 1, p. xvi.] Bishop Whitehouse perceives that a blow struck at the doctrine of miraculous regeneration in baptism is really a blow struck at the whole Episcopal system; and, with the simple instinct of self-preservation, he expels the Eratosthratus who would madly fire his temple of Diana. The temple ought to burn. But I cannot blame the honest old priest who would drive away the incendiary from burning the "house of God;" and I have no sympathy for a man who, having solemnly vowed to obey a set of stringent church rules, publicly defies them, and claims sympathy as a martyr, when he refuses to be a martyr by paying the full price of the independence he covets, i. e., voluntary withdrawal from the Church, whose laws he can no longer obey.

That eminent and philosophical student of American institutions, De Tocqueville, has some interesting remarks on the clergy. He says that American clergymen, even those not in favor of religious freedom, are all in favor of civil freedom; and that they keep aloof from parties and public affairs. [Democracy in America, Vol. 1, p. 332; cf. 337.] This is true to a very large extent; but the drift of modern thought is so plainly in the direction of what the clergy are pleased to term "infidelity," that they are now beginning to agitate measures which, if adopted, will result in investing them with great political power. There is a movement existing already in certain quarters which I regard as the "cloud no bigger than a man's hand" that is destined to overspread our entire political horizon. I refer to the "National Reform" movement, as its adherents term it, for the incorporation of a Christian creed in the United States Constitution. Prof. I. R. W. Sloane, D. D., has an earnest plea for this "reform" in the very last number of the Independent; and I believe that the persistent agitation of the project will develop a very large and formidable party in its favor. This is an attempt to force clerical ideas upon the country which savors of the worst and most dangerous spirit of priestcraft; and it contains the germ of a most desperate, perhaps bloody, struggle. The loose talk about "priestcraft" which is fashionable in some quarters is not infrequently mere cant, which is none the better for being liberal cant; but this attempt to "put God into the Constitution" justifies it all. The day is surely coming when priestcraft, arousing the Christian sentiment of the country, will succeed in arraying it against that principle of the entire separation of Church and State which has been the great bulwark of spiritual liberty in America; and then once more must a great and terrible battle be fought in defence of freedom.

De Tocqueville also remarks:—"In France I had almost always seen the spirit of religion and the spirit of freedom pursuing courses diametrically opposed to each other; but in America I found that they were intimately united, and that they reigned in common over the same country. . . . The unbelievers of Europe attack the Christians as their political opponents, rather than as their religious adversaries; they hate the Christian religion as the opinion of a party, much more than as error of belief; and they reject the clergy less because they are the representatives of the Divinity, than because they are the allies of authority." [Ibid. pp. 337, 343.]

The difference between Europe and America here pointed out is a profound one; and it exists because throughout Europe, in England, Italy, Spain, Russia, Germany, as well as in France, Church and State are one; while in America they are separate. This difference has caused party contentions here to be chiefly confined to politics; but the insane bigots who are moving for the Christian Amendment to the Constitution little perceive that they are going to arouse here the same hostility to Christianity which exists throughout Europe among the liberal party,—an hostility at bottom of a political character. The clergy are thus moving swiftly to their own destruction; for I am not of those who believe they will eventually win the victory. Do they not see a terrible warning against identifying Christianity with political oppression, in the massacre of Archbishop Darboy and the sixty-two priests at Paris? Horrible as this massacre is, the real guilt of it lies at the door of those who have turned religion into a sword, a scourge, and a chain.

Christianity I criticise, sometime severely; but I do not hate it, because I see it is mingled of good and ill. Yet if the Christian name ever becomes here in America the banner of a party bent on trampling free thought and free speech under foot, it will arouse not only in my own, but in every freedom-loving heart, the same intense hatred which greeted the red "Stars and Bars." The clergy are loosening the avalanche which will sweep them into ruin. They are doing more for the atheism they deprecate than all the arguments of all the atheists between Eastport and San Francisco, just as Jefferson Davis did more for abolitionism than all the abolitionists. The same blunder is rightly urged by Buckle as a valid excuse for the mistake made by the French liberals after the death of Louis XIV:—"They had always been taught that the interests of the clergy were identical with the interests of religion; how, then, could they avoid including both clergy and religion in the same hostility? The alternative was cruel; but it was one from which, in common honesty, they had no escape." [Hist. of Civiliz., Vol. 1, p. 547.]

If our American Protestant clergy really suffer themselves, as now seems not unlikely, to be seduced into urging a practical union of Church and State, they will but pave the way for a mightier tyranny than theirs—they will but make themselves cat's paws for the Jesuits. To urge any such theory of government is to play directly into their hands. The Protestants can never maintain their feeble, neutral ground in any open conflict between Rome and Reason, or (as Dr. Hedge now varies his phrase) Ritualism and Rationalism. When Christianity and Free Religion once fairly come to an open collision in the arena of politics, the Protestants will be driven to divide themselves between the antagonists; and whether they wish it or not, they will be compelled to obey the laws of Ignatius de Loyola. No vague, general creed in the United States Constitution will suffice; it must be made specific. And once commit the American people as a whole to the fundamental idea of Rome, namely, that the Church must rule the State, how long will it be before the Jesuits seize control of the State's policy? Yet there will be a terrible contest before such laws as the following, copied from the Jesuit Constitutions, shall become supreme in this republican land:—

"No constitution, declaration, or any order of living, can involve an obligation to commit sin, mortal or venial, unless the Superior command it in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, or in virtue of holy obedience; which shall be done in those cases or persons wherein it shall be judged that it will conduce to the particular good of each or to the general advantage; and instead of the fear of offence, let the love and desire of all perfection succeed, that the greater glory and praise of Christ, our Creator and Lord, may follow." [Nicolini, History of the Jesuits, p. 34.]

It can be only after a conflict infinitely fiercer than that of North and South that the American people will be driven into any pathway which shall lead to any such moral and spiritual slavery as these words darkly intimate.

But the American clergy, despite their general good intentions, are entering on a road that leads, not only to the utter loss of freedom, but also to the fatal discouragement of knowledge. For instance, in aiming to control our schools and colleges, for the purpose of making these, too, more thoroughly Christian, the clergy are conspiring to crucify Science. That profound veneration for authority which makes our clergymen trust an approved text more than the clearest proofs of science, is well illustrated in a story which Richard A. Proctor tells in his recent invaluable work on "The Sun, Ruler of the Planetary System," p. 163:—"A long series of observations of Sun-spots was begun, and many hypotheses of more or less ingenuity were put forward to account for the phenomena which they present. For some time, indeed, the possibility of their existence was earnestly denied by the students of Aristotelian philosophy. It is impossible, they gravely urged, that the Eye of the Universe should suffer from ophthalmia; and it is related that, when Scheiner communicated his discovery of the solar spots to the Provincial of his order, the latter, who was an earnest Aristotelian, answered: 'I have read Aristotle's writings from beginning to end many times, and I can assure you that I have nowhere found in them anything similar to what you mention; go, therefore, my son; tranquilize yourself; be assured that what you take for spots in the Sun are the faults of your glasses or your eyes.'"

The same blind reliance on established authorities has been characteristic of the Christian clergy in all ages; and it remains so still. A few grand exceptions may be found, as Roger Bacon, Priestley, Baden Powell; but, as a class, clergymen have always set their faces against every new idea in science, and clamored to defend old superstitions. Instead of leading, they bring up the rear of each generation. Prof. Huxley accurately classifies the profession, when he says:—"The clergy are at present divisible into three sections; an immense body who are ignorant and speak out; a small proportion who know and are silent; and a minute proportion who know, and speak according to their knowledge." Here is an amusing example of the manner in which clergymen of the first class are accustomed to "speak out their ignorance" on matters of science, which I find in a Methodist paper published in Cleveland:—

"Mr. Darwin has at last come to a definite conclusion about the origin of mankind. Science no longer speaks with an uncertain tongue. She at last, after long preparation, has found her Adam, and brought him out to claim the federal headship of the human race. The issue is made. We may look on this picture and on that, and choose our ancestor by the instinct of 'natural selection.' The first Adam of the Scriptures, framed by the hand of God, suddenly springs into life from the quickening of His breath, and stands upon the obedient earth, its conscious lord, whose wealth of brain and heart could find no companionship with other creatures, but must be provided by another influx of God into matter. The first Adam of science is an ape of the lowest species; but behind him as his precursors, is a shadowy line of lower forms, at last taking to mud and water, and lost in the unintelligible meanness of their lower than reptilian forms. Now, between the two, our 'instinct of natural selection' takes decidedly to the man. We feel no affinity to the monkey nor the pollywog. When we see an ape, there is no natural turning of the fraternal heart to our ancient cousin of the ancestral stock. We do not believe that our great grandfather was any nearer to that beast in blood, love and affection than we are; we do not believe that Abraham was any nearer to a monkey than Darwin is. Inasmuch as the claims of the ape to be our first regular grand-parent are utterly without documentary or scientific evidence, and his pretensions rest entirely upon some not very intelligible notions about 'natural selections,' we say at once that we don't select him. We are satisfied with the Adam of Eden, the Adam of God, the Adam with the documents, the Adam attested by every instinct of our nature and every affinity of our life. Our religion is getting its last confirmation, by the contrast of the foolishness of the world in opposing it."

In every department of thought the clergy are behind the people, and exert no influence as a class except that which is opposed to the improvement of natural knowledge and the general progress of society. Yet on every occasion they are forward to express their views, and urge them on the community as if they were the Divinely appointed leaders of the race. This fact the people are fast discovering; and the result of the discovery is a sort of well-bred contempt for the opinions of clergymen on all questions but those of morals. The education imparted in theological seminaries is such as to keep the clergy stationary while the rest of the world are moving steadily onward; and fewer and fewer young men of ability are attracted into a profession which seems to doom them to perpetual ignorance. Every clergyman who manifests a real independence of thought and action comes to be soon distrusted and put under the ban by his brethren, and earlier or later is forced into a position of antagonism to his own order. There will always, I believe, be a public demand for men who shall devote their entire energies to the study of moral and religious questions, and who will always find a hearing from the best and most intelligent portion of the community; but they will be men who are independent of all clerical traditions, and not to be described, like "Dan Rice's" horse, as those who are blind, yet speak. On the contrary they must see much and well, and speak not out of a superabundant ignorance and inveterate blindness, but out of the depths of modern knowledge and profound insight into the real needs of their times. For such men there will always be a demand; and though the clergy, as a class of dogmatic instructors, are fated to pass away, there is no danger that genuine intelligence and true moral insight will ever cease to command the attention of the modern world.

NOTE.—Since the above lecture was read, my attention has been called to the following editorial article in the New York Sun, of June 30th. It is entitled "Clerical Electioneering," and illustrates in a striking manner the growing disposition of the Protestant clergy to effect their ends by political wire-pulling:—

"The following clerical electioneering letter is published in the journals of Iowa:

[Confidential.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25, 1871.

DEAR BROTHER: As a mutual friend I drop you a few earnest words in behalf of Senator Harlan's reelection to the United States Senate. You know the importance of early and earnest action. The members elected to the next Legislature elect the next Senator. It is therefore necessary that the right men be nominated, and hence attention must be given to the primary meetings.

I am glad to say to you that Senator Harlan is regular in his attendance on church, and his influence is in the right direction. I know personally that he stands high with the Administration, and has influence with the President, and is held in high esteem by his fellow-Senators. His speech on Santo Domingo has given him an elevation few Senators enjoy. Hoping that you will in all suitable ways interest yourself for Mr. Harlan, I am truly yours,

J. P. NEWMAN.

It appears that this letter was sent around to the different Methodist ministers in the State. It must have been published by some one among them who was not pleased with this mode of making political capital.

The Rev. Mr. Newman would have done well, while he was engaged in puffing Senator Harlan, if he had explained the ambiguous transactions in the Interior Department by which his friend is believed to have made a great deal of money. Until the charge of corruption can be removed from him, we fear that his chance with the Republicans of Iowa will be poor, notwithstanding his elevation on Santo Domingo, his influence with the President, and his regular attendance on church.

As the case now stands, Senator Harlan is emphatically the man who ought not to be elected."

The Swedenborgians are a sensible people notwithstanding their mysticism, as is shown by their recent effort to discontinue the use of "Rev." as a prefix to the names of their ministers. The resolution was voted down, but with a minority that will not be likely to allow it to remain in a recumbent posture a long time. Why should a minister have the sign of his trade attached to his name, unless members of other trades are marked in the same way? We are not quite prepared for Car. John Smith and Hd. Patrick Donahue, to indicate that one of those gentlemen is a carpenter and the other a hod-carrier. Let there be no unfair discrimination against ministers. It is bad enough to require them to wear black clothes, without compelling them to carry their trade-mark.—Golden Age.

ORDER AND PROGRESS.

The statesmen of France, having failed to reconcile their antagonisms by a scientific method, by means of which their Gordian knot of policy may be untied, resort to the sword, the "last reason of Kings," in the vain attempt to cut the knot which has baffled the ingenuity and exhausted the patience of all parties. The practical result of this failure is civil war between Order, represented by the Versailles assembly, and Progress, represented by the Parisian Committee of Nine. That the conclusion derived from this method of reasoning is "a conclusion by which nothing is concluded," is a lesson taught by our own sad experience, confirming the a priori sagacity of President Lincoln.

The law of Progress being as universal and as irresistible in regard to our social system as the law of gravitation in regard to our solar system, the necessity of understanding the law of Progress is as imperative upon the statesman, as the necessity of understanding the law of gravitation upon the astronomer. Our ignorance of the operation of this law is the primary cause of the revolutionary catastrophes in the midst of which we live, and are destined to live so long as our ignorance continues.

Conceived as stationary and invariable, the preliminary theory of Order was admirably sketched by Aristotle—just as in Biology there arose among the ancients purely statical speculations, without the slightest conception of dynamics. But social Progress was necessarily unknown to antiquity, because there was no sufficient historical manifestation of the continued movement of Humanity. In the middle ages, this movement became sufficiently pronounced to excite a nascent instinctive sense of our perfectibility, by the universal persuasion of the superiority of Catholicism over Polytheism and Judaism. Necessarily confused as was this primitive idea of human Progress, it already presented a high degree of energy and popularity, although opposed and checked by subsequent theological and metaphysical antagonisms. It is to this period that we must always recur, in order to comprehend the real origin of that progressive Order which distinguished the civilization of western Europe from Eastern stagnation.

But this initial sentiment, indispensable as it was, by no means sufficed to constitute the fundamental notion of human Progress, for there must be three terms to characterise any progression whatever, and at this period there were but two terms, antiquity and the middle age. The absolute nature of theological philosophy, which presided over this first comparison, prevented even the supposition of the existence of any new term; because it represented the feudal-catholic regime as endowed with definitive perfection, beyond which there existed nothing but the Christian Utopia of the life to come. When theological influence had so far declined as to emancipate the modern mind from its fetters, there followed a reaction for a long time unfavorable to the notion of Progress, causing a blind animosity against the middle ages. In their hatred of the ruling theological creed of that period, most thinkers were seized with an irrational admiration of antiquity, and went so far as entirely to misunderstand the social superiority of the middle ages, of which the illiterate masses alone retained a realizing sense, especially when preserved from Protestantism, as in France. The notion of Progress did not begin to occupy the modern mind, until it revived, with a new character, in the middle of the 17th century, owing to the elementary evolution then accomplished by the more civilized nations in the industrial arts, in the natural sciences, and even in the fine arts.

But although these partial views furnished the primary, direct source of the systematic notions of our day in regard to human Progress, they could by no means characterize the progression, which remained even more doubtful than in the middle age in a social aspect, more important than in the industrial or scientific aspect. To constitute this progression, the French Revolution, which impelled the normal centre of western civilization to the search for a total regeneration, was necessary in order to furnish a third essential term, type of the true modern regime, the comparison of which with the middle age would announce a general movement in advance, as clearly pronounced as that which inspired our chivalrous ancestors with the just sentiment of their own social superiority over their predecessors of antiquity, Jew or Gentile.

So long as the feudal-catholic regime was not openly annihilated, "from turret to foundation stone," its ruins served to conceal the political future, and stifle the sentiment of a continuous social progress. Prior to the explosion of 1789, the political evolution, furnishing the proper experimental basis of the theory of Progress, remained as incomplete as the human mind remained incompetent to appreciate it. The most eminent thinkers of a century ago could not conceive of a continued progression, and Humanity seemed to them condemned to a circular or oscillating movement. But, under the revolutionary impulse, the true instinct of human movement spontaneously originated, in a more or less decisive manner, in all minds, of whatever degree of intelligence, first in France and then throughout the Western nations. Hence we derive the conception of the law of Progress, upon which reposes Social Science. Without the theory of Progress, the theory of Order would remain insufficient as a basis of social existence, which requires a combination of Order and Progress, as inseparable concomitants. Inasmuch as Progress is nothing more than the development of Order, so Order is the germ of Progress.

In continuation of this exposition, let us now consider that the mental reaction caused by the grand revolution of 1789 could not begin, until the purely destructive element had become sufficiently exhausted to permit the light cast upon the future to be reflected upon the past. If, on the one hand, this energetic impulsion began to disclose, however vaguely, the third term of social Progress, it prevented, on the other, the just appreciation of the second. A blind hatred was aroused by modern emancipation against the middle age, without which, however, we should never have abandoned the old regime. The extinction of this middle term disturbed the total conception of the law of Progress no less than the absence of the last term, too remote from the first to admit of comparison. Hence it was impossible to construct the theory of human Progress until exact, even-handed justice was done to the middle age, by which ancient and modern society are at once separated and united. Now this just appreciation was incompatible with the unregulated fury of the revolutionary spirit in its first stages of excitement; and in this aspect the energetic philosophical reaction, organized at the beginning of the 19th century by the eminent De Maistre, has profoundly concurred in preparing the true theory of Progress, in spite of the manifest retrograde intention which animated this transitory school, whose essential results were incorporated in the philosophy which appropriated to itself whatever was valuable in De Maistre's appreciation of the history of the middle ages.

From these elements originated the true spirit of history, the general instinct of human continuity, before unknown. At this epoch the genius of Gall completed the outlines of systematic Biology, and soon after (1822) Sociology was added to the natural sciences, by Auguste Comte, the Prince of Philosophers, born of the first phase of the Revolution and destined to preside over the second.

A sound appreciation of history demonstrates that the demolition of the feudal-catholic social system, so far from being the result of the French Revolution, was the consequence of interior decomposition, at first spontaneous, afterward systematic, which had been gradually increasing throughout Christendom, and especially in France, from the fourteenth century. Instead of prolonging this negative movement of the five preceding centuries, the revolution terminated it by a decisive death-stroke at the outset, thus manifesting a resolution of entirely abandoning the system, in order to proceed directly to a total regeneration. This indispensable manifestation was especially apparent in the entire abolition of Royalty. With this exception of a negative or destructive character, which occupied only the first session of the principal revolutionary assembly, the movement had from the beginning an organic destination of a marked republican tendency. Yet it is clear that, in spite of this aim, the first part of the revolution was decidedly negative and disorganizing in its result. This failure was owing not only to the imperative exigencies of the struggle, equally difficult and glorious, by which France maintained its indispensable independence against the formidable attacks of a retrograde coalition of the combined forces of Europe, but more directly to the purely metaphysical character of the doctrine which guided exclusively the spirit of the crisis.

Notwithstanding the natural connection of the two progressions, negative and positive, or in other words destructive and organic, which had been maturing since the end of the middle age, the first or destructive was found to be more advanced than the second. Hence, the decay of the old regime produced the desire of entire renovation, before the elementary preparation of the new regime was sufficiently complete to manifest its real general nature. As we have just seen, the elaboration of the regulating doctrine, so far from having preceded the revolutionary explosion, had only become possible by means of the explosion. It is therefore easy to conceive the necessity which then existed of employing, as organic principles, the purely destructive and negative doctrine which had necessarily been adopted to guide the work of demolishing the old regime.

Although negative metaphysics became really aimless so soon as the old regime was openly abandoned, their dogmas were alone familiar, and contained the only formula adapted to the existing needs of social progress. Hence the initial movement necessarily adopted the inspiration of a doctrine of the past which could not satisfy the requirements of this new situation.

Necessarily impotent to organize or construct, such a philosophy possessed no other organic efficacy than vaguely to formulate the programme, sentimenta rather than rational, of the political future, without indicating the ways and means of preparation. Thus elevated into organic principles, metaphysical dogmas, from their absolute character, necessarily and immediately developed a tendency to radical anarchy, equally hostile to the elements of the nascent regime and to the ruins of the old feudal-catholic social system. Experience demonstrated the organic inaptitude of the guiding doctrine of the revolution and the urgency of total renovation, without indicating its nature.

In such political and philosophical situation, the necessity of Order, becoming preponderant, necessarily caused a long retrograde reaction, which, commenced by the legal Deism of Robespierre and developed by Buonaparte, continued a feeble existence during the reign of his miserable successors, leaving no durable result except the historical and dogmatic demonstration of the school of De Maistre upon the social inanity of modern metaphysics (of which Thiers and Guizot are the surviving types); whose moral and intellectual inanity appeared at the time, from the biological discoveries of Cabanis and Gall. This laborious opposition to the final emancipation of the human race from theological and metaphysical bondage, far from attaining its political object, ended only in reviving the progressive sentiment, by the invincible repugnance universally felt to a futile reconstruction of a regime so entirely decayed, that its nature and conditions were no longer understood even by those who advocated its restoration.

This inevitable revival of the revolutionary spirit appeared as soon as peace removed the stays of the old regime. But there was no longer any illusion as to the inanity of metaphysics or an organising agency. Its dogmas were adopted, for want of better, only as a means of counteracting retrograde principles, just as these latter principles had been adopted to counteract anarchical tendencies. In these new debates upon worn-out subjects, the public soon perceived that the germ of final solution was not to be found, and cared for nothing but the conditions of order and liberty, become no less indispensable to the philosopher than to material welfare.

The apparent indifference of a public who failed to see inscribed upon the banner of any party the true formula of the political future, was at last mistaken by stupidity for a tacit adhesion to its vain projects. As soon as the guarantees of Progress were found to be seriously threatened, the memorable uproar of 1830 finished forever the system of retrogradation introduced thirty-six years before by Napoleon. A citizen King replaced the legitimate branch of the Bourbons. The convictions which he inspired were so feeble that his partisans disavowed their own doctrine and adopted those of the revolution, which in their turn were disavowed by their advocates as soon as they obtained office under Louis Philippe. Their tergiversations are placed in a strong light in the debates relative to free instruction, alternately demanded and refused within twenty years in the name of the same pretended principles, which on both sides represented nothing but interests.

This decomposition of all former convictions permitted the free development of the popular instinct, which loudly called for the conciliation of Order with the spirit of Progress. But this final putting of the main question only rendered more apparent the total absence of any real solution by the ruling doctrine; a solution the principle of which was contained in the Positive philosophy alone, then in its infancy. The opinions of the active politicians were at the same time both anarchical and retrograde. The opinion which undertook to reconcile betrayed its organic weakness, by adopting as its only theory of solution the encouragement of both antagonisms, in order that they might, like the renowned cats of Kilkenny, neutralize each other, a method of solution which Thiers is repeating in our day and generation, after having failed to re-establish the dynasty of Louis Philippe as a constitutional monarchy, which is incompatible with French traditions, and offers only a poor imitation of a political anomaly peculiar to the aristocracy of England.

The reign of Louis Philippe was a natural halt in the march of Progress, during which the lack of a ruling doctrine prevented the beginning of the end of the revolution, notwithstanding the cessation of the retrograde reaction which followed the Reign of Terror. Sound philosophers had already adopted the sociological laws discovered by Auguste Comte in 1822, as the only key to the solution of the problem of Order and Progress; and the proletarians had instinctively rejected the idea of Royalty, as an obstacle to Progress without securing Order, the conciliation of which had now become the necessity of the day. At the same time the incapacity of the ruling doctrine to solve the problem became more and more apparent. The abolition of hereditary monarchy left Progress free from this dead weight, and at the same time deprived Order of its only regular guarantee. Thus doubly bound to reconstruct, all opinions remain fettered by the negative method of checking the opposition, without advancing. In a situation which guarantees Progress and compromises Order, the latter naturally inspires preponderant solicitude, having no systematic protection, and must remain retrograde so long as Progress remains anarchical. Hence we see Thiers in the retrograde camp of Versailles opposing the anarchists of Paris. Here we see, on the one hand, Order without Progress, and on the other, Progress without Order. Can Thiers reconcile these antagonisms? He is not a Catholic. He is not an anarchist. He is not a Positivist. He is a mere negative quantity. When construction becomes the order of the day, we at once find the profound inanity of all those schools whose function it is to protest for ever against Catholicism, while conceding its fundamental dogmas. Of these schools, Thiers is the representative, struggling against the logical, practical result of their own principles, which is anarchy. If they prevail over existing opposition, their inaptitude to direct the re-organization of France will demonstrate the final discredit of all anterior schools, and thus prepare the universal ascendancy of Positivism, which alone conforms with the real tendencies of the nineteenth century and its essential needs, and furnishes the only possible solution of the problem of conciliation between Order and Progress. Can Thiers restore what neither the church nor the Empire could preserve?

Reduced to its simplest terms, the problem in France and throughout Christendom is—Hildebrand or Comte? The juste milieu between these extremes has been occupied by Napoleon III since 1848, vainly attempting to reconcile Order and Progress by the sword and the prestige of his Uncle's name and fame, aided by the moral power of the Holy See. Compared with such forces, temporal and spiritual, which have failed to secure Order and Progress, which have resulted in mere anarchy in church and State, what are the forces of Thiers, the symbol of mere negative quantities? If they do not desert him, all experience shows that he will desert them so soon as the work of re-organization commences; and from the necessity of the case, from the very nature of things, Positivism will succeed to the vacant empire of the temporal and spiritual Cæsars of the past, not by Divine right, not by Conquest, but by a right and title derived from its inherent and exclusive power to reconcile Order and Progress.

R. B. M.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"As the oasis in Sahara or 'the shadow of a great rock in a dreary land,' so is the presence of a good whole-souled Liberal in the barren South. It was worth while to come all the way here to see the avidity with which they receive the documents, especially the specimen copies of THE INDEX. Mr. — did not give me time to say a dozen words for it, before he pulled out the money to pay for a year's subscription, and says, if he likes it as he expects to, he shall order more copies for his friends. He says the prejudice and superstition here is more bitter and deeply shaded than at the North. He trembles for his children, and grows sick at heart, when he thinks of the pressure which is brought to bear on his family to push them into the orthodox sheep-fold (calf-pen?), and he too busy or too powerless to save them. He never heard of THE INDEX or any Radical publication—thinks you must go to New York with THE INDEX, and then advertise largely. He has had some Spiritualist and conservative Unitarian papers, but all are lacking either in clearness or boldness of vision. Radicals here are of the first and foremost men in the place; but they are too few and too retiring and modest in their ways to make any great show. One here is too poor to take THE INDEX, so his friends say, but is fully capable of appreciating it, as is also his wife, who is spoken of as a most estimable and very intelligent lady. I believe you have a fund to supply such cases; and if it has run low, you may put down ten dollars on it for me, and send the paper one year to —."

—"The religious amendment question is now again being discussed. As Governor Geary, of this state, has gone over to that party, it is the most significant act yet committed; for Geary is a demagogue, and he must be, or I must be, hallucinated in supposing it will be a politic step. I fear that, if we remodel our state constitution as is contemplated, an effort will be made to mediævalize it by putting these dogmas in and holding an election to confirm them before we can get the matter discussed."

—"Having been a constant reader of your excellent paper during my presence at Toledo, I feel somewhat lonesome without it. There is much praying here, but free thought and sound principles, such as THE INDEX contains, are very scarce."

—"Enclosed I have the pleasure of handing you my subscription to THE INDEX for the current year. You are fast making THE INDEX indispensable to independent thinkers in this country—I feel proud of it."

—"I am much pleased with your lecture on Pillars of Salt. Advancement or petrification is inevitable; none can escape the one or the other."

—"The false and hypocritical views of wealth which characterize Christianity have hindered the progress of civilization in many ways."

—"Put me down for THE INDEX bound and complete for the year. This will enable me to give away as I read."

—"This 'scrip' is almost as much dilapidated as some of the 'Christian' creeds. It needs patching."

LOCAL NOTICES.

PUBLIC MEETING IN GERMAN HALL.—By invitation of the Liberal Alliance of Toledo, Mr. Abbot will give a public address in GERMAN HALL, St. Clair Street, at 8 o'clock, Sunday evening, July 16. Subject—"The Demand for Larger Liberty in America." All persons interested are invited to attend.

RECEIVED.

FORTY-SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION; with the Annual Report of the Executive Committee, and the Treasurer's Statement for the year ending April 29, 1871. BOSTON: AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION. 1871. pp. 67.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. July, 1871. Rev. JOHN H. MORISON, D. D., Editor. BOSTON: LEONARD C. BOWLES, Proprietor, No. 8 Beacon Street. $5.00 a year.

THE SCHOOL LABORATORY OF PHYSICAL SCIENCE, Edited by Prof. GUSTAVUS HINRICHS. Published Quarterly, by the Editor. IOWA CITY, IOWA; GRIGGS, WATSON & DAY, Printers, Davenport. 1871. $1.00 a year.

Poetry,

THE POET'S STEP.

[For THE INDEX.]

One passed me in a dim church-aisle,
With step so light and free,
The winds that lift the forest leaves
Seemed blowing by to me.

"In wanderings on a lonely shore,
The poet's step hath caught
The rhythm of the wild sea-waves
And rustling leaves"—I thought.

"For him no freighted argosies
Bring treasure from far shores,
No happy diver gathers pearls
On sunless ocean-floors.

"He sends his sprites, like sea-birds, forth
To swim and dive and fly,
Exploring now unsounded deeps,
Now soaring far and high.

"Pearls of celestial hope they bring
From caverns of despair,
Clear, starry thoughts from heights serene,
And sparkling fancies rare.

"Long wandering on thought's lonely shore,
His motion may have caught
The rhythm of the wave that breaks
Upon his soul"—I thought.

Brave tidings doth this poet bring,
His step is wild and free,
And when he passes, winds of spring
Seem blowing by to me.

Feb. 26, 1871. M. R. W.

The Index.

JULY 15, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed; and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten	" 1,000
ASA K. BUTTS,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	" 1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	" 1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	" 1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	" 300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	" 300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	" 300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	" 300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	" 500
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	" 3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	" 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	One	" 100
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	"	" 100
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	" 100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	" 100
J. SEIGEBERER,	Painesville,	O.,	"	" 100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	" 300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	" 500
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	" 100
J. L. WHITING,	Boston,	"	"	" 100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	" 100
J. B. SUTTON,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	" 100
S. I. DURKEE,	"	"	"	" 100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	" 100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	" 1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	" 200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	" 200

$28,630

CHRISTIANITY AND POLITICS.

Two years ago, when the fourth of July occurred on Sunday, the Germans throughout the country celebrated the day, notwithstanding the superstitious protests of the Sabbatarians. In Toledo, Hon. William Kraus, then Mayor of the city, participated (not officially, but as a private citizen) in the celebration, which was conducted with propriety, decorum, and an evident desire to avoid giving unnecessary offence to the rest of the community. A sermon was preached shortly after by an evangelical clergyman of the place, severely condemning the celebration as a violation of the Sabbath, and calling upon all good Christians to vote only for city officers who would enforce the "observance of the Sabbath." To this sermon we replied publicly at the time; and in THE INDEX Nos. 27 and 28 both the sermon and the reply were published.

The appeal thus made to the community by the evangelical party was remembered and acted upon at the late city election. Mayor Kraus, who was one of the most earnest and patriotic supporters of the government during the great rebellion, and a man universally respected, was re-nominated by the Republican party as their candidate. But the Young Men's Christian Association strained every nerve to defeat his re-election, avowedly because he participated in the Sunday celebration of the fourth of July; and they split the Republican ticket, thereby securing the election of a Democrat who sympathized with the enemies of the republic during its struggle for existence. In other words, the earnestly evangelical portion of the Republican party in the city "bolted," rather than see a man re-elected to the mayoralty who would not compel the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath.

As might be expected, the liberals of the city did not quietly acquiesce in this attempt to enforce Christian Sabbatarianism by political action; and the first effect of the reaction was seen in the late school election, already noticed in these columns. But its force is not yet spent. Liberal citizens, chiefly Germans, on Sunday evening, June 25, formed a new organization under the name of the "Liberal Alliance of Toledo," the object of which, as announced in the Woechentliche Express, is "the preservation and advancement of social, civil, and religious freedom," and, to this end, the dissemination and carrying-out in practice of the following principles:—

1. The right of every individual to the enjoyment of the largest freedom that is consistent with the equal right of every other individual.

2. The absolute separation of Church and State.

3. Free and universal education, to be established and enforced by the State.

The Liberal Alliance thus formed contemplates not merely the abstract discussion and advocacy of these principles, but also the practical application of them in municipal and political affairs. It is a union for action rather than speculation; and that it is needed is sufficiently shown by the facts we have above stated. We unqualifiedly approve the objects of the Alliance, and rejoice that there is now a prospect of combined opposition to the schemes of the bigots whose encroachments on religious liberty have called it into existence. The movement will spread. We have spoken of it thus at length because it is by no means a merely local matter, but because there is an increasing need of such action all over the country. The illegal use of the Bible in the public schools, the enactment and attempted enforcement of Sunday laws, the various endeavors to commit the government to evangelical Christianity by a Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution, and so forth, are simple outrages and infringements of the religious equality of the citizens; and the growing aggressiveness of the evangelical element of the population should be checked vigorously and at once.

We are as earnest as any one for the full and absolute protection of the orthodox portion of the community in the enjoyment of their opinions and forms of worship, and should sanction no kind of invasion of their religious rights. But we see that they are not content with this. They want power. They want to mould our republican institutions more and more into a Christian form. They want to eke out the deficiency of their arguments by social and political compulsion. The Young Men's Christian Associations, whether formed or not for this purpose, are an admirably adapted instrumentality for carrying out these objects; nor is there any scruple at all in using them as such. Some equally efficient instrumentality is needed in behalf of liberal ideas. Radical Clubs we have repeatedly advocated as furnishing such an instrumentality; and this Liberal Alliance substantially embodies the same objects, aims, and principles. Sorry as we are to see these religious questions creeping into politics (for we know how much bitterness of feeling they must necessarily engender), we nevertheless perceive that, though unsuspected by the unthinking multitude, religious liberty in America is in real peril, and must be defended at any and every cost. Chattel-slavery is abolished by the arbitrament of battle. But soul-slavery is not abolished; and it may yet necessitate the same terrible appeal. The only way to prevent such a frightful outcome of the reviving bigotry of the Church, is to suffocate the snake in its hole. Christianity and Free Religion are at war in their fundamental ideas. The wise lover of peace will say—"Fight out this battle now in the world of ideas, before the suppressed conflict shall flame out into open war."

These are no words of excitement or wild enthusiasm. The future will show that they are words of soberness and truth.

Samuel J. May, the noblest man in the American pulpit, is dead. A long life of devotion to goodness, truth, and the highest welfare of man closes amidst the blessings and tears of multitudes who revered and loved him. Never was there a truer friend to freedom of conscience, freedom of thought, freedom of all that is good in human nature. Identified from the start with the Anti-Slavery Society, and brave as a lion against the terrible slave-power that repeatedly mobbed him, and even as late as 1861 burned him in effigy, he has fought a good fight, and gone to his rest full of years and honors. He has built his own monument. Peace to his ashes!

A bigoted "evangelical" is only true to his own principles. But a bigoted "liberal" is without excuse.

WHAT WE NEED.

The reception of speakers at the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association indicated to some extent the kind of welcome the Association is likely to receive from the general public, and suggested some thoughts in regard to its modes of action. The audiences, and very large and intelligent audiences they were, looked thoughtful and interested. They listened more than patiently and kindly, and showed their approval of the most radical words by applause. The people seemed wholly in sympathy with the thoughts and aims of the Association. I do not remember a single expression of disapproval in all the three sessions, and the tokens of assent were frequent and spontaneous. The substantial agreement of the speakers and the general harmony of sentiment on the platform allowed no opportunity for conflicting demonstrations from the benches, but the differing degrees of applause bestowed on different modes of presentation told which of the shots hit the mark most squarely.

Mr. Weiss' deep and fine essay, a valuable contribution to religious philosophy, was keenly enjoyed by as many as were capable of appreciating it, and fascinated by its glittering spell members who were not capable of following its intricate processes of thought. Mr. Potter's admirably clear summary of the points that illustrated the origin and growth of Christianity met the favor its merit deserved. It gave solid satisfaction to those who did not know how to account on natural grounds for what has always been represented as the astonishing, marvellous, and truly miraculous triumphs of the religion. The President's essay on Superstition was well received. Even the sharp criticism on Spiritualism it contained provoked no noise of dissent from the audience, if it elicited no response of praise. The speakers at all the meetings were made welcome; several of them were made heartily welcome. Mr. Higginson had an eager hearing. Dr. Bartol touched many sympathetic chords. Lucretia Mott's gentle radicalism drew to her the hearts of the assembly. Mr. Powell's stout application of the Society's principles to practical questions of reform was greeted with joy. The managers all felt that their movement was timely and popular, that it met a deep and wide desire, touched the living mind of the community in more than one sensitive part, and carried with it earnest wishes and sanguine anticipations of success.

But one speaker was hailed with an enthusiasm, followed with an intensity of excitement, and cheered as he sat down with an uproar of applause, which showed that his words had reached a spot the others had come short of finding. It was Professor Denton. The warmth of his reception may have been due to the fact that he was a Spiritualist, and that the hall contained multitudes of Spiritualists. But that fact would not alone be sufficient to explain the demonstration. It was due rather, we think, to the plain, rugged determination with which he dashes his sentences into the people's faces. He was no bolder than the others who had preceded him. He said nothing new, nothing that had not been said, and said perhaps better, by other speakers on the same theme. His language was violent; his manner harsh and to many disagreeable; his arguments were mostly assertions; his reckless vehemence had scarcely a tone of moral or spiritual expression. Indeed there was little to recommend the speech to discriminating, thoughtful, reverent, or finely tempered minds; but it went through the audience like flame. It called down volley after volley of applause. It seemed as if the people would never cease clapping. While others touched nerve and brain, this man stirred the blood. He spoke to the multitude as they like to be spoken to, and the people answered. There were many who did not like it, but there were more who did. The best-cultured people did not like it; but people of culture do not compose all whom the Association wishes to reach, and, though it aims to affect the finest people by its spiritual dignity and its intellectual force, it must not neglect the ruder folks who need what it has to give and who can give it what it much needs, the support of the popular heart.

Ours is above all a popular movement. It addresses itself to the multitude. They whom superstition most crushes, whom dogmatism most outrages, whose mental and moral personality suffers the most deadly wrong at the hands of ecclesiastics and sectarians, are not the intellectual and cultured, the emancipated and self-reliant; they are the untaught, the ignorant, the groping, the struggling, the unfavored by position, the unprivileged in society, the unemancipated from ignorance and prejudice; the mechanics, traders, artisans, working men and working women, shop-keepers, manufacturers, small merchants and craftsmen, who need every scrap of mind, feeling, will, independent purpose and spirit they can command. They are the sufferers from the terrors that superstition engenders and from the stupor that dogmatism begets. They are the priest's prey, and the sectarian's victims; their money is taken for foreign missions, their thoughts are entangled in creeds, the movements of their moral nature are cramped by church usages, their outlook is closed, their development is arrested. The word of deliverance is especially for these. The Free Religious Association can take to itself the opening words in the ministry of Jesus: "He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised."

Now this work requires suitable instruments. It cannot be wholly done by fine essays written for cultivated minds, nor by elegantly composed addresses read or spoken to calm and nicely discriminating assemblies. These are excellent in their way, and needful, because questions are brought up that require delicate handling. But the intellectual treatment which scientific, literary, and philosophical circles demand, worse than fails of effect when the multitude is to be reached. We need then plainer, homelier statements, strong affirmations, results unweakened by a tedious showing of the processes by which they are arrived at, applications undiluted by apologies, reasonings and explanations. We need an immediate, heartfelt approach to the suffering, earnest men and women of the working class,—no rudeness, coarseness, or grossness of exaggeration, no harshness or intemperance of speech, but that manly, ingenuous truthfulness which brings the matter home to simple souls. We need no indiscriminate zeal, no fanaticism, especially no anger or vituperation; but something quite different from all these is the glowing enthusiasm that charges thought with feeling, and makes conviction flow in lava tides. We need a St. Paul, a Luther, a Garrison, a Parker, for our work. When he appears (and if our work be the grand one we think it is, he will appear in good time), the word will run very swiftly; we shall win hearts as well as understandings; we shall have the people with us—not the thinkers only, but the feelers and doers also.

O. B. F.

INSPIRATION AS A HUMAN GIFT.

It is said that man is created in the image of God; and the true meaning of it is this,—that every divine attribute which can be revealed to us must appear in some manner in the constitution and functions of human nature. Whence it is certain that we may expect to find many divine acts, which in themselves, and to the reason, involve much difficulty or even impossibility of conception, rendered more clear by analogous activity in our own experience.

In illustration, I will say a word of inspiration,—a divine energy which it appears often most difficult to reconcile with law and order in Nature, with the liberty of human volition, and with the facts of an experience including evil as obviously as good. Without pretending to discuss these matters, I wish only to express the analogy, or even identity, between the inspiration of God and the effects of a noble and exalted human character. The best and most powerful way in which we can influence and elevate character in others is, not by any positive instruction or direct example, but by the simple force and peculiar atmosphere inherent in noble character in ourselves.

We cannot be good, true, upright, pure-minded, without shedding all about us, wherever we go, an influence, a light, that is truly divine. By this we do not phrase instruction and exhortation; we live instruction, we are exhortation. We not only teach, but quicken, strengthen, and uphold. The old German mystic (Tauler) quotes a heathen teacher as saying—"I never mingled with men, but I came home less of a man than I went out;"—which may be interpreted to mean, that from men we draw the strength of divinity. When faith droops and fails and things seem cheerless and hard, then how we are refreshed, strengthened and furnished with hope and faith anew, by some high and strong and noble character into whose presence we come! It becomes at once "a mount of vision" to us, whence the world appears as a lovely picture, and the sun which seemed sinking is brought again into view from the height, and the light is joy while it lasts, and the darkness, as it comes on, is swallowed up in order. This is the privilege of the life divine,—the privilege of inspiration. It cannot be hid. It shines as the day shines. It is elder, uncreated light, which shone forth from God before he said—"Let there be light," and which shines evermore in every sweet and chastened spirit that walks upon the earth.

J. V. B.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

A writer in the Boston Commonwealth—by the way, the best weekly newspaper I know—criticises the recent Free Religious Convention in Boston, and the movement generally, as failing to meet the emotional and spiritual elements in human nature. I meet large numbers who hold similar views. Some are Spiritualists, but not all. You may remember I have more than once suggested the same as one probable reason why the masses neither attend the Conventions nor other meetings, nor subscribe for the journals of the Association.

Probably in scholarship, and in power for appeal to the intellect, the leaders of the Free Religious movement are second to no men of equal number in the country. But intellectual bread alone will not save the world—will not even save those who bake, break, and dispense it.

Apostolic authority makes the "god of this world" a devil, or the devil. The whole Bible represents and presents the one God as male, masculine—he, but never female, never she, nor her. It was a happy thought, a divine inspiration—was it not?—when the Roman Catholic Church enthroned the virgin Mary as a female hemisphere in the Infinite Existence. Something akin to this, idolatrous though it may be called, is needed in the Free Religious movement, as seems to me, to make it even comprehensible, as well as acceptable, to the multitudes in our busy, hard-worked, care-worn world. Who that ever heard Theodore Parker begin his morning orison with "Our Father and our Mother," did not feel that even the Lord's Prayer "came mended from his tongue?"

Last Sunday I was permitted to stand in the place made memorable and forever sacred by the ministrations of Mr. Parker. But "the Twenty-Eighth Congregational Society of Boston" is not what it was—may never be again. The reason is, not that it has declined or decreased; but that it is no longer of Boston. "Its line has gone out into all the earth and its light unto the end of the world." But not its warmth—not its heat, its heart, its soul, its spirit. I do not believe that such a furnace of humanity, of generous, ever-glowing sympathy towards the suffering of the human race, was ever kindled under heaven, as burned on the altar of that Society while Mr. Parker was its ministering High Priest. His sermons on War; Intemperance; the Perishing Classes; the Dangerous Classes; on Capital Punishment; on Woman, her Needs, Rights and Responsibilities; as well as his constant and all-powerful appeals on Slavery, then in the plenitude of its power,—all these and many more stand forth and will stand in all history, in all time, as his ever-living memorial, the everlasting witness and monument to the intensely practical, vital, spiritual character of the religion he taught.

P. P.

"By oneself the evil is done, by oneself one suffers; by oneself evil is left undone, by oneself one is purified. Purity and impurity belong to oneself; no one can purify another." Such is the teaching of Buddha, in the "Path of Virtue," verse 165. How far superior it is to the doctrine of "vicarious atonement," preached in Christian churches!

"UNIVERSOLOGY."

One of the most curious books ever published is the "Primary Synopsis of Universology and Alwato," by Stephen Pearl Andrews. The strangeness and uncouthness and pedantry of the style, the intolerable and needless profusion of neologisms, the extravagant use of italics and the more than Germanic redundancy of capitals, make his pages bristle with difficulties even to the most patient and enthusiastic believer in his astounding claims; while the ordinary reader will be apt either to fling the book aside in despair or disgust or else to burst into the "inextinguishable laughter of the gods." Nothing would be easier than to ridicule it; few things would be harder than thoroughly to understand it. In fact, we have neither time nor inclination to take pains necessary to become complete master of its contents. But we have read the first half of it with considerable care, and, we must add, with very real respect tempered by amusement.

There can no question that Mr. Andrews has speculative ability, and a great deal of it. We have been struck with the sweep of his thought in certain directions, though not in all. He is certainly original, combining ideas of great value with a certain whimsical mysticism that will do much to prevent their examination by the best thinkers. The leading conception of his work is the reduction of all the sciences to one supreme science (which he designates by the barbarous hybrid term "Universology"), not by any sort of artificial dove-tailing, but by evolution from "three fundamental principles." It is evident that he is at work on the same general problem that has engaged the entire energy of such thinkers as Comte and Spencer. In some respects he sees farther than either of them, though on the whole equal to neither. His speculations remind us here and there of Pythagoras and A. J. Davis, Plato and Fourier, Boehme and Swedenborg and Hegel, in very odd fashion. That the elementary sounds of human speech naturally signify the elementary conceptions of this universal science, and that a new scientific language (Alwato) can be thus evolved as an illustrative model of the universe, is a main part of his theory; but the truth of this notion depends on the truth of "Universology" as a perfect cosmical philosophy, of which we are very far from being convinced. But after all deductions are made, we regard Mr. Andrews' volume as a remarkable work, well worthy the attention of speculative thinkers. Published by Dion Thomas, 141 Fulton St., New York. Price $1.50.

King William was crowned on the 16th of October, 1861. In an address delivered on the 15th he said:—"The rulers of Prussia receive their crown from God. To-morrow, therefore, I shall take the crown from the Lord's table, and place it on my head. This is the meaning of the expression 'King by the grace of God,' and therein lies the sanctity of the crown, which is inviolable." At the appointed time the King placed the golden round of sovereignty on his head with the remark:—"I wear the crown by the favor of God, and nobody else."

With the same belief concerning the source of his own royalty, Jesus claimed the Messianic crown. It never entered his head that he was to be a democratic ruler, a Christ by popular election. King William's theory of kingship is the Christian theory; and in this fact a thoughtful mind will see the reason why the civil absolutism of monarchy and the spiritual absolutism of Christ-ianity have been so strikingly united in history. When the Protestant spirit entered the Christian church, modern democracy was born; and when it gets its growth, Christianity and monarchy will pass away together. Neither in civil nor in spiritual matters will mankind forever endure "kings by the grace of God."

On June 26, the Toledo Board of Education voted that "hereafter the colored children of this city shall be entitled to attend any of the public schools for which they may be qualified, in the ward in which they reside." The vote stood as follows: Yeas—Messrs. Braun, Cone, McMaken, Rogers—4; Nays—Messrs. Hill, Howell, Malone—3. The Daily Commercial says: "Not the least satisfactory feature of the case is the fact that the present action is directly due, we will not say to any change in, but rather to the expression of, the popular sentiment at the late school election." We heartily rejoice that the infamous discriminations of color are finally wiped out from our school regulations, and that this bitter injustice to the colored children will no longer disgrace Toledo.

Dr. Holmes gives a sentence from old Thomas Shephard which he says was quoted (with apparent approbation) by a Massachusetts divine in 1749 in a sermon:—"The paths to Hell be but two; the first is the Path of Sin, which is a dirty Way; secondly, the Path of Duties, which (rested in) is but a cleaner Way." Moral—take the path of "faith," and go to heaven. This orthodoxy is honest beyond a suspicion; but who can tell where to find orthodoxy nowadays, when it dodges out of sight behind false semblances of rationalism? We like the devil best when his hoofs are visible.

Prof. Roscoe states in his noble work on "Spectrum Analysis" that within seven years, by means of this new and valuable process of investigation, four new chemical elements were discovered. This was said in 1869, the date of the publication of his volume. The discovery of a fact is glorious; but what shall we call the discovery of a method? Apply to philosophy and religion the modern scientific method, and who can paint with too brilliant colors the results that may fairly be expected? One might well covet immortality, if only to rejoice in the sure triumphs of science in the future.

The Banner of Light says:—"Warren Richardson sends us a few cheering words from Denver, Col., and four subscribers." Mr. Richardson's postage expenses must have been heavy, if all four subscribers were properly stamped.

Among the numerous tales of Alexander the Great, recorded in the Talmud, there is one (Tamid 32 a.) of particular charm. Alexander, on his eastward march, came to a city inhabited by women exclusively. Preparing to attack the city, he was met by a deputation of women who argued thus: "If you kill us, it will be said he killed women; if we kill thee, it will be said the king was killed by women." Alexander desisted and asked bread of them. The women brought him a lump of gold in the shape of a loaf of bread placed upon a golden table. "Who will eat golden bread?" Alexander exclaimed. "If thou only wished for ordinary bread, thou might have found plenty of it in thy own country," the women argued; "since thou hast gone away so far from thy home, we thought thou must have golden bread to satisfy thy appetite." Alexander wrote on the gate of the city—"I, Alexander the Macedonian, was foolish until the women of this city gave me intelligent advice."—Golden Age.

All imperfection is unfitness to the conditions of existence.—Herbert Spencer.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE BIBLE NOT FOR CHILDREN.

Dr. Edward Beecher (more orthodox than his brother Henry Ward, as orthodox in fact as the average of Congregational preachers) says, in the Independent of June 22;—"The Bible was made for adults." There is in it no preaching to children. This is true even of Christ. . . . And what is true of the Bible is true of the theology of all past ages, and of the preaching too. They have been made for adults." The italics are not his. Indeed, had the good Dr., who has a logical and honest mind, paused, weighed his words, considered the drift of his logic, he would have been astounded, not merely discouraged, at the instruction given in Sunday Schools. Since the Bible and all the old theology are for adults and not for children, why should Sunday Schools give them almost nothing besides? And why insist on the Bible in the Public Schools contrary to the conscience and preference of so many, contrary to the United States Constitution, which forbids the "establishment of religion," and secures "the free exercise thereof?" It should be added that there are in the Bible indelicacies, immodesties, which unfit it for general use even among adults. Old books are not always decorous. If "Family" and "Household" editions of Shakespeare are called for, much more family editions of the Bible.

J. T. D.

RATIONALISM BEWITCHED.

BROOKFIELD, MASS., May 18, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT,—

Permit me to say that I think that, from a careful survey of all the facts of history, one would conclude that the presumption was in favor of the naturalness of the appetite satisfied by Christianity, although, owing to circumstances, it is one not universally expressed.

Of course you do not fail to see that my point is that, if a man has power to crush his own manhood and character in this life, he has the same power in the next; and that, if he goes out of life with his character crushed and blighted, the presumption is in favor of going down into ETERNITY with it so, on the principle that whatsoever a man sows, that shall he also reap. Nature, as well as Revelation, with every rolling year thunders this impressive lesson into the ears of thoughtless, careless men. Instead of spending so much of their breath in assuring men that they have not so very much to fear from their sins as they have been led to suppose, I should say that it would be well for Rationalists once in a while, at least, to admonish wicked men of the consequences of their actions, not merely in the present life, but, if character entails itself, in the future. "Beware of your harvest!"

You make me out a Rationalist. I am one. I believe Christianity harmonizes perfectly with Reason, as well as responds to all human need. The Bible originates no new truth. It simply recognises, interprets, announces for our convenience truth already in existence, and impressed (though divinely) upon the constitution of the human soul. You will see by my article in the Ladies' Repository, sent you and noticed in your last, how little sympathy I have with abstract, artificial theology. My ground is—Freedom of Conscience, guided by the Light of Revelation, Nature, Experience, History, &c. I claim to be as cordially loyal to TRUTH as you; but this leads me to Christ, who is the Truth. According to your fundamental definition of Free Religion—faithfulness to convictions and devotion to Truth for its own sake—I am a Free Religionist. But my Free Religion, as that of Dr. Bellows, Hepworth, and others, leads me to Christ, who, to us, is found to be the Way, the Truth, and the Life. This being the case, you should honor us sufficiently either not to regret our attitude (as you seemed to Dr. Bellows's), or to ridicule our notions and caricature our beliefs as you are sometimes tempted to do.

In the meantime, let me assure you that this rationalizing tendency among us, having for its object the setting our doctrines so as to harmonize with Reason and Nature, is not by any means to be interpreted as a decay of our doctrines themselves. It is a mere change of dress to suit the season, a shifting custom or an advanced position. There is nothing radical, fundamental, in these changes. We are still rooted to the Rock, CHRIST. I thank you for the publication of my article, and your kind, courteous rejoinder. THE INDEX occupies nearly as much of my time in reading as all my Methodist papers put together.

Yours truly,

R. H. HOWARD.

[The above is in reply to our comments on a communication published in THE INDEX No. 73. It will be seen that Mr. Howard distinctly avows himself a Rationalist, believing that Rationalism leads him to "Christ." But he seems to evade stating distinctly whether he does or does not believe in a hell from which there is no escape forever. The analogy he institutes between this life and the next would necessarily imply that "probation" does not end with this life, but continues eternally, and that the "sinner" can evacuate hell whenever he chooses to reform. If this is what Mr. Howard intends (and it is the logical consequence of what he says), then he is very far from being a Methodist in "good and regular standing." Zion's Herald, of the same date as the above letter, quotes approvingly, among other "excellent gleanings" from the life of Rev. John Leland, the following illustration of the true Methodist doctrine of hell, which stands in marked contrast with the milk-and-water hell hinted at by Mr. Howard:—

"On the clause of the text, 'And shall cast them into a furnace of fire,' etc.' he used an illustration that was fit to curdle young blood in the veins. He raised the question: Will not angels and redeemed men, as they see and know the misery of the lost, expressed as 'wailing and gnashing of teeth,' intercede that it may be ended? Well, when you make up a large fire upon the hearth, putting on a stick of the decayed wood full of the worms that are working there, and when the fire gets hold of it, and the worms begin to feel the heat, and you hear them sing-g-g, who will say, 'take the stick from the fire?'"

With this cheerful idea of hell, the following extract from an editorial article in the same issue of the same paper becomes a pointed rebuke to our "rationalistic" correspondent for trying to "take the stick from the fire."—

"Rev. Mr. Hale 'pitched into' individualism; said 'it had gone to seed; organization was everything; the true individual was mankind. A man who was agonizing about his own personal salvation from something terrible hereafter, was only fit for the devil; the true salvation was to feel such sympathy for mankind as to be willing to be damned, if only other men could be saved by the sacrifice,' which last is a curious coming up of Hopkinsianism into the mouth of a modern anti-orthodox New Englander. The error here is in ignoring individualism altogether. Methodism, or Christianity, has won only by that very 'agonizing about a personal salvation from something terrible hereafter.' It is personal and individual, always; these persons thus delivered from the devil work together."

The fact is that Mr. Howard is fast sinking in the fatal quagmire of Rationalism, and has now got about half-way in. Zion's Herald ought to be terribly agitated over his danger; and we expect soon to hear it cackling in great distress, like a hen which has hatched out by mistake a duckling that takes forthwith to the water. We offer our sympathy in advance to the Herald. But to Mr. Howard's attention we commend what Fraser's Magazine says about such equivocal "Rationalism" as his, in the appended pregnant paragraph:—

"There is an intellectual process resembling that which replaces organic bodies buried in the earth by a slow infiltration of mineral substances, so that what was a fish becomes a lump of flint, though its external form is accurately preserved. The old Orthodox phraseology may survive when every word has so changed its contents that the dogma once composed of sound Christian faith turns out to be nothing but Rationalism Bewitched."

A PLEA FOR LOVE.

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., June 8, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:—As a general rule, your views and mine on the subjects you treat I find to be alike. Sometimes I see things in a different light. In your essay on "Love and Justice," you have not taken my view of love, and hardly of the relation existing between the two. It is true, love by itself is blind; but this is equally true of justice. Both are represented as blind. Love, to accomplish its ends, must be enlightened; so must justice.

To make the perfect man, each individual faculty must be under the harmonious control of all. What horrid iniquities have been perpetrated by unenlightened justice—more shocking than ever love was guilty of! I need not specify—your recollection will supply plenty of cases. You say, "love is a sentiment between individual persons." This is true; but it is also a great chain uniting the universe in one harmonious whole.

You quote the following words of Jesus as teaching the propriety of concentrating all love upon himself:—"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." To me this sentence teaches the very opposite of what you suppose. I regard it as if Jesus had said to his disciples:—"I don't ask of you service rendered to me as a person; but give your charities wherever you find humanity suffering—then you will be living out my teachings, and it will be a pleasure to me." Jesus certainly taught that Truth should have the condensed love of mankind. Jesus in effect says:—"I have exposed your errors, and taught you truths, and for this you would crucify me." Truth is universal, connecting itself with every object and law of nature. The great command of Jesus is to "obey truth in the love of it." This done, the world becomes one universal harmony. In my mind there is a wide distinction between the teachings of Jesus and those of any man whatever who pretended to follow him; but in many instances his apostles gave very good advice. Even the admonition of Paul to the servant to "obey his master," is coupled with an admonition to the master which, if carried out, would dissolve the bands of slavery as the summer's sun would the winter's snow. It is this:—"Masters, render unto your servants that which is just and equal;" this done, what more could you ask? You look upon love as partial and having small range. I regard love as universal, connecting itself with nature and all of her laws. Mercy, truth, and justice are of but little account to man unless he has a love for them. Jesus and other teachers, when they have so highly extolled love, have not confined their ideas of it to its operation between the sexes, or between man and man; and a criticism founded on such limit would do them great injustice. Of this—I suppose unconsciously—you have given a very strong proof. In your concluding paragraph you say:—"Friends, if you would weigh a man in the balance, put first of all into the scales his love of justice. If this be light from any cause, set him down as one whose possibilities may be sublime, but whose attainment is pitifully and deplorably small." So say I. But don't you see that by this we make his character stand high or low by the amount of love he has for the single article of justice? Now add to this the love of truth, mercy, holiness, &c., and we shall have a man as near perfection as it is possible for a man to get; and we will not quarrel with Jesus, though he should say—"Love is the fulfilling of the law."

E. L. CRANE.

[The word "love," as applied to justice, mercy, truth, and so forth, is used metaphorically. By the "love of justice," we meant a constant and ever-scrupulous regard for the rights of others. Mr. Crane's criticism is a little too literal.

Our essay was hurriedly written, and leaves untouched many points that are really essential to a clear and full treatment of the subject. But we are satisfied if it has suggested any fresh thought to any of our readers.—ED.

LOVE AND JUSTICE AS MOTIVES.

FORT MADISON, IOWA, June 21, 1871.

If Mr. Abbot were "my minister," I should complain of his disturbing my naps in "meeting," and of his terrible short-comings as to the old Amalekites, while he is relentless towards the sinners of 1871. Considerably has Mr. A. disturbed me by his late article in reference to the comparative efficacy of Justice and of Love.

He concedes the power and beauty and marvellous results of Love as a principle of action. But Love, he urges, is sometimes hurtful to its object, and is fickle and uncertain in its operation; and the supreme sway of justice creates an eminently grand and masculine character.

So, too, the sense of justice varies in respect to energy and reliability. All the Grand Inquisitors supposed themselves to be acting in the interest of what was just and right. If Love was blind, the vision of Justice is by no means unerring and it is often badly spectacled.

Love inspires the most daring heroism. The greatest hero is the best lover. Healthy love is a moral tonic, and no "poppy nor mandragora." True Love is widely-reaching and is mainly concentrated on what is truly lovely in humanity.

So far as we love, we shall naturally be just and shall delight in being so, and our soul's golden age will slowly come.

Will not a genuine justice yet be regarded as a form of love? Love constrains me to pay a brother's rightful claim. Love for the community constrains me to prosecute its foe.

The necessity of Love is abiding. That of Justice is occasional.

I am not yet convinced that Love, if genuine and as comprehensive as we can make it, is not, practically, the fulfilment of the Law.

Then let us, so far as in us lies, love everybody, and to the extent of knowledge and opportunity be just to everybody. D.

CLERICAL NICKNAMES.—The terms usually chosen by the adherents of the fashionable theology to designate those who differ from them in religious opinion, are neither descriptive of the general character of those to whom they are applied, nor expressive of the principles commonly held by them. "Sceptic," "unbeliever," "infidel," "scoffer," and kindred terms of misrepresentation, have become so popular by persistent usage that many Liberals, despairing that the Church could mend its manners or abate its arrogance, accept these reproaches and flaunt them as their banners. The so-called "sceptic" is often firmer in his convictions than the average Christian; the "unbeliever" is almost invariably one who believes more than the Church allows; the "infidel" is a true representative of unswerving fidelity. To the faith of the Rationalist—a faith founded in reason and strengthened continually by experience—the Christian, the Jew, the Mohammedan, the devotees of all the effete theologies, are infidels, and theirs is an infidelity which is aggravated, in each case, by a blind idolatry.—Washington Iconoclast.

I should say sincerity, a deep, great, genuine sincerity, is the first characteristic of all men in any way heroic.—Carlyle.

A little four-year-old remarked to her mamma on going to bed, "I am not afraid of the dark." "No, of course you are not," replied her mamma, "for it can't hurt you." "But, mamma, I was a little afraid once, when I went into the pantry in the dark to get a cookie." "What were you afraid of?" asked her mamma. "I was afraid I couldn't find the cookies."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WANTED—A SITUATION. The subscriber, who has had several years experience in teaching such studies as are generally pursued at Massachusetts High Schools, and also in giving piano-forte lessons, would accept a moderate compensation at a place where Bible-reading is not required in school, and where no attempt would be made to interfere with his religious convictions or with the management of his school. Address A. D. JACKSON, care of SAMUEL JACKSON, JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS. 73-83

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf.

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38yl

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE,
BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,
Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.
D. G. FRANCIS,
73-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

WOOD & HOLBROOK'S PUBLICATIONS.

HERALD OF HEALTH.

Sixty Pages. $2.00 a Year. 20 Cts. a Number.
Three Months on Trial, Twenty-Five Cts.

$1 a Year to Clergymen, Teachers and Invalids who request it. New subscribers who send $2 for 1871 will be entitled to a book of 800 pages and 100 Engravings, entitled PHYSICAL PERFECTION, or Hints toward Human Beauty, showing how to acquire and retain Bodily Symmetry, Health and Vigor, and to avoid the infirmities and deformities of age, worth $1 50. The Scientific American says, "THE HERALD OF HEALTH contains more sensible articles than any monthly that comes to our sanctum."

Also—PHYSICAL PERFECTION.—Containing Chapters on Structure of the Human Body; the Perfect Man and Woman; the Temperaments; Laws of Human Configuration; Embryology; Childhood; Effects of Mental Culture; Moral and Emotional Influences; Social Conditions and Occupations; Effects of Climate and Locality; Direct Physical Culture; Practical Hygiene; Womanhood; the Secret of Longevity; the Arts of Beauty; External Indications of Figure, etc., etc. Beautifully illustrated with 100 Engravings, and handsomely bound. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This work has been through many editions, and has given great satisfaction to thousands. A copy is given free to subscribers to the HERALD OF HEALTH, who send $2 at once.

MINNESOTA AND ITS CLIMATE, as adapted to Consumptives, Invalids, and all who wish to make the State a Home. By Ledyard Bill, author of "A Winter in Florida." Price $1.25 post-paid, by mail.

This book, while a godsend to invalids and consumptives, will be found equally interesting to sportsmen and settlers, who would find a home in this far-famed State. It contains a beautiful view of Minnehaha Falls, and also chapters on the climate of all those places which are most desirable as resorts for invalids, including Florida, Nassau, the Adirondacks, California, San Diego, Payal, etc., etc.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL AND PHYSICAL CULTURE; OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRUE LIVING. By Professor F. G. Welch, Superintendent in Yale College. It contains over 400 pages, and is beautifully bound. Price, by mail, $2 25.

This book is the most perfect encyclopedia of Gymnastic exercises of the most approved method known. It tells in plain language how to do everything, from the building of a gymnasium and choosing apparatus to doing the exercises. The series of exercises with the Indian clubs alone, is the best ever published. Those who want a good work on gymnastic culture should not fail to get this one. Dr. Dio Lewis says, "This is an admirable guide to physical culture."

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS.—Hints on Getting Well and Keeping Well. By Mrs. E. B. Gleason, M. D. Woman agents wanted everywhere. Thousands are being sold. Full contents and terms of agency sent on application. Price, by mail, $1 50.

This book is designed mainly for women of all ages. It treats principally on the diseases of women, and includes chapters on Child-bearing and the Care of Children. Harper's Magazine, in reviewing the work, says: "Mrs. Gleason is able to say something to wives and to mothers which no man could say. There can be no difference of opinion about the value of the practical suggestions she affords, which are characterized by sound philosophy and clear, good sterling common sense. We wish the chapter, 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract, and sent to every mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sayles, after reading it, says: "I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!" No woman can read it without being made wiser and better, and without being better qualified for all the duties of life.

For any or all of the above works, address,
WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
67coow81 13 & 15 Laight St., New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher & Bookseller,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

- The Origin of Species, By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
- The Descent of Man, By DARWIN, 2 vols, each... 2 00
- Wallace on Natural Selection, (London)... 2 00
- Mivart on the Genesis of Species..... 1 00
- Man's Place in Nature, By HUXLEY..... 1 25
- Origin of Species, By HUXLEY..... 1 00
- Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condition of Man, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
- The Earthward Pilgrimage, By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
- History of European Morals, from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols, 8vo..... 6 00
- Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
- Chips from a German Workshop, By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
- The Old Roman World, By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
- Short Studies on Great Subjects, By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE..... 1 50
- Lecture on Calvinism, By the same..... 75
- The Heavens, An illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
- Words and their Uses, By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
- Steps of Belief, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
- Nature and Life, By Rev. ROBERT COLLYER..... 1 50
- Sartor Resartus, By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edition..... 90
- The Choice of Books, Same..... 75
- Essays of Elia, By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
- Thoughts about Art, By PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON..... 2 00
- Words of Weight on the Woman Question, (London)..... 2 25
- The Friendships of Woman, By W. R. ALGER... 2 00
- A Day by the Fire, LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
- Sanctum Sanctorum, THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
- Carlyle's Essays, Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
- Among My Books, By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
- The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 2 vols..... 5 00
- Society and Solitude, By the same..... 2 00
- Topics of the Times, By JAMES PARTON..... 2 00
- Success and its Conditions, By E. P. WHIPPLE... 1 50
- Literature and Life, By same..... 1 50
- Tablets, By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
- Companions of My Solitude, By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
- Organization in Daily Life, Same..... 1 50
- Realism, By the same..... 1 50
- War and Culture, By same..... 1 50
- Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms, By same..... 1 25
- Ten Great Religions, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
- Light and Electricity, By TYNDALL..... 1 25
- Our Girls, By Dio LEWIS..... 1 50
- Studies in Literature, By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
- Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read,—NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
- Principles of Psychology, By HERBERT SPENCER... 2 50
- American Religion, By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
- Fragments of Science For Unscientific People, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
- Light Science For Leisure Hours, By R. A. PROCTOR, 3 00
- Handbook Of Legendary And Mythological Art, By Mrs. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 3 50
- Hereditary Genius—Its Laws and Consequences, By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
- The Races of The Old World, By CHAS. L. BRACE... 2 00
- Little Women, By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
- Wallace's Review Of Darwin's Descent Of Man, PAPER..... 25
- Heat as a Mode of Motion, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
- Buechner on Force and Matter, (London Print).... 3 75
- Essays, By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE..... 1 00
- Aristotle's Ethics, (Bohn's Edition)..... 2 00
- France before Europe, By MICHELET..... 1 00
- Roman Imperialism and Other Essays, By J. R. SEELEY, Author of "Ecce Homo"..... 1 50
- The Republic of Plato..... 1 25
- The Book of Golden Thoughts, By HENRY ATWELL... 1 25
- Colton's Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words..... 1 25
- Consolations of Travel, or The Last Days of a Philosopher, By SIR HUMPHREY DAVY..... 1 50
- The Poetical Works of HODGKINS, WORDSWORTH, SHELLEY, KEATS, MOORE, SCOTT, BYRON, full gilt, and on tinted paper, each only..... 1 75

Address,

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher and Bookseller.
Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

Lecky's History of European Morals, 2 vols.....$6.00

Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols.....5.00

Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols.....5.00

Weise's Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, 2 volumes.....6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870 (price $2.50). Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

Darwin's Origin of Species, price.....$2.00

Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price.....2.00

Essays in Criticism, by Matthew Arnold, price.....2.00

Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, with portrait, price.....2.00

Any volume of the writings of Theodore Parker or Henry D. Thoreau, each.....2.00

On the Heights, Auerbach.....2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.

For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.

For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.

For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.

For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS.

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones.....	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. E. S. D.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 29.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JULY 22, 1871.

WHOLE No. 82.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE RADICAL IDEA OF PRAYER.

[The Fourth Free Lecture in City Hall, Dover, N. H., Dec. 27, 1868. The close was added when read in Toledo, July 11, 1869.]

"O beloved Pan, and all ye other gods of this place! Grant me to become beautiful in the inner man, and that whatever outward things I may have, may be at peace with those within. May I deem the wise man rich, and may I have such portion of gold as none but a prudent man can either bear or employ. —Do we need anything else, Phædrus? For myself I have prayed enough."

PLATO, Phædrus, § 147. (The Prayer of Socrates.)

In the opening scene of his great poetical masterpiece, Goethe, the Shakespeare of Germany, represents Faust, his hero, alone in his high-arched Gothic study on the night before Easter. While the moonlight streams through the painted window-panes, and falls on books, manuscripts, instruments, glasses, boxes, and all the dumb companions of a scholar's solitude, Faust sits uneasily at his desk,—master of philosophy and law, medicine and theology and all the sciences, yet restless as a caged eagle.

With mingled pride and contempt, he runs through the list of his acquisitions and honors, and avows to himself what the most learned men always know the best, that human knowledge, compared with human ignorance, is as nothing. Having lived a life of thought, absorbed in pursuits remote from common interests, he recoils by a natural reaction from his hermit-like seclusion, and burns for something better; he is sick of poring over his parchments, and declares his life empty of joy. Hence he has betaken himself to the study of magic, that he may by the aid of spirits dive beneath the surface of things and deal henceforth with realities,—with something better than mere words. A profound spiritual restlessness, a secret, "mysterious pain" [unerklärter Schmerz] torments him, which he tries to account for by saying that he has surrounded himself with skeletons and dead men's bones, instead of the living Nature in the midst of which God created man.

Thus musing with himself, Faust takes up a book of magical incantations written by the hand of the great Nostradamus, turns over the pages, and, at last pronouncing a potent spell, summons before him the mighty Earth-Spirit, which appears in a flame of crimson fire. Faust turns away in terror, unable to bear the sight; but, when taunted by the Spirit as a "cowardly, wriggling worm," he rallies his pride and exclaims:—"Shall I yield to thee, thou fiery Form? It is I, Faust, thine equal!" "Thou art equal," is the disdainful answer, "to that spirit which thou comprehendest—not to ME!" With this the awful vision vanishes. "Not equal to thee!" echoes Faust, "to whom, then? I, the image of God, not equal to thee!"

At this moment, a knock at the door breaks the spell; Wagner, Faust's pupil, enters to bore his master with an untimely call, and can scarcely be got rid of by a broad hint that his company is distasteful at so late an hour. Wagner retires, but Faust has lost the golden moment. A profound disgust with his human weakness floods his mind. "Though I had power to evoke thee," he cries, "yet to retain thee had I no power!" From the dizzy heights of spiritual exaltation, he falls to the dead level of common life. A flask of poison, a sleep-potion of deadly and most subtle powers, catches his eye; he grasps it. From its case he draws forth a crystal goblet which his ancestors had used in by-gone days at high festivals, passing it from hand to hand, and obliging each guest in turn to describe in rhyme the quaint figures carved upon its surface. "To no neighbor," he says, "will I pass thee now: I will not practise my wit upon thy curious art. Here is a juice that soon inebriates. Be this last draught of mine, with all my soul, a salutation to the Morn!" He raises the goblet to his lips; but, at this moment, on the stillness of the midnight air strikes the deep bell of a neighboring convent, and from a chorus of angelic voices bursts forth a rejoicing anthem, welcoming the advent of Easter.

"Christ is arisen!
Joy to the Mortal!
Oped is Life's portal—
Burst is Death's prison!"

Faust's arm falls powerless by his side, while another chorus responds.

"Sadly with spices,
At close of the day,
We, his own true ones,
Had laid him away,—
Had with ceremonies bound him,
With many a tear;
Alas! we have found him
No longer here!"

Once more floats softly the answering song of the angels.

"Christ is arisen!
Blest are the loving,
To their Master's reproving
That faithfully listen!"

With a thrill Faust hearkens to the sound; a flood of tender memories rushes into his soul and sweeps away his purpose. "I hear your message, heavenly tones!" he exclaims, "though faith is lacking. Miracle is faith's darling child. And yet, familiar to my childhood's ear, your music calls me back to life. Once fell, in the solemn stillness of the Sabbath eve, the kiss of heavenly love upon my brow. Then full of presage sounded the deep-toned bell; and a prayer was rapturous joy. With all the feelings of my childhood, memory holds me back from the last step. O sound again, ye sweet songs of heaven! The tear gushes forth—Earth has me again!"

If to any one this has all seemed remote from my subject, it bears, nevertheless, directly upon it. That tear, brought to the eye of Faust by the sacred memories of childhood—his mother's kiss of love, his own childish devotions exhaled from a pure and innocent heart like fragrance from a flower,—that tear, I say, was a prayer. It was the revival, at least for one high moment, of divine aspirations,—the fresh pulsation of a world-sick heart with new tides of purer blood,—the sweetening of a close and stifling atmosphere by fresh gales from the meadows and fields,—the breathing of a better spirit, albeit for a brief interval, into a soul that had not yet lost all love for goodness and for truth. There is little to admire in the character which Goethe has painted in Faust, except this momentary susceptibility to better impulses. He is selfish and unprincipled, and goes on, notwithstanding his rescue from self-destruction by a sudden influx of better thoughts, to sell his soul to the devil and play the part of a most consummate villain. I am not sure but that his villainy looks doubly black, when set thus strikingly in contrast with divine instincts; yet this superiority to the thralldom of the lower nature is in itself lovely, and only fails to command our perfect admiration because it is so fleeting. Eternize this moment, and it becomes a heaven. Shall we despise the better moments of bad men, and scorn their transient goodness, because they so speedily turn again to wallow in the mire? Not even the best of us can afford to do this. It is true of us all—"we cannot keep the heights that we can win." However evanescent may be the soul's beauty, however quickly it is clouded and smutched with evil, there is cause to lament the swift passing away of its loveliness, but no cause to sneer at its brief appearance. Nor is it just, either to the vicious or to human nature itself, to suspect all such flashes of light from a dark character as mere optical illusions, as mere tricks of hypocrisy. Beneath all foulness and deformity of soul, there is even in the worst something sound, healthful and beautiful, as a gold coin, however overlaid with dirt, is still gold at the heart. Hence the momentary outgush of tender feeling from the selfish heart of Faust, the brief melting of its ice under the warm breath of holy remembrances, is as pure an illustration of the nature of true prayer as if the ice of selfishness had not again encrusted his spirit with adamant hardness.

Taken in its essence, prayer is something deeper than words. Words are but one of many forms in which true prayer may find expression; nor has everything that passes for prayer a right to bear the name. Volubility of tongue is commonly in the inverse ratio to prayerfulness of spirit. When the soul prays best, the lips are sealed. A torrent of words poured forth with pious whine, shouted or screamed, perhaps, at the top of the voice, is too often the soul's ostentatious proclamation of its own prayerlessness. Deep feeling is no master of rhetoric. I would rather listen to the rumbling of cartwheels over stone pavements than to a rhetorical prayer. The one is honest, the other is dishonest, noise. It was once said of a distinguished man that he "offered the most eloquent prayer ever addressed to a Boston audience." Was ever sarcasm more biting? Such prayers are a travesty on worship. Let us learn that prayer is something other and better than ambition for human praise, something too sacred to be lumped in with morning and evening chores, something too ethereal and free to be reduced to a daily or weekly duty. He has never yet learned to pray aright who knows no prayer but that of words or mechanical routine.

What, then, is the essence of living prayer? I will not pretend precisely to define what must ever elude all definition; prayer, like love, must be experienced to be understood, and, once experienced, it cannot be cut and dried in a formula. Yet it may be inadequately described. True prayer is the soul's deep homage to goodness and beauty and truth,—the profound thirst for divine life, its thrill of reverential worship before infinite and eternal Being, its deep self-identification with the One and All. It is the unutterable repose of the tired spirit in the boundless and living Whole,—the ending of ignorant struggle against the omnipresent Power that fills infinitude with itself and holds us all in the bosom of changeless law. It is not extinction of the private will, in hopeless submission to a Fate whose right is its might, but rather the glad identification of the private will with the deepest currents of the universe, its conscious and active trust in the "higher thoughts and higher ways" of the universal Mind. It is the mighty gravitation of the soul to its Source, the strong attraction of its love for the Supreme Loveliness, its joyous flight above the clouds into the serene radiance of the empyrean. What is it not, that is deep, real, vital, in man's experience? It is earnestness, it is courage, it is truthfulness, it is purity, it is principle, it is love, it is the uplifting of the heart to God and self-dedication to all that is God-like. It is the outflashing of the inner light into the outward life. It is the supreme experience that makes an oasis in the desert of desolate years.

The spirit of prayer is thus the Soul of Nature breathing through the soul of man. Wherever it lives and moves, it as inevitably creates some form of self-expression as a gushing spring creates for itself a channel. But its forms of expression are as diverse as the faces and the characters of men. It would be as idle as presumptuous to prescribe one and the same form to all. Let each heart utter its own life in its own way. Everything is a prayer, a true and genuine prayer, that expresses an inward endeavor and longing for diviner character. It may utter itself without words in the heightened color of the cheek, in the quick suffusing of the eye, in the unconscious bowing of the head, in the swifter throbbing of the heart, in the escape of a contrite sigh, in the electric thrill of the nerves at the sight of beauty or goodness; all these, and countless others, may be prayers more full, more complete, than the blended supplications of a mighty multitude.

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desire,
Unuttered or expressed,
The motion of a hidden fire
That trembles in the breast.

Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear,
The upward glancing of an eye
When none but God is near.

Prayer is the spirit of our God
Returning whence it came;
Love is the sacred fire within,
And prayer the rising flame."

There is no need to shout through a speaking-trumpet to reach the ear of God; neither is he captivated by the elegance of our diction, or the grace of our elocution. The worded prayer is not so audible to him as the aspiration, the inward glow of yearning for something better, which is too deep for words. Many a man and many a woman pray daily who never utter a syllable in prayer. Perhaps they are no believers in verbal worship; perhaps they shrink from a mode of expression not natural to them; perhaps they cannot find words to speak. Some men are too religious to pray with words. They have been shocked or repelled by the grovelling prayers of pulpiteers, and in the stillness of their own souls worship God with more expressive silence. There cannot be one law to all; each must be a law to himself, and interpret for himself the deep promptings of his own nature. It is as natural for one man to pray with words, as it is for his neighbor to offer God the inarticulate adoration of musing thought.

I find two kinds of bigots in this matter. One kind says:—"You must pray regularly at morning and night, go to church, attend prayer meetings, and let your voice be heard." The other says:—"You must never pray at all anywhere." The one says:—"If you don't pray as I prescribe, you are an infidel." The other says:—"If you do pray at all, you are a hypocrite or a fool." Friends, let the bigots have it all to themselves; let us practise a large wisdom, and judge no man. The substance of prayer,—the desire for virtue, the aspiration, the sense of inviolable law, the inward veneration of the Perfect and Ideal Good,—cannot be dispensed with by him who would be a whole man; but how each soul shall utter these in life and action, it is neither for you nor me to declare. A serene, joyous, faithful, reverent spirit should most certainly hallow the heart of every man; but whether he should pray with words, every man must settle for himself. For myself, I cannot think it useless to express verbally, when the mood inclines, the deep worship of the soul. The expression of a true feeling deepens the feeling itself. The same feeling which prompts us all to express our affection in Christmas gifts, prompts some of us at times to express our affection towards the Infinitely Good in simple words. God needs no gift, even of words, at our hands; but, if you are a father or a mother, was it nothing that you received a useless trifle from your own child? Even if it was nothing to you, did it not make the heart of your little one swell with happiness to offer you some token of its love? Perhaps we too are no more than children. Are there no times when it would be violence to our own instincts to withhold from them the luxury of words? When I am told, as I have been told, that all prayer is foolishness and superstition, I feel that he who tells me this has not sounded all the depths of the human heart, nor scaled all its heights. When you forbid all birds to sing, the thrush and the nightingale will disobey.

I have called it presumptuous to prescribe one and the same form of expression to all who pray. This I must modify. There is one form of expression binding on every soul. No soul can rightly pray, whose life is not a prayer. We may or may not, at our option, put our devotion to God and goodness into words; but alas for us if we fail to put it into deeds! If we can but worship God with heroic and divine character, let us not mourn our awkwardness of speech or untunefulness of voice; let us be content. If we can but express our thirst for purity in spotless souls, our thirst for truthfulness in stern integrity and crystalline sincerity of conduct, our thirst for all beneficence in deeds of service done to humanity's poor, neglected ones, then King David with all the music of his matchless lyre never sang to God so sweet a psalm. Spend your Sundays where and how you will—read your Bibles as much or as little as you please—believe this, or disbelieve that, as the laws of thought and the degree of your culture shall determine; but if you make your daily life the expression of an endless striving after all that is high and pure, brave and tender and unselfish,—why, friend, though all the world should hoot and pelt you with shouts of "infidel, infidel," God be thanked for the sweet beauty of your worship! Dare to be a man, though in the midst of puppets; trample all deceits and expediences and time-servings and meannesses and impurities under foot; shine in the fogs of the world's selfishness like a beacon-light of simple fidelity to divine laws; and depend upon it, this prayer put into life and character is itself its own answer from God. Under this law do we all stand, that we shall pray all the days of our lives with hands and feet and head and heart and all that we have or are. The really prayerless man is he who gets down and besmears himself with the mud of licentiousness, drunkenness, and all evil passions; or he who prays morn, noon, and night, to the great god of greenbacks, and burns up honesty and humanity on his altars; or he who, in any way, dedicates himself to ought save manliness and godliness (which are one and the same). To cherish a transparent purpose that shuns not strict inspection, and with grave yet cheerful assiduity to change it into fitting action day by day, is to have the essence of all religions, the substance of all prayers. From the obligation to worship the Eternal with such devotion, no soul is exempt. Thus to pray is but to fulfil life's highest end.

Here, then, we find the radical idea of prayer, the concentration of all true spiritual worship, in the soul's fidelity to all goodness, in its hunger and thirst after righteousness, in its passion for diviner life and deep joy in the living God. However it may utter itself, whether with or without voice, this uplifting of the heart to the Absolute Best is the fountain of noble living and high character; and prayer, truly conceived, means each and every expression of this inward self-consecration. Words are but casual outcroppings of this interior purpose and affection, and are by no means essential to genuine religion. Truly to pray is to be conscious of a deep devotion to the ideal and perfect Good, and to put this inward devotion into some sincere expression. The one prayer incumbent on all is to live nobly; beyond this, there is no obligation. Yet I count it a mark of spiritual misdevelopment or at least undevelopment when no outgush of heart-worship ever clothes itself in words,—when no inward jubilee or profound yearning ever seeks relief in direct speech to the omnipresent and indwelling One. Whether I were commanded or forbidden to pray in words, the two grievances would be equal; the vocal prayer is mockery if it be not spontaneous and free, and if it be spontaneous and free, it will not be repressed.

In what remains to say, I shall use the word prayer in its narrower sense, namely, verbal or worded prayer.

There are many kinds of prayer, good and bad, foolish and wise, true and false. I know no prayer more beautiful than that of the Mohammedan,—"Thou art all that I desire, O thou Perfect One! Make me to Thee all that Thou desirest!" To listen to the petitions poured out by some preachers, one would imagine that prayer is nothing but a bare-faced beggary. Selfishness and folly are none the less displeasing, because flaunted in the face of God. On the contrary, the folly is more sickening and the selfishness is more hideous, when set in immediate contrast with the perfect Wisdom and perfect Goodness. If a man has no better business than to be everlastingly "saving his soul," when not his soul, but his common sense, is in danger, I have nothing to say; but this I see, that selfish prayer is a highly immoral act. It is bad enough to beg exemption from eternal fires as the supreme good; this has its partial excuse in fright and the instinct of self-preservation. But when men pray for rain, or good crops, or success in this or that scheme, or prosperity in business, or some other worldly advantage which depends on natural laws,—when they beseech Christ to intercede for them and save them from hell,—it seems as if they fancied that private schemes could be pushed through in Heaven, as they are in Congress, by lobbying and log-rolling. Men are degraded and demoralized by such prayers. Why should they always pray in Christ's name, or for Christ's sake? If we pray, let us pray in our own name. An excess of abasement and want of self-respect is implied in this selfish endeavor to obtain from God's partiality towards Jesus what cannot be obtained from his impartial goodness. In fact, the clamoring for favors not conferred by universal laws which are equal and just to all alike, is mischievous and debasing. If prayer is nothing but beggary, nothing but a selfish plea for private ends, it is just as immoral as any other species of selfishness. Let us see things in their true light. Meanness is not ennobled by being thrust into the face of Heaven. The noble spirit will seek from God no good that shall not include his race. It would be ashamed to be singled out as the recipient of partial benefits; it would blush even to ask that just and universal laws should be warped for a favorite's advantage. It prefers to cast in its lot with all humanity, sure that the Author of humanity has but one law for all.

But this selfish begging, this pious mendicancy, grows partly out of ignorance. The changelessness of law is henceforth a fixed principle. If prayer is the effort or even the wish to suspend or overrule or in any way affect natural laws, then it is at the same time useless and irreligious; useless, because the laws of God change not,—irreligious, because it is religion to obey these laws without seeking to change them. To conform our wills with the absolute Order, to trust so unreservedly in the absolute Goodness that we have nothing to ask,—this appears to me to be the highest worship. Bishop Dupanloup, of Paris, declared that "prayer sometimes equals and surpasses the power of God! It triumphs over his will, his wrath, his justice." What idiocy is this! If prayer is only an effort to revolutionize the government of Infinite Intelligence, it aims to supplant this by the government of Infinite Folly; and we could not then too soon forget to pray. That God is God, should be a thought to hush forever all wild and foolish wishes. He wisely prays who with delight acknowledges the perfectness of Nature, and, though it be with tears, rejoices in its unchanging laws.

True prayer, therefore, is neither an attempt to enlist Omnipotence in the service of our little private jobs, nor an attempt to undermine the foundations of the universe by overthrowing the changelessness of its laws. Were it either of these, it would be infinitely childish and ridiculous, as pulpit prayers too often are. But true prayer, gushing spontaneously from a full heart, is the simple outbreathing of a peaceful and reverential spirit. Even the joy of Nature is a prayer. The sea prays in the splendid sparkle and everlasting dash of its waters. The earth prays in the uplifting of its mountain peaks like worshipping hands. The stars of night pray, with radiant eyelids forever trembling as if to repress tears of adoring joy. The universe is everywhere at prayer, laying on the altar the thank-offering of its own beauty and peace. Shall the soul of man alone be mute, and pour forth no song of thanksgiving and delight? Like the birds in spring, it must utter itself in music. Prayer is the song of an innocent, trusting, and loving heart; and while birds sing, and hearts love, so long will they pour forth their joy and praise, each after its kind.

"Farewell, farewell! but this I tell
To thee, thou Wedding-Guest!
He prayeth well, who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast,
He prayeth best who loveth best
All things, both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all."

Listen to a prayer of Epictetus, a lame old slave of ancient Rome, who owed nothing to Christianity for the purity of his aspirations or of his life. Speaking of the approach of death, and the kinds of employment in which death should find us occupied, he says:—"For my own part, I would be found engaged in nothing but in the regulation of my own will; how to render it undisturbed, unrestrained, uncompelled, free. I would be found studying this, that I may be able to say to God,—'Have I transgressed thy command? Have I perverted the powers, the senses, the instincts, which Thou hast given me? Have I ever accused Thee or censured Thy dispensations? I have been sick, because it was Thy pleasure, like others; but I willingly. I have been poor, it being Thy will; but with joy. I have not been in power, because it was not Thy will; and power I have never desired. Hast thou ever seen me saddened because of this? Have I not always approached Thee with a cheerful countenance, prepared to execute Thy commands and indications of Thy will? Is it Thy pleasure that I should depart from this assembly [of living men]? I depart. I give Thee all thanks that Thou hast thought me worthy to have a share in it with Thee; to behold Thy works, and to join with Thee in comprehending Thy administration.' Let death overtake me while I am thinking, while I am writing, while I am reading such things as these."

This, my friends, is the prayer of a "Pagan" heart; how seldom do we hear one so manly, so noble, from Christian lips!

A few words on the bearing of these ideas on public worship, and I will close. Whoever comes to perceive that God acts always by law, and never by caprice,—that the sphere of law includes alike the worlds of matter and of mind,—and that this vast system of laws, material and spiritual, which we are wont to express under the name of Nature, is the product of perfect Intelligence and Goodness,—whoever, I say, has come to perceive these great truths, can cherish no expectation, or even wish, to alter by verbal requests the changeless order of the universe. For him, prayer as petition means nothing but the revolt of human will against the wise and beneficent system of Nature. But as the spontaneous and unforced expression of the sentiments of awe, reverence, aspiration, gratitude, and spiritual unity with God, prayer can never be outgrown until these sentiments are themselves outgrown. It is the natural voicing of the noblest part of human nature; and, if not subjected to unnatural constraint, the soul will always, in its profoundest experiences, seek to relieve itself by some outbreathing of its inward worship.

But, because true prayer is the free and spontaneous utterance of an overcharged heart, it can never be reduced to rules, or bound by routine. Resolve to pray regularly at set times, at morning or night or at any other fixed season, and prayer will be converted into a dead and hurtful form. Freedom is all-essential to the spirit of prayer. I can see no reason why prayer should not be public as well as private, provided it is natural, sincere, and free. But I do see reason why a man should not bind himself to pray by appointment, or as a matter of routine. It is precisely at this point that danger threatens, in making prayer an invariable or required part of public worship. Few men are so religious, that they can pray sincerely at five minutes' notice; and of all frightful hypocrisies, an insincere prayer is the most repulsive. "It is better," said a noble old man, "to suear, thinking no evil, than to pray, thinking no good." Owen Lovejoy, brother of Elijah P. Lovejoy, the anti-slavery martyr, exclaimed,—"I would rather hear a man swear for freedom than pray for slavery." The prayer into which no heart enters, or which utters only the greed of human selfishness under pretence of worshipping God, is the ghastliest of lies. The fierce oath of passion is less abhorrent than such a prayer; for while the prayer is a mockery of all things sacred, the oath, at least, is sincere. If at any time we cannot offer a prayer honestly, let us show reverence for reality by remaining with shut lips.

Further, it is impossible to pray vicariously. You cannot hire a priest to do your praying. If you cannot do your own praying, it remains undone, though a hundred voices chant the "Miserere, Domine!" in your behalf. It does no good to listen to the sweetest or divinest outpouring of devotion, unless the incense rises in your own soul. Worship is at first hand, or not at all. Out of a thousand so-called worshippers, scarcely ten will worship. You cannot be prayed for; you cannot pray for another. Each soul must live its real life alone. The truthfulness of public prayer is gone, if the minister pretends to pray for his congregation, rather than with them; and he prays with those only, who pray with him.

These are the ideas of prayer that come to a minister who refuses to trade on that which ought never to be for sale. They are, at least, my own ideas. In obedience to their bidding, I mean never again to occupy a position in which prayer shall become a duty of routine. Whatever public services I may be called to hold, I reserve absolutely the right to be myself. To customs not approved, I concede nothing. Silent I must remain, unless I am inwardly moved to speak. The reality of prayer I reverence too profoundly, to be willing to degrade it into mere parrottry. If on such terms the public has no need of me, well and good.—I shall then have no need of the public. There is work enough to be done in the world to furnish employment for all in private life; and if the time has not yet come when ministers shall have both freedom of speech and freedom of action, it is every way better to wait. But I believe the day is already dawning when such a ministry shall be possible in America; and I behold cheerfully the first streaks of sunshine shooting along the sky.

MENTAL PROGRESS OF ANIMALS.

[From "Nature," December 9, 1869.]

I have failed to meet with a satisfactory treatment of this subject either in works of mental philosophy or natural history. Sir John Lubbock, in "Pre-historic Times," refers to the likelihood of the sagacity of man and the wariness of animals proceeding pari passu; but he does not develop the idea or aid it by illustration, and I find that the tradition still widely prevails that the instinct and intelligence of animals is a thing fixed and unchangeable; and that the mammals which roamed over the world during the earlier and middle tertiary epochs must be credited with the same amount of sagacity as their representatives of the present day. Such statements are assumptions opposed to the current of any facts we possess on the subject. Much of what has been termed cunning in animals will be found to have been very much sharpened and made evident in quadrupeds and birds, owing to the new necessities imposed upon them by man the tamer or man the destroyer.

For it is under one of these two characters that man approaches animals, affecting them in the most complex and vivid manner. No bird or quadruped so high in the mental scale as the dog, horse, rat, rook, or sparrow, has been found in the lonely oceanic isles or in any region free, or all but free, from human influence; not because in these quarters such animals could not exist, but rather it would seem because the aboriginal fauna had no opportunity for the improvement of its wits by coming in contact with an enemy or friend so complex, dreadful, and ingenious as a human being.

One of the first impulses communicated to the wits of the wild animals is that derived from the sense of new wants. Now this is what man supplies by his cultivated fruits and cereals. A feast is spread before quadrupeds more generous than that of nature. But the banquet is guarded, and often becomes a baited trap in which the simple thief is caught; but a very small increment of sagacity is sometimes enough to turn the scale, and this quickness of wit, especially in the first ages of society, as among existing savages, would be slowly met by improvement of the trap. Necessity, on either side the mother of invention, would at last permit only wary and vigilant enemies, since these alone could succeed, to hang around kraals and wigwams, approach in twilight the crops near stockaded villages, prowl about places of internment, lodge in sewers, enter cellars; and, keenly alive to every sign of danger, multiply in spite of poison, trap, and gun, and in defiance of trained animals of their own and allied species, and that division of labor which gives us special hunters.

The fear of man is a slowly acquired instinct. Mr. Darwin, in his account of his travels, gives some interesting instances of the fearlessness of birds little exposed to man in South America. The crew of Byron's vessel were astonished at the manner in which the wolf-like dog of the Falkland Islands approached them merely out of curiosity. Compare these traits with the admirably organized expeditions for plunder of baboons, elephants, &c., and the rude customs acted upon for self-preservation of the half-wild dogs of the Peninsula and the East, wherein the care of the weak and young, the usefulness of sentries, the value of signals, the difference between sham and real danger, and the advantage of confusing traces of retreat, seem all to be known, and it will be pretty evident that man the 'thinker has to a considerable extent reacted on animals wild and domestic. Even in my own quarter it is the steady belief of the shepherds that the common sheep-dog has progressed in intelligence and docility in the last fifty years by careful selection. "Where the dog is not valued for intelligence, as in some eastern countries, it is a much more stupid animal than with us."

Now were we in vision to behold that wonderful Miocene age, when the great mammals roamed over Europe unpeopled as yet by man, I am convinced that both they and the birds of the period would be less interesting and more monotonous in their habits than those which people Europe at the present day, and have for ages been engaged in struggling for existence with a being so much superior to themselves; and that in pre-human times the horn, hoof, tooth, and coat of mail, to a far greater extent than now, ensured victories which other and more subtle agencies are now necessary to secure on the part of those animals nearest to man in organization and habits.

J. S.

A BROTHER OF GIRLS.—I asked if Abd-el-Kadir were coming here, as I had heard. He did not know, and asked me if he were not "Akhu-l-Benat" (a brother of girls). I prosaically said: "I did not know if he had sisters!" "The Arabs, O Lady! call that man a 'brother of girls' to whom God has given a clean heart to love all women as his sisters, and strength and courage to fight for their protection." Omar suggested "thorough gentleman" as the equivalent of Abou Hassan's title.—Lady Duff Gordon.

HAS GERMAN FREEDOM GAINED BY THE WAR?—The Germans celebrated their victories over France by a triumphal entry of selected portions of their armies into Berlin, and by a number of more or less antiquated monarchical pageants and festivities, on the 16th and 18th of this month [June]. The capital of the German Empire was crowded with deputations from all its provinces, and with various visitors from all countries, and the whole affair proved, in the language of the day, a brilliant success. The main feature of the display was the unveiling of an equestrian statue of Frederic William III., the father of the Emperor, who was, of course, the real lion of the occasion. Of his military advisers, the Minister of war, Von Roon, was elevated to the rank of Count of the Empire, and Count Moltke was made Field-Marshal of the Imperial Army. No new honors were bestowed upon Prince Bismarck. That the great majority not only of the witnesses of the celebration, but of the German people, felt both happy and proud on those days can hardly be doubted; but it is almost equally certain that the minority must have been not a little mortified by the strongly feudal aspect of the ceremonies. The minority was, besides, still smarting under the blow dealt its not over-sanguine political expectations by the late imperious intervention of Bismarck in the debates on the Alsace and Lorraine Bill. The Emperor, in his speech from the throne closing the session, on the 15th, endeavored, it is true, to soothe the excited feelings of the opposition, and his utterances, during the celebration, were all dignified and expressive of moderation and love of peace; but the growing conviction of the men of progress in Germany that the victories and union of Germany are to be paid for by considerable sacrifice of freedom, and that the temporary dictators of Alsace and Lorraine are to be, for a time, also the dictators of the new empire, can, we presume, not easily be repressed.—N. Y. Nation.

While one part of the Unitarian denomination appears to be going constantly further and further towards what is called Free Religion, another portion is quite as manifestly verging towards Orthodoxy. Mr. Frothingham of this city is one of the leaders of the Radical wing, while Messrs. Bellows and Hepworth, also of this city, represent the orthodox tendency. Just now the orthodox papers are quoting, with strong approval, a speech made by Mr. Hepworth in Boston, in which that gentleman presents views of Christ and of ministerial duty such as are usually uttered in orthodox pulpits; and in The Liberal Christian of last week, Dr. Bellows mourns over "the decay of theology" as "the decay of serious and earnest thinking, and the gradual disappearance of faith," and says that he is "sorry" that the rumor of the conversion of Babu Chunder Sen to Methodism turns out to be false, as he should regard conversion to any form of Christianity, from Roman to Methodist, as a great advance on the simple Theism to which he, like Theodore Parker, now holds. He also administers a sharp rebuke to the Unitarians of England for the "goodly fellowship" with which they received Mr. Sen while he was in that country. To an outsider it would seem that there is but a short step between Unitarianism of this sort and the moderate orthodoxy which abounds on every side; while the gulf between it and Radicalism is very wide.—N. Y. Tribune.

They are never alone who are accompanied with noble thoughts.—Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia.

HISTORY OF THE WAR IN EUROPE.

The National Publishing Co., of Cincinnati, has just issued a very valuable history of the late War between Germany and France, from the pen of one of our most popular writers, Mr. JAMES D. MCCABE, JR.

In a large volume of 800 octavo pages, the author tells a wonderful story—all the stranger because of its truth. He tells of battles which have shaken Europe to its centre, and the consequences of which even we of the Western World must feel: of patriotism, heroism, military skill and statesmanship, never surpassed in history. The author writes with the weight and force of truth, and the great merits of his book are its reliability and strict impartiality.

The book is complete in every particular. It describes the causes of the war, and the events which preceded it; the opening campaign, and the first reverses of the French, the effect of these reverses upon the French people; the frantic effort to rescue the beaten army, and the terrible disaster of Sedan; the capture of the Emperor Napoleon, and an entire army; the Revolution in Paris; the rise and formation of the Republic; the flight of the Empress from Paris; the siege and surrender of Strasbourg and the frontier fortresses of France; the triumphal advance of the German armies to Paris; the detailed history of this great siege; its plans, sorties, battles, successes and failures; the course of events in the beleaguered city, given in the form of a full diary of the events of the siege; the campaigns on the Loire, and in other portions of France; the peace negotiations, the surrender of Paris, and the treaty; the naval history of the war; the diplomatic history on both the German and French sides; the history of the formation of the great German Empire; the proclaiming of King William Emperor, and the realization of German unity; the events of the civil war and second siege of Paris, its terrible scenes of bloodshed and vandalism, with a minuteness, graphicness and brilliancy, which leaves nothing to be desired. No intelligent person can afford to be uninformed as to these events which have left so deep an impression on the world's history, and few will fail to read this splendid work; or, having read it, to endorse it as the Standard American History of the War.

In this age of sensational literature, we cannot too highly commend this brilliant and thoughtful narrative to our readers. The book is handsomely bound, and illustrated with 150 maps, portraits, battle scenes, and views of the principal localities connected with the war. No expense has been spared by the publishers to make it worthy of the support of the public, and we predict for it an immense sale, especially as its low price brings it within reach of all. It is published in both English and German, sold by subscription only, and the publishers want agents in every county.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"Enclosed find a dollar, for which please send me a few copies of THE INDEX to distribute here in B—. If you have them to spare, I would prefer the most of them to be No. 12 of this volume. I think it a most excellent number. As I have not received my No. 11, will you send me at least one of them. For the remainder of the money please send me 'Truths for the Times.' I think here is a good place to distribute them, and I wish every one could have a copy. I have just received the last copy, No. 14, which like all the rest is but an appetizer for the next one. It strikes me that Bro. Howard will show signs of wear before long. The 'warm coloring' of 'our (his) doctrines' might seem a little more 'comforting,' perhaps, later in the fall; but just as warm weather is approaching, 'the mild and mellow light' of some doctrine of not quite so warm a coloring might be equally refreshing. However, as 'our doctrines' are so popular, and increasing in popularity so fast, perhaps it is well to emphasize them a little now before the heat gets to be too oppressive. Seriously, Mr. Abbot, I am daily convinced that the vital principles of Free Religion are founded on axioms, and that all the husks and other rubbish that have kept religion out of sight are gradually decaying and passing away, leaving the sound, nourishing kernel on which to feed and refresh, not only the intellect, but all the higher elements of man's true religious nature. It may not appeal to credulity or 'imagination,' as Mr. Howard chooses to call it; but it does appeal to the love of music, the devotional or worshipful nature, the spiritual, Godward side of our being, although in another way than Methodism would do it. But I didn't mean to write a letter. You are doing your work well and need no suggestions from the 'small fry.' I am heart and hand with you in the cause of Free Religion, as I understand it. Our personal beliefs differ somewhat. Cause—individuality, I suppose."

—"Having through the kindness of a friend been favored with a few copies of your invaluable little paper, I find that it has aroused an appetite within me that will not be appeased with an occasional feast. I must have it for 'steady diet,' so please find enclosed two dollars for which you will forward me THE INDEX for one year."

—"Your second essay on the Causes of Civilization, is the best historical summary I have ever read. So far as I can judge, it covers the whole ground. I have not read your last."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be suspended during the months of July and August. Special notice will be given of any occasional meetings that may be held.

RECEIVED.

THE PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. By HERBERT SPENCER. Vol. 1. New York: D. APPLETON AND COMPANY, 549 & 551 Broadway. 1871. 12mo. pp. 635.

FRAGMENTS OF SCIENCE FOR UNSCIENTIFIC PEOPLE: A Series of Detached Essays, Lectures, and Reviews. By JOHN TYNDALL, LL. D., F. R. S., Author of "Heat as a Mode of Motion," "Lectures on Sound," etc., etc. New York: D. APPLETON AND COMPANY, 549 & 551 Broadway. 1871. 12mo. pp. 422.

LIGHT AND ELECTRICITY: Notes of Two Courses of Lectures before the Royal Institution of Great Britain. By JOHN TYNDALL, LL. D., F. R. S., Author of "Heat as a Mode of Motion," "Lectures on Sound," "Fragments of Science for Unscientific People," "Hours of Exercise in the Alps," etc., etc.; Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Royal Institution of Great Britain. New York: D. APPLETON AND COMPANY, 549 & 551 Broadway. 1871. 12mo. pp. 194.

METAPHYSICS; OR, THE PHILOSOPHY OF CONSCIOUSNESS, PHENOMENAL AND REAL. By HENRY LONGUEVILLE MANSEL, B. D., Waynflete Professor of Philosophy, Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, Honorary LL. D. of the University of Edinburgh. New York: D. APPLETON AND COMPANY, 549 & 551 Broadway. 1871. 12mo. pp. 368.

PINK AND WHITE TYRANNY. A Society Novel. By Mrs. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, Author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "The Minister's Wooing," etc. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS. 1871. 12mo. pp. 331.

AMERICAN SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. Incorporated by the State of New York. Fifth Annual Report. 1871. Office, No. 696 Broadway, Corner Fourth Street, New York. Paper, pp. 64.

LAWS RELATING TO THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. Published by the AMERICAN SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. Office, 696 Broadway, cor. 4th St., New York. pp. 16.

BLETTER FUER FREIES RELIGIOESES LEBEN. Herausgegeben von FRIEDRICH SCHUENEMANN-POTT, Sprecher der Deutschen Freien Gemeinde in San Francisco. San Francisco. July, 1871. 16ter Jahrg. No. 1.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE PENNSYLVANIA YEARLY MEETING OF PROGRESSIVE FRIENDS. Held at Longwood, Chester County. 1871. Hamorton, Chester Co., Pa.: ISAAC MENDENHALL, pp. 40.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]
BE STILL AND WAIT.

By FREDERIC R. MARVIN.

Be still, O Soul!
Immortal Fates with tireless fingers work,
And from the tangled threads of time
Do weave the garment of eternity.
Be still, and wait.
The loom hath many threads;
But the swift shuttle runneth well.
A day, a night, and lo! between two hours
The fabric falls.
Be still and wait,
For thou shalt wear the garment of eternity,
The shining robe of immortality.

The Index.

JULY 22, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.
Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

NOTICE—THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

THE subscribers to the Capital Stock of THE INDEX ASSOCIATION are hereby notified that a meeting of said subscribers will be held at the office of the Toledo Printing Company, 90 St. Clair street, on Thursday, the 17th day of August, at 7½ P. M., for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors, and adopting rules for the government of said incorporation.
E. P. BASSETT,
CALVIN CONE,
PETER H. BATESON,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
HENRY E. HOWE.

Toledo, O., July 8, 1871.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed: and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten	" 1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	" 1,080
GUIDO MARK,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	" 1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	" 1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	" 300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	" 300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	" 300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	" 300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	" 500
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	" 3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	" 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	One	" 100
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	"	" 100
Miss A. HALL,	Defiance,	"	"	" 100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	" 100
J. SEDGEBEER,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	" 100
CARL POST,	Painesville,	O.,	"	" 100
HENRY MILLER,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	" 300
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	" 500
J. L. WHITING,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	" 100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Boston,	"	"	" 100
J. E. SUTTON,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	" 100
S. I. DURKEE,	Olafhe,	Kan.,	"	" 100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	" 100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	" 1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	" 200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	" 200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	" 200
FRANK PRATHER,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
E. F. DINSMORE,	Wellsville,	Kan.,	One	" 100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	" 200
	Middlefield,	Ct.,	Fourteen,	" 1,400
				$21,000

The spirit of justice is simply reverence for all rights.

THE CATHOLIC RIOT.

In view of the prompt repression of the late frightful outbreak in New York city, the following infamous and abominable instigation to the murder of Orangemen in a peaceable procession must be set down as one of the worst blows ever dealt in America against the Roman Catholic Church. It is from the Central Catholic of July 8, a Catholic weekly journal edited by John G. Clifford at Syracuse, N. Y., and it forms a part of the leading editorial of the issue. The italics are ours:—

"If these Orangemen seek to carry out their designs, whose object is obvious to every well-informed person, and the polity of the State, or the 'powers that be' in the city of New York, tacitly or otherwise sanction the proposed Orange celebration, upon them let the bloody consequences which may follow rest. Far be it from us to incite unjustifiably any man or body of men to oppose and resist legitimate authority, but we protest and repeat our protestation against the demonstration in question. Irish Catholics, be peaceable and orderly until you are publicly provoked and insulted; and then there is but one reasonable way of wiping this Orange plague out of political and harmful existence, AND THAT IS TO ANNIHILATE IT WHENEVER IT SEEKS TO RAISE ITS POISONOUS HEAD, AND SEEKS AN OPEN OPPORTUNITY OF PRACTISING ITS HELLISH PURPOSES."

It is true that the Catholic clergy of New York did their best to prevent the threatened assault on the Orangemen, since it required little foresight to perceive what must be the effect of such an outrage in arousing popular indignation against the Catholic Church in this country. Archbishop McCloskey and Governor Hoffman (far wiser than Mayor Hall) saw at a glance that sure destruction awaits here any sect or party that dares to flatter the passions of a blood-thirsty mob; and they deserve all credit for exerting themselves with energy to avert the impending catastrophe. Gov. Hoffman, in especial, has earned considerable gratitude by promptly overruling the weak and wicked order of Superintendent Kelso and Mayor Hall, and by defending at any cost the right of peaceable American citizens to assemble and parade the streets unmolested. The Orangemen should have been protected in the exercise of this right, even if it had cost a hundred thousand lives; and we think the Catholics have escaped with a very mild punishment for their unpardonable outrage. The press of the whole country are united in endorsing the action of the authorities, to which we shall owe in the future our safety from the mob.

But while the shrewder Catholic leaders tried to restrain the bloody bigotry of their followers, there can be no doubt that the more unguarded utterances of such papers as the Central Catholic betray what we should have to endure, if Catholicism should ever get the upper hand in this country. Here we see cropping out the same spirit that massacred the Protestants on the terrible day of St. Bartholomew. It is none the less dangerous for being at present kept within bounds by the fear of consequences. In such utterances as the above, the seemingly tamed tiger springs at the throat of his keeper. It is fortunate that he is caged.

To many persons, the dread of a religious war in this country is idle and preposterous. We wish we could think so too. But in such jets of flame from the volcano's crater as this riot in New York, which grew out of religious jealousies and hatreds, we see sure proof that even in American society subterranean forces still exist which may burst forth in a terrible eruption. Human nature is still the same. Keep it ignorant and submissive to priestcraft, and it will do again the old deeds of blood and shame. There is no safety for our national liberties but in Education—Education not only in the rules of arithmetic but also in the ideas of Free Religion. Christian superstition must be abolished by the sure process of intellectual enlightenment, or it will bring back all the horrors of the past. Catholic or Protestant—it matters little which; the seed of unspeakable evil is contained in the notion that men must believe in Christ in order to be saved from hell. This notion is essentially Christian. The half-detached sects of Liberal Christians confound their own rationalism with Christianity, and therefore know not how to meet the exigencies of the times. It is Free Religion and not Protestantism which must cope with Catholicism; for the Protestants are half Catholic, half "Free Religionist," and eternally oscillate and vacillate between two principles. The whole hope of America's future depends on the universal recognition of the truths and ideas of Free Religion. They alone can make Catholic Riots and Protestant Amendments to the Constitution impossible, and effectually muzzle such hyenas as the Central Catholic.

THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO.

The story of the overthrow of the empires of Mexico and Peru, and the establishment of Spanish domination upon their ruins, will always be one of the most romantic and fascinating chapters of history. Arthur Helps has told one half of this story with great skill in his "Life of Hernando Cortes." The character of the great leader of the Conquistadores, in which craft and courage, cruelty and mildness, fanaticism and unscrupulousness, were so singularly blended, is sketched with great honesty, though we think with a partiality naturally enough accounted for by the dazzling exploits of the Conqueror.

But the chief interest centres in the doomed city of Mexico, with its wonderful barbaric civilization, its swarming population, its magnificent market-place and palaces, its vast and blood-stained temple to Huitzilopochtli and Tezcatlipuk, the daily sacrifice of human victims when the great drum of serpents' skins gave the hideous signal, the dignified character and the melancholy fate of Montezuma, the fierce and desperate heroism of the Aztec warriors, and the almost total extirpation of a great and proud people that preferred death to submission. The large part played in this terrible tragedy by Christian fanaticism is incidentally, in fact unintentionally, apparent throughout the narrative; and when the common reproach is cast against Mohammedanism that it "proselytized by the sword," this book will furnish abundant evidence that it is not Christianity that can afford to cast it.

Published by G. P. Putnam and Sons, New York, and for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo. Two volumes in one, well printed on tinted paper. Price $2.00.

The Religious Free Press is a monthly paper just started at Cincinnati by Dr. Win- der. To the question of a correspondent whether there are not already "several ably conducted periodicals whose columns admit of free discussion?" the editor replies—"I know of none." It seems he has something to learn.

AUTHORITY AND DISCIPLESHIP.

The Liberal Christian of July 8, in an article on the recent exercises of "Visitation-Day" at the Cambridge Divinity School, makes some criticisms on the discourse delivered before the Alumni of the School. The tone of the criticisms is all that could be asked for. They are in excellent temper; are courteous, fair, complimentary. The address, certainly, is praised quite as much as it deserved. But in its criticisms there occur two or three singularly noteworthy remarks that are very tempting of reply. Of only one can I speak today.

The spirit and style of the discourse are especially commended, and in the midst of the paragraph on this point the writer says:—"We could not but wish that so sweet and Christ-like a spirit had always dignified the discussions of theology and philosophy."

He adds that, though the speaker protested against the recognition of the authority of Jesus as Lord and Master, he showed by the spirit of his speech that he had been "with Jesus" and "was a disciple of the disciples."

Now the confession made in this paragraph, that discussions of theology in Christendom have not generally been sweet, Christ-like, or dignified, is nothing exceptional. It is, indeed, a notorious fact that disputants in Christian theology, from the times of the early fathers until the present day, have as a rule shown themselves bitter in spirit, and undignified, ill-tempered and malignant in speech. There has been a war of theological tongues and pens, carried on with hardly less of rancor than has been exhibited in the actual wars of persecution and bloodshed. And therefore when it is claimed, as by this writer in the Liberal Christian, that whenever the opposite qualities appear in theological discussion (as in Chunder Sen and others who do not like the Christian name), they must necessarily have somehow been imbibed from Jesus, even though the authoritative mastership of Jesus be denied, the question very naturally arises, how has it come to pass that, in this long line of Christian theologians who have regarded the authority of Jesus as so absolutely necessary to religion and who have guarded their claim to discipleship to him so jealously, there has been such a woful deficiency of what is called the "sweet and Christ-like spirit?" If those who reject the specific authority of Jesus and do not claim the Christian name, must yet have derived their good temper in theological discussion from him (there being apparently, according to the opinion of such writers, no other source for it), then it seems very strange that those who have made themselves special defenders of his authority and have professed their obligations to him for everything they know of religious truth and duty, should have so generally failed to derive from him the same good temper in controversy.

It would seem, if the reasoning of the Liberal Christian writer is sound, that not to count Jesus an "authority" and not to claim "discipleship" to him may be a better method for securing the "sweet," "true," "Christ-like" spirit than to reckon him as "Lord and Master!" The facts, at least, do not appear to support the claim that it is absolutely necessary to attribute to Jesus a supernatural position and authority in order to get near to him and receive the full profit of his character.

In fact, such confessions from Christian writers point to a great truth,—namely, that those who are specially interested in defending Christianity as a supernaturally revealed scheme of religion, standing exclusive and supreme by itself, with Jesus for its divinely authorized Head, are by that very fact incapacitated, in proportion to their zeal as advocates, from manifesting a fair, courteous, and fraternal spirit towards opponents; while, on the other hand, those who hold that all religions have sprung naturally from one root, and that all of them have something saving and that none is positively damning, and that men are to be judged by character and not by opinions, will by that fact be naturally influenced towards charity and good will. And in Christian history it would not be difficult to show that those who have placed the authority of Jesus the highest, have been wont to exhibit the bitterest temper in controversies for his defence; and that fairness and sweetness of temper have come very nearly in proportion as the doctrine of his authority has been lowered, and lost its importance.

Yet it must not be supposed that those who deny the ecclesiastical authority of Jesus necessarily deny also that they have derived anything from him. For myself, I have no wish to deny my direct and indirect indebtedness to him. In no ecclesiastical sense, but in the etymological sense, I am a disciple. And I never learned from him so much as I have since I came to regard him in the light of simple humanity and even as a fallible man. So also do I love to sit at the feet of many another of the gifted sons of men. And on this particular point of fairness and sweetness towards opponents, I think it but right to say that I have learned more from such pagans as Plutarch and Epictetus than from Jesus.

W. J. P.

PIOUS FRAUDS AGAIN.

The detestable doctrine that the end justifies the means, that you may do evil that good may come, is popularly known as Jesuitism. It is generally supposed to exist only in the Romish Church; but I think Protestantism has inherited somewhat of jesuitical ethics from her ecclesiastical mother. We may deny it, and join in the cry against Loyola and his creed, but the blood of Loyola flows in our veins and the moral virus occasionally crops out in our practices. Protestantism does not publicly profess jesuitism, but it does sometimes secretly practise it. We should a priori expect it. If, as Lecky says, this criminal code was the logical result of the doctrine of damnation to the disbelieving, then, as this doctrine is common to Protestantism and Catholicism, so must be the code, the consequence of this doctrine; and as a matter of fact so it is. There is Jesuitism in Protestant Christianity. It is true there is no society of professed Jesuits, but there are jesuitical societies, that is, men who do apply this principle of Jesuitism; who are guilty of lies and frauds for Christ's sake and the sake of "our church" and "our cause." The same old lying spirit exists. It has only put on a new mask more becoming the modern taste and Protestant methods.

In mediæval ages pious frauds took the form of forged writings, blushing pictures, nodding, winking, bleeding, and speaking statues, and similar coarse, clumsy deceptions. These were enough to excite the wonder and fear, reverence and worship, of the ignorant and superstitious Christian of that day. But the nineteenth century Christian would soon detect the hidden ropes and trickery. It would not stimulate our reverence, but our risibilities, to see a statue of the Holy Virgin Mother roll up its eyes and drop a tear, or a wooden image of Christ bow its head and utter a groan. Heller, Blitz & Co., are the only modern priests of this once sacred secret art. The Church long ago sold out its whole stock of scenery and furniture and pious-fraud machinery of the old time style.

It has not, however, retired from the business. It has simply adopted new and improved machinery. The Church has its ventriloquism, its secret springs and wires and dancing puppets the same as ever, with this variation,—that instead of dancing wooden puppets it has substituted word-puppets. They will dance to any tune or any "sense" you wish. Put up that word "Savior," for instance, and pull a Princeton wire, and see it dance an orthodox jig; now pull a Cambridge wire, and it dances a Unitarian reel. It goes through a dozen changes of meaning as you pull a dozen wires. "Presto, change!" now you see it—now you don't see it. What an agile little puppet it is! It dances before Pius IX, before Calvin and Channing with approval,—like the famous coat, "large enough for any man and small enough for any boy"—fits any where or any thing.

What are such words of double, yes, quadruple meaning but "pious frauds," as used by thousands of our clergymen? The preacher uses them in one sense, when he knows the people interpret them in another sense. He deceives them; he pulls a wire that dances a lying puppet. I see these pious jugglers in all denominations. They are the lineal descendants of Loyola. They are veritable ventriloquists (speaking from the belly, not from the heart), the words they speak telling perhaps where their bodies stand but never where their minds are. In the evangelical body they juggle with such words as "Fall of Man," "Atonement," "Resurrection," "Salvation," "Hell," &c; and in liberal denominations they play fast and loose with such pious-fraud words as "Supernatural," "Miracle," "Savior," "Christian," "Disciple," and so forth—words which are used in an esoteric but understood by others in an exoteric sense. This is deception in the name of religion, and is therefore nothing more nor less than what we mean by "pious fraud."

The "University tests" and National Church tests of England are stupendous instruments of pious fraud. With proffered fellowships and livings the Church bribes the man to silence and eventually blinds him to moral distinctions. It is not yet time to tell, but at present the Dr. Lanahan trial in the Methodist denomination looks very much like an attempt to cover and commit a pious fraud. Why is it that the bishops have so persistently fought against a trial of the whole matter in the civil courts, unless it is because they fear the truth of the charges and the consequent scandal to the denomination? Does it not look as though for the reputation of "our church" they wished to deceive the people and defraud the people of the facts; and what is this but deceit in the interest of religion, or "pious fraud?" If not for Christ's sake, yet for the sake of truth let us have the facts.

The peculiar kind of pious frauds that suggested this article were those committed by the reporter of the Boston Herald during the meetings of the Free Religious Association last anniversary week. After reading his report, I think Talleyrand would have defined a reporter as one whose business it is to mis-report. To omit what was said or distort its meaning, and faithfully report every word that wasn't said, seems to have been the object of this Herald correspondent. He committed Weiss to the coarsest sensualism, made Higginson "boast of his Atheism," made Frothingham say that he "never prayed," and another speaker say that he "didn't care whether truth led him to hell or not." In fact, with one or two exceptions where he blundered into the truth, the report was a hodge-podge of the most ridiculous absurdities. It was laughable, though it was libellous. Did the reporter know better? If he had made one-tenth as many blunders, I should have set him down as an ignoramus; but as it was I felt unable to classify him. He seemed to belong to some distinct species of the genus homo, yet unknown to anthropologists—either a specimen sui generis, or else an individual illustration of Darwin's principle of reversion to some original type of moral idiots. However, there was a satisfaction in knowing that, if he did detest Free Religion and felt it no wrong to falsify it, he did believe in what he called "the holy religion of Christianity." As that saves him, he wished, no doubt, to reciprocate the service and save it by a few pious frauds. Such "honors are easy" with an easy conscience.

The Greek Fathers, says Lecky, thought that, when there was a justa causa, an untruth need not be a lie. And what was a justa causa? "Self-defence, charity, zeal for God's honor, and the like." This "just cause" among the American Fathers means often whatever is for the interest of the "holy religion of Christianity," or, more definitely, for the interest of their own sect or denomination. If I had time, I could show what was regarded as a justa causa by some of the Unitarian Fathers, and what pious frauds they committed at their last National Convention. Some other time I may do so.

We have in religion too much of that spirit of Gen. Cochrane, who said that he would "vote for the Devil, if the Devil were the regular nominee of the party." We need more of the spirit of Andrew Fletcher, who said "he would lose his life to serve his country, but would not do a base thing to save it." It is never safe to resort to wrong means to accomplish some end which seems good,—for this reason, that you know the means are wrong and you only believe the end is good. You are always surer of the means than of the end. One is near, the other is remote; one you can see clearly, the other only through a glass, darkly. Give no certainty for an uncertainty, is a safe rule. Look out, young minister, how you use pious-fraud words. You may make a puppet-show of them, and get a parish and fat salary, but they will make you a despicable Jesuit and worse than a puppet,—false-hearted as well as false-headed.

W. H. S.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

My last meetings have been in places where extremes of opinion meet. Atheism and Spiritualism are the antipodes of each other. And both are willing to be called by their own names or designations, and to co-operate in all good enterprises. And there are all shades of sentiment between these two polar extremes, varied as the temperatures of the zones or the hues of the rain-bows.

And why should it not be so? In the grand apocalyptic encounter between Gog and Magog, there can be but two sides. The battle will not even be triangular. As the abolitionists in their divisions, siftings, and purifications in 1840, drove all the sects to make common cause against them, so we who now contend in the cause of religious and spiritual emancipation shall at last find all priesthoods in deadly array against us, and united to a man.

Not "Rome versus Reason" will be the order of the conflict, as many now suppose; but priestly power and domination against the equal rights of every man and of every woman.

The pulpit will not even condescend to the platform without a struggle, as has long been apparent. But to become a plat without form, a common dead-level humanity, not only a "church without a bishop," but without any throne, principality or power,—what order of priesthood has this poor world ever seen that would not resist such innovation, even unto blood—unto "blood up to the bridles of the horses?"

Only out of years of contention and strife, which shook the underpinning stones and endangered the very existence of the vast structure itself, has "lay representation" in its Councils been reluctantly wrung from the Reverend authorities that have ruled the Methodist church since its formation. Nor is that denomination eminent above others in this respect. No tyranny ever surrenders, ever did surrender, but upon compulsion, neither in state nor church, in government nor religion. It is not many years since Rev. Dr. Woods, then one of the oldest and most honorable clergymen in New England and professor in the Andover Theological Seminary, delivered the sermon at the ordination of his son to the ministry. Referring to the dignity of the clerical office, he said:—

"Who would willingly descend from a higher to a lower employment? Who would willingly practice such self-denial as to give up, even for a time, the blessed, honorable business of a gospel minister for any other business which can be named? Other works, I admit, are honorable. But how much more honorable is this! The throne of a king is a high place; but how much higher is this pulpit!"

Before me are pages on pages of similar clerical authority, all showing, proving, that the pulpit was and is and is intended to be sovereign, supreme in power; as well in the Universal Protestant, as in the Roman Catholic church.

But I have not time nor you room for them now. It is most gratifying to find Atheism and Spiritualism and all shades of belief and unbelief between, united in many places, to oppose this one deadliest enemy to all human liberty, growth, and progress, that was ever permitted to scourge as well as rule the human race. So worthy an example cannot be too faithfully or extensively imitated.

P. P.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

SAMUEL J. MAY.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., July 10, 1871.

DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—

As you do not, as I see in the number of THE INDEX just come to hand, notice the fact of the death of Rev. Samuel J. May, I presume you had not at time of issuing that number seen the announcement in the papers. I sent you a copy of the Daily Standard of this city, giving a somewhat full and appreciative (as I think) sketch of Mr. May's life, covering his connection with the various reforms in which he was engaged.

I enclose you by this mail a copy of some resolutions passed recently by the Unitarian Society of this place; also resolutions passed last evening by the Radical Club of this city.

The loss to our city and the community is a large one and severely felt. His was a great soul, deeply devoted to human welfare, and full of high courage and resolve to do and dare for the right. He was a man of wide hospitality to truth; and, although he never quite occupied in the field of Radical thought and Free Religion the attitude that seems to us the advanced and fitting one, yet he was very generous in his friendship for those whom, differing as they might from him in that regard, he yet regarded as genuinely devoted to truth and human welfare. He was also a growing man, and especially in his more recent utterances took emphatic ground for freedom and the full rights of the soul in matters of religious as all other thought. Especially was this the case in the late Convention (Liberal Christian) at Utica. He bore himself very admirably in that Convention, and I am sure from what I saw of him then and have since seen of him that he was rapidly coming to stand on the ground of the largest catholicity of faith.

So generous a nature could never be narrow or intolerant. So candid and earnest a mind must of necessity come more and more clearly to see the broad truth, in its transcendent superiority over all institutions, Bibles, dispensations, &c.; and what he saw he had the manly courage freely to say.

With a deeper consecration, a warmer zeal, a more unbending purpose, may we each of us go forward to the work which is still left so far from accomplished.

Yours fraternally,

CHAS. D. B. MILLS.

[We append the resolutions enclosed by Mr. Mills, which express no more of respect and honor than is warranted by the strictest regard for truth. In these heart-felt tributes of admiration and love for one of the purest and noblest men we have ever been privileged to know, we most sincerely join.—Ed.]

MEETING OF THE MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH OF THE MESSIAH.

A very largely attended meeting of the members of the Church of the Messiah and of that Society, was held Monday evening, to take action in regard to the death of the late Samuel J. May.

Dr. Lyman Clary was called to the chair, and Mr. P. H. Egan was made Secretary.

Mr. C. D. B. Mills moved the appointment of a committee of three to draft resolutions, and the motion being carried, the Chair appointed Messrs. C. D. B. Mills, D. P. Phelps and P. H. Egan as such committee.

The committee subsequently reported the following series of resolutions:—

Resolved, That in the death of Samuel J. May our Society has lost from its midst a widely known, greatly gifted and loved religious teacher; one endeared to us by many and most tender associations, who was, through years reaching back to the very beginnings of our existence as a religious society, its faithful, most affectionate and devoted pastor, and who has laid us all under a debt never to be repaid but always to be most gratefully and tenderly remembered.

Resolved, That in his death our community has lost one of the most public spirited, philanthropic and generously useful citizens, magnanimous and self-sacrificing without end—and humanity itself the world over has lost a warm and untiring friend. Of him it may be truly said, He was brother to all mankind.

Resolved, That the exalted virtues of our departed friend, so marked, so bounteous and so rare, deserve well to be celebrated and kept in perpetual record, and we rejoice that we may hold and commend these as the legacy he has left us, inestimably rich and precious, the imperishable possession and sacrament to be appropriated for quickening, before which all may well feel incited to seek to attain something of that high self-sacrifice and untiring devotion to human kind for which he was distinguished.

Resolved That we tender our warm sympathies to the stricken family, the descendants and all the kindred of our brother, invoking for them the kind consolations and supports of Heaven in this hour of sorrow, and we point them not without joy to the assurance that a soul that has wrought so faithfully and signally well, has beyond peradventure gone to its large reward.

Resolved, That we hereby authorize and instruct the trustees of this society, in conjunction with a committee of three, to be appointed to act in concert with them, to cause to be placed in the wall of the church a tablet suitably inscribed to the name and memory of Mr. May.

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed in behalf of our society to take, after conferring with the family of the deceased, and in consonance with their wishes, such steps as may be deemed requisite for providing for the funeral services.

THE RADICAL CLUB—ITS MEMORIAL RESOLUTIONS.

The following memorial resolutions relating to the late Samuel J. May, were unanimously passed by the Radical Club last evening, after short, earnest and feeling addresses in relation to the life and character of the deceased, by C. A. Hammond, Geo. L. Maynard, H. L. Green, Rev. A. F. Bailey, of Canastota, Lucy N. Coleman, E. B. Waldo, Rev. H. P. Crozier, of Brooklyn, James L. Bagg, and C. D. B. Mills. It was voted that the resolutions be presented to the friends of the deceased and published in the Syracuse city and the Radical papers of the country:—

Resolved, That the Radical Club recognize Samuel J. May as one of its truest friends, inasmuch as the vital principle upon which the club is founded, viz., the seeking after truth both in the knowing and the doing, formed the ground-work of his life; and was illustrated by such radical work as he performed in preaching Unitarianism when to be called a Unitarian was to be called a heretic; and farther, in opening his pulpit to Theodore Parker, that heretic of heretics, whom most of his Unitarian brethren disowned; in preaching the abolition of American slavery when to be an abolitionist was to be called a traitor; in preaching equal rights for women when woman rights were held to be the veriest figment of folly and nonsense; and in being always and everywhere the friend and spokesman of the down-trodden and the oppressed and him that had none to help him.

Resolved, That our lately departed friend and brother, by his high qualities of mind and especially of heart, his great catholic character, his broad devotion to all things excellent and worthy in life, belongs of right most of all to humanity, and while we recognize that he was to the end a true and honored member of the liberal denomination of his choice, we deem still that he was more intimately and really a member of the church universal of mankind, the brotherhood of all love of truth, of virtue and of excellence, and we rejoice to point to his frequently-expressed sympathy in our city with the cause of radical inquiry, and especially to his most recent public utterances, as showing that he was a friend to the largest liberty of thought, and fast coming to be in spirit identified with entire freedom in religion, and the broadest catholicity, not ecclesiastical nor simply Christian, but human, in faith.

FROM AN ILLINOIS FARM.

CASTLETON, Ill., May 26, 1871.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

Pardon me for again intruding upon your already over-taxed time, in thus addressing to you such illegible lines as these; for my fingers are far more accustomed, at this time of the year, to the plough-handle than the pen; nevertheless, I cannot resist the temptation to send you a word,—the expression of my own heart's approval of both your action and word, as they come to me through the columns of THE INDEX, being, as they are, part and parcel of my own ideas, soul of soul, spirit of spirit.

How unusual it is for farmers to express themselves religiously—and I might add, perhaps, and with justness too, how unusual it is for them to give the subject that seriousness of thought which, even without the expression, would be of credit to themselves! It would save them many a Sunday journey to church, where they are taught to believe that Christ did it all, "the work is finished," and all they now have to do is to hear, believe, accept, and be saved. No wonder is it to me that we have so many babes in thought and infants in life, who have not yet learned to trust to their own knees for support, and are to-day creeping instead of walking upright, as God has intended every man should.

I say it is unusual for us farmers to give expression to our religious views; and, even were they so disposed, I infer that their testimony would hardly be accepted or listened to, unless it happened to please the most of mankind,—unless their testimony came out from between the covers of the Bible. Let him look anywhere else for proof; let him investigate Nature, and pay reverence to Reason; let him look within as well as without for truth, and he is soon set down as an "infidel," a "Deist," and is not to be listened to.

If any man ever expects to go to Heaven, and depends upon this "come-easy, go-easy" system of the churches, certain am I that such a man is cheating himself. The artificial is all outside of God's kingdom; conservatism has no abiding-place within the limits of Divine Law.

This is the testimony I am able to offer; reject it who will, yet I am confident that with men it will pass for all it is worth.

And now a word on "The Warmth of Free Religion," your essays on which I was pleased to see in the pages of THE INDEX.

Free Religion has never been a stranger to me. It has been my conviction from my youth upward, from the time that I went forth to do battle and gain a foothold in the world, that we may continually ascent into higher altitudes of life, and thus gain a more extensive view as the fields below continue to broaden out before our gaze. To our inward life Reason performs the same office that the sun is performing for the earth each day of its existence. Man without Reason would be a world without Light. This comparison gives us a true picture of that individual's mind who would attempt to make compromise between Reason and the Bible, the one ever obscuring the other, and who thus dwells betwixt day and night. Accepting twilight, doing homage to the moon instead of the sun, can such a man grow? Is there any half-way house where one can say to himself—"I am far enough?" If so, then is Christianity a blessing; if so, then is ignorance a virtue.

But I must close. Pardon me if I have carried this to a greater length than would be acceptable, and don't forget to send me five copies of THE INDEX containing your Essay on "The Warmth of Free Religion," for which find enclosed the necessary change.

Yours most truly,

C. W. NEWTON.

GOD AND MAN.

WELLSVILLE, Kansas, June 6.

From time immemorial man has had a god or gods. If we but reflect a moment, we shall readily see that the God of a people is a fair index to its character.

Of course all persons are to some extent acquainted with ancient Mythology. People are generally aware that the sun, moon, and various other objects have been regarded as gods.

We always find that, as a people progress, the character of their God is exalted. Thus the Egyptians could very appropriately worship the serpent. We find that people represent their God as having the same general attributes as themselves.

When a Christian speaks of God, he has reference to a Being of monstrous and wonderful disposition,—such a God as a truly enlightened person could not worship or even respect.

If we are observant of the "signs of the times," we shall quite readily see that old notions of God are dying out. We find a great number of liberal Christians as well as a large and increasing number of free thinkers. We find that in the churches the people are leaving the old land-marks. The horrible doctrine of eternal hell-fire is fast becoming extinct. All these things show that we are progressing. Yet we have a great work to do.

There is a great deal of superstition in existence in the land, but with the increase of education and knowledge, it will die out.

Let us be encouraged. Right and Truth will prevail.

Phi Pi.

THE CONTINUED EXISTENCE OF MIND AFTER DEATH.

WARREN, O., July 9, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—In reading the article of Mr. Einstein and your comments, in the last INDEX, I was reminded of a discussion or argument had by me with an honest Atheist more than thirty years ago. He insisted it was irrational and absurd to assume, or assert, the continued existence of mind after death. Of course he could not maintain the affirmative of that proposition. In reply to his inviting me to show the converse (that mind continued to exist after death), I declined, but ventured to state an affirmative proposition, thus:

There is more evidence for, than against, the proposition that mind continues to exist after the dissolution of its physical organism.

It then seemed certain to me, however doubtful to my friend and opponent, that I sustained my proposition. Not by positive proof, which could not then be adduced, but by stronger evidence than the negative afforded. My course of reasoning was something like this:

All we know of matter or mind is its phenomena. We have no knowledge of the essence of either.

By the word matter we understand that essence having certain properties and qualities, as gravity, divisibility, figure, color, &c., obvious to our senses.

By the word mind, we understand that essence having certain properties and qualities, as thinking, willing, remembering, &c., obvious only to our understanding and consciousness—an entirely different class of phenomena from that referable to matter.

The presumption is, that whatever is will continue to be. It is only from evidence derived from analogy that we form other conclusions. We have no such evidence in regard to the non-existence of mind. Its phenomena are here only manifested through its physical organism. At the dissolution of that, it is true we can not take cognizance of the phenomena. The same is true of the phenomena, or the secondary qualities, of matter; and yet of matter the primary properties being obvious to our external senses, as those of mind are not, we are thereby able to discern its continued existence after its apparent destruction. But the primary phenomena of mind, even, not being obvious to our external senses, can not, as in the case of matter, be observed, even if self-existent.

That we do not take cognizance of the phenomena of mind after the dissolution of its organism, therefore, proves nothing. If it ceases to exist, we of course could not cognize it; and even if it continues to exist, we can not. The fact, therefore, of our not having cognizance of the phenomena, no more proves its non-existence than the flight of the bird from its cage out of sight proves its non-existence. In both cases alike, we can only say that we can not longer take cognizance.

But in the case of matter which to the superficial observer has ceased to exist, we find a change, but still continued, unimpaired existence. Its essence remains. Why not, from analogy, expect the same of mind? Especially until in some one instance destructibility shall be shown to be a law, or to exist in the economy of Nature.

The fore-going habit of reasoning, without anticipating or expecting any other evidence, prevented my positive disbelief of the immortality of mind.

I have since then had evidence upon the question of the continued existence of mind, akin to that of the philosopher as to that of matter, derived by chemical experiments. Without attaching any particular importance to verbal communications purporting to come through spirit mediums from the deceased, as to what they communicate, some fifteen years ago, by a patient, scrutinizing investigation under favorable circumstances, commencing with the expectation of being able to explain satisfactorily the phenomena, I satisfied myself, and could satisfy any candid mind, I think, of the important fact that mind still exists after the dissolution of its organism.

Very truly, &c.,

MILTON SUTLIFF.

"Yes, my Jesus, a happy life and a happy death are in thy power to give; for thou hast made an end of sin and conquered death; thou hast drunk up all my hell. What can I render? Only my whole self, with all I have and am. It is not worth the picking up, but love puts a value upon its object."

The Christian at Work prints the above under the head of "Golden Grains." Of which we have to say that, if they be gold, we should like to know what the Christian at Work calls dross. No; there is no gold in such brainless sentimentalism! All such "soft talk" to Jesus and of Jesus is disgusting to men of good sense and sound faith, and injurious to Christ and Christianity. And into such shameful twaddle Orthodoxy is descending. If we did not know something of Jesus Christ better and nobler than such stuff indicates, it would sicken us of him straightway and forever.

Just think, a moment, what the Christ must be in the mind of the man who authorized the above dribble. Jesus is valued for so much because he makes this simpleton "happy in life and death, makes an end of his sin, conquers death, and drinks up all his hell." "Drink up all my hell!" No; Jesus is not in the business of drinking up the hell of such a conceited, selfish creature. "What can I render?" Sure enough. Then comes the old Orthodox answer, "Only my whole self, with all I have and am." This, he says, "is not worth picking up." And so do we. And we suspect Christ will also agree with him.—Christian Radical.

DEATH, the LAST RELIEVING OFFICER, has put his cold, icy hand upon Mr. Steer's mother-in-law, Mrs. Elizabeth Hill, who died on the 28th of February, at her lodgings at John street, Ordnance-place, Chatham. She was like unto the deceased Mrs. Elizabeth Steer, a Christian woman, who died at her deceased rich brother's smart house, No 12, Buckwell street, Plymouth, Devon, whose end was peace; and the deceased Mrs. Hill wished that the money in Rochester Savings' Bank, &c., should be equally divided between her two sons and one daughter, Charlotte Steer. All true sympathizers belonging to the Apostolic Church, of which Mrs. Hill was a member for more than twenty years, may visit MR. STEER at his Second-hand Boot and Shoe Establishment, 183, HIGH STREET, CHATHAM, Kent.

[The above curious advertisement we cut from the Chatham (England) Observer, of March 11, 1871.—Ed.]

A communication signed "A Poor Girl" appears in a Boston paper as follows: "I read in Thursday's paper of a scamp who insulted a lady on the street: but what think you of some of our most prominent merchants who, when poor girls apply for work, unjustly insult them? I went to a firm not long ago and asked for work. The pay, the gentleman said, was from four to six dollars a week. I could not work for that. Well, said he, I will give you twenty and you need not work at all. Again, a young girl went into a store on Temple Place, applying for a situation as saleswoman. She was informed that the pay was from six to seven dollars a week, but she must dress better. 'How can I,' she said, 'for that and pay my board?' 'O, we don't expect you to; you must get your clothes outside as other girls do,' was the insulting reply. Now, I ask, how are girls to make an honest living for such pay? What wonder that there are so many fallen ones?"

The "Free Sunday Association," in order to bring into discredit the recent prosecutions in London for Sunday trading, have applied before the Lord Mayor for a summons against his State coachman for breaking the Sabbath, "for that, on Sunday, the 28th of May, he did, in defiance of the Act 29 Charles II., pursue his ordinary calling by driving the Lord Mayor in his State carriage from the Mansion House to St Paul's Cathedral." Of course the application was refused, but it brings out strongly the need of having the law properly settled, and not left to the factions and unregulated appeal to an almost obsolete enactment.—Christian Register.

Gen. Sherman, by strategy, has arrested some Arizona Indians, who called to see him, on a charge of massacre of teamsters; but from the General's own statement there is not one particle of evidence that would warrant the arrest of the men in a well-ordered community.—Boston Commonwealth.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WANTED—A SITUATION. The subscriber, who has had several years experience in teaching such studies as are generally pursued at Massachusetts High Schools, and also in giving piano-forte lessons, would accept a moderate compensation at a place where Bible reading is not required in school, and where no attempt would be made to interfere with his religious convictions or with the management of his school. Address A. D. JACKSON, care of SAMUEL JACKSON, JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS. 78-83

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. F. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf.

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 684 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($30 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. It is the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Roston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE.

BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,

Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.

D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is especially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on the "RELIGIONS OF CHINA," a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Samaj;" also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAYER, LUCY STONE, and others.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,
The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.
Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.

"It Injures Our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?
Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.

These four for 10 cents.
Address

CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Publisher & Bookseller,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

The Origin of Species, By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
The Descent of Man, By DARWIN, 2 vols, each.... 2 00
Wallace on Natural Selection, (London)..... 2 00
Mivart on the Genesis of Species...... 1 00
Man's Place in Nature, By HUXLEY..... 1 25
Origin of Species, By HUXLEY..... 1 00
Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condition of Man, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
The Earthward Pilgrimage, By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
History of European Morals, from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols, 8vo..... 6 00
Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
Chips from a German Workshop, By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
The Old Roman World, By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
Short Studies on Great Subjects, By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE..... 1 50
Lecture on Calvinism, By the same..... 75
The Heavens, An illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
Words and their Uses, By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
Steps of Belief, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
Nature and Life, By Rev. ROBERT COLLYER..... 1 50
Sartor Resartus, By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edition..... 90
The Choice of Books, Same..... 75
Essays of Elia, By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
Thoughts about Art, By PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON..... 2 00
Words of Weight on the Woman Question, (London)..... 2 25
The Friendships of Woman, By W. R. ALGER..... 2 00
A Day by the Fire, LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
Sanctum Sanctorum, THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
Carlyle's Essays, Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
Among My Books, By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 2 vols..... 5 00
Society and Solitude, By the same..... 2 00
Topics of the Times, By JAMES PARTON..... 3 00
Success and its Conditions, By E. P. WHIPPLE... 1 50
Literature and Life, By same..... 1 50
Tablets, By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
Companions of My Solitude, By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
Organization in Daily Life, Same..... 1 50
Realism, By the same..... 1 50
War and Culture, By same..... 1 50
Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms, By same... 1 25
Ten Great Religions, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
Light and Electricity, By TYNDALL..... 1 25
Our Girls, By DIO LEWIS..... 1 50
Studies in Literature, By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read,— NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
Principles of Psychology, By HERBERT SPENCER..... 2 00
American Religion, By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
Fragments of Science For Unscientific People, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Light Science For Leisure Hours, By R. A. PROCTOR... 3 00
Handbook Of Legendary And Mythological Art, By Mrs. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 3 50
Hereditary Genius—its Laws and Consequences, By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
The Races of The Old World, By CHAS. L. BRACE..... 2 00
Little Women, By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
Wallace's Review Of Darwin's Descent Of Man, PAPER..... 25
Heat as a Mode of Motion, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Buechner on Force and Matter, (London Print).... 3 75
Essays, By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE..... 1 00
Aristotle's Ethics, (Bohn's Edition)..... 2 00
France before Europe, By MICHELET..... 1 00
Roman Imperialism and Other Essays, By J. R. SEELEY. Author of "Ecce Homo"..... 1 50
The Republic of Plato..... 1 25
The Book of Golden Thoughts, By HENRY ATWELL... 1 25
Colton's Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words..... 1 25
Consolations of Travel, or The Last Days of a Philosopher, By SIR HUMPHREY DAVY..... 1 50
The Poetical Works of HOOD, WORDSWORTH, SHELLEY, KEATS, MOORE, SCOTT, BYRON, full gilt, and on tinted paper, each only..... 1 75

Address,

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Publisher and Bookseller.

Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

Lecky's History of European Morals, 2 vols.....$6.00

Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols.....5.00

Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols.....5.00

Weiss's Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, 2 volumes.....6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870 (price $2.50). Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

Darwin's Origin of Species, price.....$2.00

Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price.....2.00

Essays in Criticism, by Matthew Arnold, price.....2.00

Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, with portrait, price.....2.00

Any volume of the writings of Theodore Parker or Henry D. Thoreau, each.....2.00

On the Heights, Auerbach.....2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.

For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.

For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.

For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.

For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies

OR

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones.....	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. R. S. D.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Orator on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Beemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	47
Sunday—its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 30.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JULY 29, 1871.

WHOLE No. 83.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE SO-CALLED "REFORMATION."

THE BATTLE BUT PARTIALLY FOUGHT—THE GREAT STRUGGLE YET TO COME—THE IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT BETWEEN ABSOLUTISM AND FREEDOM.

BY S. B. M'CRACKEN.

It is requisite to a fair understanding of the New York riot not to lose sight of facts. We cannot justly characterize the relations between the Hibernians and the Orangemen by the distinctive terms of Catholic and Protestant. It is true that in the evolution of parties in Ireland the Ribbonmen were largely, not wholly Catholic; while the Orangemen were Protestant. But the parties were thus drawn from the religious predilections of their chiefs and were local to Great Britain, although the wars which unseated the Stuarts in the direct line, and installed the Prince of Orange and his consort of the royal blood, affected the continental powers for the time being to a greater or less degree. But properly speaking, the division is purely local; and although the Orangemen and Ribbonmen, while inhabiting the soil of Ireland, may cherish the ancient feud if they choose, they ought to leave it behind them when they embark for a land which offers to both not only protection, but equal privileges in commerce and industry, and an equal voice in the affairs of the government.

It is an easy matter, however, to say what might be, or ought to be; but saying does not alter the fact. Men do not gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles. The leopard does not at once change his spots, either by a change of residence or an effort of the will. The orange produces after its kind equally in Asia and America, and the shamrock grows the same fibre whether in Irish or American soil.

In one sense, therefore, it would be doing the Catholic Church—that great Church whose arms not only enfold all Christendom, but whose extremities reach to the remotest parts of the earth—the most grievous injustice to hold it responsible for the lawless acts of the Hibernians in New York. And if any are so disposed, they should not forget that the Church, by its organic and moral power, used its most earnest efforts to prevent such lawlessness. Equally unjust would it be to hold Protestant Christendom responsible for any lawlessness that the Orangemen might commit.

It is a trite but true saying, that "blood will tell," and while a street fight between a few persons who have been members of opposing factions in another country would ordinarily be of little importance in itself, it unfortunately in this case has a significance that is portentous of serious consequences. The entire population of our own country is made up of persons who have come remotely or immediately from Europe—the same Europe which was, but yesterday almost, the scene of a protracted, fierce, and relentless religious war, the parties to which were the Catholic and the Protestant. While we may disagree among ourselves over temporary political divisions, we nevertheless cherish and perpetuate those antagonisms that deluged Europe in blood during portions of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; and which have shown themselves in various forms since. Those persons who suppose that the struggle of the so-called Reformation ceased with the treaty of Westphalia or with the battle of the Boyne, take but a limited view of things. Great results are not wrought out in a day. A single person may go to war on his own hook, and get satisfactorily whipped in a few minutes. A small company of men may begin and accomplish a campaign in a few hours. But a large army requires more time in its organization, appointments and movements. All organic action works from minor to major. Human history is no exception. A neighborhood broil, a quarrel between small states, or a war between great nations growing out of political causes merely, may be brought to an issue in a very short time. But here is a struggle between two forces for the mastery of the world; and if a comparative peace has supervened since their earlier battles, it is no evidence that the struggle is at an end. The fact that neither party is vanquished, is proof that the struggle is not ended; and the further fact that each party is seeking to strengthen its position, is evidence of the intention of each to renew the struggle in some form.

The more prudent of both parties would prefer to conduct the campaign by peaceful means. But they did not create the contending forces nor can they control them. These lawless outbreaks come of necessity, but they serve to inflame the whole body of either party, and to prepare it for a more general contest. They are simply the skirmishes preparatory of the pitched battle. The intellectual power of both parties would prefer strategy and policy to physical force. Hence the Catholic party becomes especially influential in the great political centres, and it is asserted that in the city of New York alone it has secured appropriations in a single year amounting to near half a million dollars, in aid of its convents, asylums, and schools, and valuable donations of property in other forms.

It is not always easy to determine which party is the aggressor. The Protestant will charge that the Catholic is aggressive. But if he is so, the Protestant meets him foot to foot, and hand to hand. If smitten on one cheek, the Protestant does not always proffer the other. On the contrary, he opposes force to force. He establishes and controls a comprehensive public school system, and enacts a law compelling children to attend the schools, and to study the books which he prescribes. He establishes colleges and universities himself, and he usurps control of those that are founded by the public munificence. He secures official recognition in many ways, where the Catholic either does not offer himself or would not be recognized if he did. He has once, at least, in this country attempted to establish a political party based on opposition to Catholicism. He is even now claiming that the religious system which he represents is the established religion of the country by descent and inheritance, and by common practice; and to make assurance doubly sure, he is asking an Amendment to the Federal Constitution recognizing the fact.

It will no doubt be claimed that these acts and things are all peaceful and civil, and form no excuse for the lawless attack by the Irish Catholics upon the Orangemen. Most true. But yet there is an old adage about "pot and kettle" that it may be well occasionally to recur to. With the intention of being wholly impartial, we would not state which party committed the first act of lawlessness in this country, if we knew; but memory leads us back to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Louisville, where, within the past thirty years at least, the smouldering ruins of Catholic churches and the lawless killing of Catholic persons attest the tender mercies of partisan Protestantism. If the action of the Irishmen in New York on Wednesday was an attack upon civil and religious liberty, it had these illustrious examples as precedents. It may be said that the places named have long been famous as focal points of mob rule, especially while they were the border land between slavery and freedom; and that Protestantism, which is the more especial representative of law and order as they exist in New England and the Middle States, should not be held responsible for the outrages. Without controversy on this point, we believe that the annals of Massachusetts will disclose the sacking of at least one convent within the past quarter of a century, if they do not show the hanging of a single witch or Quaker.

[The late Dr. Shattuck, of Boston, bequeathed five hundred dollars to the Catholic Bishop towards rebuilding the Ursuline Convent burned by an anti-Catholic mob in Somerville, "as my contribution towards rectifying a great public wrong." We do not remember the exact date of the outrage, but believe it to have occurred more than twenty-five years ago.—Ed.]

Both parties are wrong. Each deems itself Divinely appointed to rule, and in their struggle for supremacy they must come into violent collision. This comes from the nature of things, and neither party is criminally in fault. The struggle for supremacy between these two wings of the Church must bring with it in the future more terrible wars than it has in the past. But what is to be gained by the triumph of one or the other party? It would be simply exchanging one despotism for another. The Protestant countries of Europe are perhaps more advanced in intelligence and in the arts than the Catholic countries are; but if so, it is because of their nearer approach to a pure rationalism and entire religious freedom. And by the same reasoning it may be held that, if our own country has advantages over Europe, it is because here, in theory at least, entire religious freedom prevails.

This brings us to state that the battle between freedom and its opposite was but partially fought during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It is to be renewed by the original parties to it, but these will eventually become but one party, while Rationalism will be the other. Protestantism is simply the stepping-stone to Rationalism; it is the solvent from which Rationalism is being precipitated. Or to state the proposition in another form, the so-called Reformation was but the incipient manifestation of Rationalism. The underlying forces to the "irrepressible conflict" are Absolutism and Individualism, or authority and freedom of personal action; or, as some will have it, Rome and Reason. Protestantism is the middle ground between these two forces. The Protestant who is a representative of the authoritative idea,—that is, who maintains his divine right to prescribe to others what they shall believe and how they shall act,—is an Absolutist, and belongs to Rome; while he who has progressed so far as to recognize the right of individual action in every person, is a Rationalist, and must be found on the side of Reason. Rome represents one extreme, Reason the other—and Protestantism is simply the womb from which Reason is born. Is it at all reasonable to presume that the world—that is, the small portion of it comprehended by Christendom—is to pass from one dispensation to another, from the dispensation of Absolutism to the dispensation of Individualism, from the government aggregate to the government particular, from Rome to Reason,—is it reasonable to suppose that we are to pass this crisis without a struggle? The period of anti-Papal ferment, ending with the so-called Reformation, was the period of impregnation; the truce of three hundred years is but a brief gestation for so great a birth; the perils of parturition are yet to come.

Protestantism fails to apprehend the situation; for, while it denounces the outrage of Wednesday as an attack upon religious liberty, it appeals, not to the just and liberty-loving sentiment of all parties and sects to rally in the formation of a party in opposition to the underlying force from which the outrage sprung, but to Protestantism alone, as is evidenced by the following brief appeal, which it seems was being circulated in various parts of the country simultaneously on the same day on which the New York riot occurred:—

"In view of recent and probable future events, the immediate organization of a society to be known as 'The Protestant League of America,' headquarters in New York City, with affiliated societies throughout the United States, is recommended. For this purpose and properly to consider the immediate event that gives rise to this suggestion, let public meetings be called at once in this city and elsewhere. The claims of Roman Catholicism are incompatible with civil and religious liberty."

If it be true that Catholicism is "incompatible with civil and religious liberty," it would be difficult to discover wherein Protestantism, in principle at least, is less so; for the one, no less than the other, maintains a union of Church and State wherever it is paramount, and this the latter is now seeking to establish in this country.

Protestantism is really a more dangerous foe to freedom than Catholicism. The latter is, of itself, a decaying institution. The former, also, is in many respects a failure. But, placed between two fires—between Rome on one hand and Rationalism on the other—its particles may be made to adhere by external pressure, if not by mutual attraction. Christianity, during the first three centuries and up to the time it was adopted by the Emperor Constantine, was nebulous, and was divided into as many sects as it is at this day. When, however, it was made a State religion, it became unitized through the Council of Nice, for without unification it could not become authoritative. Should our Protestant sects gravitate together in a political organization, aspiring of necessity to civil power, the necessity of creedal unity will follow, and a new Nicene Council may be convoked to declare authoritatively what men shall believe. This would simply be Rome in a new guise; but it would be at the expense of both fraud and larceny, for it would be stealing the mantle of St. Peter and seeking so to disguise it by repairs and alterations that it should not be recognized.

We have unconsciously drifted somewhat away from the matter directly in hand. In the present phase of the "irrepressible conflict," Protestantism is really the aggressive force. A few Irish Catholics in New York have, it is true, committed a crime. That is simply an isolated fact of no great significance in itself. The heavy undertow of the campaign sets in a different direction. Protestantism opposes itself about equally to Catholicism and Liberalism or Rationalism, and is actively arranging its campaign against both. Its first assault will probably be on Catholicism, as the only tangible point of attack, against which the strongest force can be rallied, because it has prepared the way for it by centuries of inflammatory preaching. Rationalism, while it should withdraw and concentrate itself to act effectively and distinctively, would prudently ally itself with the weaker party; for, after the two wings of Christendom have fought each other to a conclusion, Rationalism must fight the victor. While all religions, as societary institutions, should be respected and protected, the only security for liberty of conscience lies in resisting all attempts of any particular system, under whatever guise, to en throne itself in civil power. DETROIT, July 15, 1871.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE WOMAN QUESTION: THE KERNEL IN THE SHELL.

It is a very strange fact that eighteen hundred years after the death of Jesus of Nazareth, the Founder of the Christian religion, there should be such a difference of opinion as to his personal character, as to the theological meaning and import of Christianity, and especially as to the principles in this religion which have produced, as is claimed, our modern type of civilization. There are no such disputes as to the character of Mohammed, and the meaning of the Koran; nor of the sacred writings of the Jews, and the other great sects of the universal religion. The Boston Radicals have not yet struck the difference between the indebtedness of modern civilization to Christianity, and Christianity to modern civilization. It still remains not only an interesting but important question—what is in the Christian religion that has given such a career of prosperity to the Western nations which have adopted it?

It seems that as the human body is a theatre of conflict between the principles of health and disease in which the strongest tendency ultimately rides down the weakest, and carries the day after, perhaps, a long and dubious battle, so also in society and in organization, political or ecclesiastical. The self-evident truths of our Declaration of Independence were the vital principles in the body politic which contended half a century with the scrofula and small-pox engendered by Slavery. In 1862 we were so far gone, like the "sick man" of Turkey, that England and France proposed to themselves to administer on the estate. But the latent vital principle, being after all the strongest, recuperated by copious blood-letting, and we sloughed off the disease and became healthy.

Now admitting that race and country have done much for the development of civilization, there is something in Christianity which makes us all proud of being Christians in contradistinction to Buddhists or Mohammedans. What is it? I think it is the fact that, by equalizing the condition of Women as much as it has, it has given us Society. The old religions were practically, and comparatively, solitary. The Chinese religion is eminently so. Even Judaism in its worship did not honor woman as woman. The Anna Dickinsons and Susan Anthonys and Mrs. Stantons, who had ability and self-confidence enough to be prophetesses, were heard and had influence; for such women in all ages and countries have been, and will be, and ought to be, heard and heeded. But it is the glory of Christianity, even as dimly reflected by the Church, that it teaches the equality of souls, and places woman as salvabile, on the same level as man.

When we open the New Testament we find, in regard to woman's place in the world, diametrically opposite principles; just like the antagonistic tendencies of health and disease in the human body. To these principles, as having modified the laws and customs of mankind for many centuries, is due the contradictory and anomalous condition of woman, as a wife and a member of society.

I. Jesus, in his teachings and example, was unquestionably the friend of woman. He loved, of course with Platonic affection, Martha and Mary. He conversed like a brother with the Samaritan woman, evincing the kindest consideration for her sex and condition, thus disregarding entirely the national prejudice. As to the woman taken in adultery, he did not propose to pile faggots round her and burn her to death; but after a scorching reproof to her accusers, said—"Woman, go, and sin no more." No wonder that sweet saint, Mrs. Child (sero redeat in calum!), said, that she could never read this passage in the New Testament without weeping. When Jesus came to speak of marriage, this is his language:—"For this cause shall a man leave his father, and cleave unto his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh." But the marriage laws of civilized States have made the woman a mere appendage to man. She leaves her father and mother, and her family name, and her individuality, and brings her fortune to her husband, and becomes merged into his being. She is compelled to assume a position of helplessness and of servitude to her husband's wishes, the very opposite to what Jesus inculcated, and then sees the legal outrage baptized as Christian marriage! Although it mangles the cheek of every decent man with shame, it cannot be denied that the Anglo-Saxon idea of a wife is that she is property, in her person, her affections, and her estate, and belongs to her husband.

II. Paul, however, who has done much more to give nominal Christianity its characteristics than Jesus himself, in speaking on the subject of marriage, gives this definition of it in 1 Cor. 7, 2:—"Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband." It is hard for a man—what must it be for a woman?—to refrain from an expression of anger and disgust at this idea of marriage. To be sure it is the very basis of the Church law, and the State law: but oh how low, how unworthy of God, and of man, the child of God! If there is anything pure or ennobling and glorious on earth, it is the self-sacrificing love which man cherishes to woman. It is the blending of souls, the oneness of spirit and intellect which results in marriage, and knows no divorce. Between two persons thus really married, although no priest or civil magistrate may have officiated on the occasion, there is a reciprocal, heavenly influence, which makes them companions, mates, whose happiness consists in fellowship and the amenities suggested by love, confidence, respect. But the "inspired apostle," who, from all accounts, knew about as much of a woman's love as he did of the fauna and flora of the planet Neptune, informs us, and we have been taught to believe that he expressed the will of God, that the design of marriage is simply to prevent fornication! God only knows the havoc that this low idea of the marital relation has had on human happiness, and especially in causing the degradation of woman, during the long ages when the Church controlled the State, and modified its legislation on this subject. Is it any wonder that the Penitentiaries are full of the children begotten, born, and nursed, under this conception of marriage?

It may be said in excuse for Paul, though at the expense of the cardinal doctrine of Protestantism (the plenary and infallible inspiration of the Scriptures), that he gave this wretched definition of marriage, and urgently recommended celibacy to all the Christians that could practise it, because he expected the return to earth of the Lord Jesus, in the clouds of heaven, as Judge of quick and dead, at any moment; and that they should eschew every thing that would draw away their attention from that grand forth-coming event. But the event never having yet taken place, eighteen hundred years of mischief have been the result of the mistake, and the wrong teaching it occasioned.

The twin sentiment to this, as fixing the place of woman in the Church, is stated in 1 Cor. 14, 34:—"Let your women keep silence in the churches; for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home; for it is a shame for women to speak in the church." The pious women of our times, to save the doctrine of their creeds that the Bible is the rule of faith and practise, put this passage to the rack to make it accord with the teachings and example of Jesus; but there it stands in all its nakedness, not alone; for the same "inspired apostle," as the clergy always call him, says, in his epistle to Timothy, 2, 11:—"Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence." And then he gives this reason for the rule, at which modern science arches its proud brows,—"for Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in the transgression." Every one can see, without any comment on these passages from the writings of Paul, how it has happened that, although God has endowed woman pre-eminently with qualifications to be a religious and moral teacher, she has been forced to keep silence in the Church, and listen to the inane babblings of ordained masculine stupidity. Think of such a woman as Emma Hardinge, or Lucretia Mott, or Mrs. Stanton, keeping silence in the church, while the Rev. Dr. Dryasdust, or the Rev. Dr. Creamcheese, grinds out for the twentieth time his doleful jeremiads in the ears of a sleeping congregation! Good Patience!

III. But it is delightful to leave the low and murky region of these ideas, and turn to those principles which, on account of their loftiness, inspire us with hope and vigor. Paul made three utterances which were Christian; that is, which harmonized with the teachings of Jesus. And to these, I think, is due the fact, that woman in Europe and America is an essential, and almost equal, element in forming what we call Society; for let it be always remembered that there can be no such thing as society in the absence of either sex.

In Galatians 3, 28, the apostle (I will admit he is inspired now) says:—"There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." Hence women were members of the Christian Church, standing on the same platform with men as heirs of salvation. They no doubt voted with the rest of the membership in all church matters. Hence also female children were brought to the font and baptized. Circumcision brought the male children into the Jewish church, but the females were ignored. In the Jewish Synagogues still, except two or three in this country, women are seen only in the gallery. But in the Christian Church is seen social worship, and the glorious peculiarity of women sitting on the same seats with their husbands and fathers—thus establishing the doctrine of the equality of souls, at least in the department of religion.

Another good principle, also taught by Paul, is in Heb. 13, 4:—"Marriage is honorable in all." How little the Catholic Church regards Paul's authority in this matter, is seen in the idea that lies at the basis of all their monastic institutions for either males or females, that celibacy is a purer mode of life than marriage. Protestantism, on the contrary, frowns upon monasticism, and by encouraging the formation of families allies itself rather to Jesus than to Paul. But the sentiment we are considering is Christian. Marriage is honorable, because it is natural. Popes, Cardinals, Bishops and Priests, in defiance of the creed, have in some instances yielded to the claims of nature, and have had wives and families.

Another principle, and better still, is in Ephesians 5, 25:—"Husbands love your wives, even as Christ also loved the Church and gave himself for it." After some gibberish in the preceding verses about "wives submitting" to their husbands, showing that the old ideas were ranking in his mind, he utters the redeeming language I have quoted. As Christ is said to have loved the church well enough to die for it, even so should husbands love their wives. No woman would ever ask more devotion than this. And if love begets love, it is easy to see what is the natural preventive of divorce. As marriage is the natural and proper condition of the race, it is easy to see also that all woman has to do, in order to secure all she wants in the way of legal enfranchisement, is to ask for it as a class. Had this divine spiritual idea that marriage meant love even unto death been the one pre-eminently taught by the Church and characterized by the laws, what a different record there would have been in the matter of divorce—and how empty, comparatively, the prisons would be of criminals, seeing that children would have been begotten of love instead of lust!

The presence and influence of woman, then, even to the limited extent to which we find it in modern society, as inculcated in the church, is the secret—the kernel in the shell—of modern civilization. When a woman like Mrs. Cheney, of Boston, or Mary Grew, of Philadelphia, is qualified and willing to read a discourse for criticism before the Radical Club,—when so earnest a soul as Miss Peckham, of Wisconsin, can be listened to with such marked respect and applause in such a meeting as that in which she spoke at Washington City, it must be set down to the credit of the good principles enunciated by Jesus and Paul, although so terribly crippled by Paul's bad ones; and by the Church, cleaving to the latter more than to the former. The heathen principles of Paul, discriminating against the female sex, have taken possession of the law as the demons of the New Testament did with their victims, and the struggle has evermore been on the part of the good principles to cast them out. Society is now sorely rent with this conflict, but it will continue until the patient is released and happy. The main hindrance is the fact that women have so long been discriminated against that they seem to regard it as their fate, and have no ambition to be put on the free list.

There is one strong argument on this subject which it seems to me has never had due weight in the discussion of the woman question in all its bearings—the excellency of the morals and discipline of those Colleges in the United States which educate the sexes together—thus keeping up the idea of Society. At Oberlin, where for more than a quarter of a century this question has been tested, no case of immorality, growing out of the presence of the sexes, has ever occurred. Hundreds of young men, associated with hundreds of young women in educational pursuits, are formed every year at that seat of learning, and conduct themselves towards each other as brothers and sisters; and the marriages which take place in after life among those that have been students there, are said to be, as might be expected, harmonious and happy. This, I think, furnishes a case of justification by verification, as Mr. Huxley would say, in which the plan is proved to be superior to the monkish and unnatural arrangements of most of our Colleges. Society in its true meaning can only be enjoyed in that country where the sexes are equal in law and custom, and where they exercise by their presence upon each other that elevating, refining, and purifying influence which Heaven designed.

BEZA.

TIME AND ETERNITY.—Time is but the stream I go a-fishing in. I drink of it, but while I drink I see the sandy bottom, and detect how shallow it is. Its thin current dies away, but eternity remains. I would drink deeper; fish in the sky, whose bottom is pebbly with stars.—Thoreau.

One would say that the primary character of the Koran is this of its genuineness, of its being a bona fide book.—Carlyle.

DEATH BY LIGHTNING.

[From "Fragments of Science for Unscientific People," by Prof. John Tyndall, pp. 397-401, Amer. Ed.]

People in general imagine, when they think at all about the matter, that an impression upon the nerves—a blow, for example, or the prick of a pin—is felt at the moment it is inflicted. But this is not the case. The seat of sensation is the brain, and to it the intelligence of any impression made upon the nerves has to be transmitted before this impression can become manifest in consciousness. The transmission, moreover, requires time, and the consequence is, that a wound inflicted on a portion of the body distant from the brain is more tardily appreciated than one inflicted adjacent to the brain. By an extremely ingenious experimental arrangement, Helmholtz has determined the velocity of this nervous transmission, and finds it to be about one hundred feet a second, or less than one-tenth of the velocity of sound in air. If, therefore, a whale fifty feet long were wounded in the tail, it would not be conscious of the injury till half a second after the wound had been inflicted. But this is not the only ingredient in the delay. There can scarcely be a doubt that to every act of consciousness belongs a determinate molecular arrangement of the brain—that every thought or feeling has its physical correlative in that organ; and nothing can be more certain than that every physical change, whether molecular or mechanical, requires time for its accomplishment. So that, besides the interval of transmission, still further time is necessary for the brain to put itself in order for its molecules to take up the motions or positions necessary to the completion of consciousness. Helmholtz considers that one-tenth of a second is demanded for this purpose. Thus, in the case of the whale above supposed, we have first half a second consumed in the transmission of the intelligence through the sensor nerves to the head, one-tenth of a second consumed by the brain in completing the arrangements necessary to consciousness, and, if the velocity of the transmission through the motor be the same as that through the sensor nerves, half a second in sending a command to the tail to defend itself. Thus one second and a tenth would elapse before an impression made upon its caudal nerves could be responded to by a whale fifty feet long.

Now it is quite conceivable that an injury might be inflicted which would render the nerves unfit to be conductors of the motion which results in sensation; and if such a thing occurred, no matter how severe the injury might be, we should not be conscious of it. Or it may be that, long before the time required by the brain to complete the arrangement necessary to consciousness, its power of arrangement might be wholly suspended. In such a case also, though the injury might be of a nature to cause death, this would occur without feeling of any kind. Death in this case would be simply the sudden negation of life, without any intervention of consciousness whatever.

Doubtless there are many kinds of death of this character. The passage of a musket-bullet through the brain is a case in point; and the placid aspect of a man thus killed is in perfect accordance with the conclusion which might be drawn a priori from the experiments of Helmholtz. Cases of insensibility, moreover, are not uncommon which do not result in death, and after which the persons affected have been able to testify that no pain was felt prior to the loss of consciousness.

The time required for a rifle-bullet to pass clean through a man's head may be roughly estimated at a thousandth of a second. Here, therefore, we should have no room for sensation, and death would be painless. But there are other actions which far transcend in rapidity that of the rifle-bullet. A flash of lightning cleaves a cloud, appearing and disappearing in less than a hundred-thousandth part of a second, and the velocity of electricity is such as would carry it in a single second over a distance almost equal to that which separates the earth and moon. It is well known that a luminous impression once made on the retina endures for about one-sixth of a second, and that this is the reason why we see a ribbon of light when a glowing coal is caused to pass rapidly through the air. A body illuminated by an instantaneous flash continues to be seen for the sixth of a second after the flash has become extinct; and if the body thus illuminated be in motion, it appears at rest at the place where the flash falls upon it. The color-top is familiar to most of us. By this instrument a disk with differently-colored sectors is caused to rotate rapidly; the colors blend together, and, if they are chosen in the proper proportions, when the motion is sufficiently rapid the disk appears white. Such a top rotating in a dark room and illuminated by an electric spark, appears motionless, each distinct color being clearly seen. Professor Dove has found that a flash of lightning produces the same effect. During a thunder-storm he put a color-top in exceedingly rapid motion and found that every flash revealed the top as a motionless object with all its colors distinct. If illuminated solely by a flash of lightning, the motion of all bodies on the earth's surface would, as Dove has remarked, appear suspended. A cannon-ball, for example, would have its flight apparently arrested, and would seem to hang motionless in space as long as the luminous impression which revealed the ball remained upon the eye.

If, then, a rifle-bullet move with sufficient rapidity to destroy life without the interposition of sensation, much more is a flash of lightning competent to produce this effect. Accordingly, we have well authenticated cases of people being struck senseless by lightning who, on recovery, had no memory of pain. The following circumstantial case is described by Hemmer:—

"On June 30, 1788, a soldier in the neighborhood of Mannheim, being overtaken by rain, placed himself under a tree, beneath which a woman had previously taken shelter. He looked upward to see whether the branches were thick enough to afford the required protection, and in doing so was struck by lightning, and fell senseless to the earth. The woman at his side experienced the shock in her foot, but was not struck down. Some hours afterward the man revived, but remembered nothing about what had occurred, save the fact of his looking up at the branches. This was his last act of consciousness, and he passed from the conscious to the unconscious condition without pain. The visible marks of a lightning stroke are usually insignificant; the hair is sometimes burnt; slight wounds are observed; while in some instances, a red streak marks the track of the discharge over the skin.

Under ordinary circumstances, the discharge from a small Leyden-jar is exceedingly unpleasant to myself. Some time ago I happened to stand in the presence of a numerous audience, with a battery of fifteen large Leyden-jars charged beside me. Through some awkwardness on my part, I touched a wire leading from the battery, and the discharge went through my body. Life was absolutely blotted out for a very sensible interval, without a trace of pain. In a second or so consciousness returned; I saw myself in the presence of the audience and apparatus, and by the help of these external appearances immediately concluded that I had received the battery discharge. The intellectual consciousness of my position was restored with exceeding rapidity, but not so the optical consciousness. To prevent the audience from being alarmed, I observed that it had often been my desire to receive accidentally such a shock, and that my wish had at length been fulfilled. But while making this remark, the appearance which my body presented to myself was that of a number of separate pieces. The arms, for example, were detached from the trunk, and seemed suspended in the air. In fact, memory and the power of reasoning appeared to be complete long before the optic nerve was restored to healthy action. But what I wish chiefly to dwell upon here is, the painlessness of the shock; and there cannot be a doubt that, to a person struck dead by lightning, the passage from life to death occurs without consciousness being in the least degree implicated. It is an abrupt stoppage of sensation, unaccompanied by a pang.

THE ORIGINAL MRS. PARTINGTON.—The names of certain great characters are so well known to fame, that often little or nothing else is known of them. Homer is in danger of having been born in seven different places at once. Shakespeare's early history is equally unauthoritative. Nobody knows who old Parr was—some sceptical people believing that after all he was only some old humbug, who pretended to be a great deal older than he really was. And who was Mrs. Partington? The old lady's maltreatment of the English language is proverbial. It may not be uninteresting, then, to know of the old lady herself. The original Mrs. Partington was a respectable old lady, living at Sidmouth in Devonshire. Her cottage was upon the beach, and the incident on which her fame is based is best told in a passage from a speech of Sidney Smith at Taunton, in the year 1831, on the Lords' rejection of the Reform bill: "The attempt of the Lords to stop the progress of reform reminds me very forcibly of the great storm at Sidmouth, and of the conduct of the excellent Mrs. Partington on that occasion. In the winter of 1824, there set in a great flood upon that town—the tide rose to an incredible height, the waves rushed in upon the houses, and everything was threatened with destruction. In the midst of this storm, Dame Partington, who lived upon the beach, was seen at the door of her house, with mop and pail, trundling her mop, squeezing out the sea water, and vigorously pushing away the Atlantic Ocean. The Atlantic was roused. Mrs. Partington's spirit was up. But I need not tell you that the conquest was unequal. The Atlantic Ocean beat Mrs. Partington. She was excellent at a slop or puddle; but she should not have meddled with a tempest." This speech is reprinted in the collected edition of Sidney Smith's works; and as this is, we believe, the first time of Mrs. Partington's name being mentioned, the immortality she has earned must be set down as due to Sidney Smith.—Once a Week.

SPIRITUALISM NOT AN AMUSEMENT BUT RELIGION.—The chief point of the defence in a recent suit of Mrs. Feital against the Middlesex Horse Railroad Company for damages for an injury, was that she could not recover because she was travelling on Sunday, and returning from a spiritual camp meeting at Malden, which was a place of amusement, and not devoted to bona-fide religious worship. The statute makes all travelling on Sunday for amusement illegal, and any injuries received while so doing would not be the ground of an action. Judge Wells charged the jury that "by the constitution every one has a right to worship according to his or her own conscience," and he told them to determine from all the evidence whether the plaintiff was sincere in her belief in Spiritualism, and also to decide the character of the meeting. A person has the right to travel on Sunday for the honest purpose of attending religious worship, and if the plaintiff was so doing, she is entitled to recover. The jury brought in a verdict for Mrs. Feital, giving her $5,000 damages.—Boston Commonwealth.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I have read Pres. White's lecture, 'The Battle Fields of Science,' and while I think he is right, that science and true religion cannot conflict, I do not agree with his strongly implied assertion that Science and Christianity are by no means at conflict. That ideal religion which many liberals of the present day hold, from which all the special elements of Christianity are excluded, is not the Christianity of the past or present. The Church has been battling for its very existence in opposing Science, for the titles Messiah, Savior, Christ, as applied to Jesus are inseparable from Christianity, in fact are the key to the system. Now let science step in, and show that Noah's flood never happened, and that Adam was a myth; then the doctrine of the 'fall of man' is no longer tenable, Christ as a Savior in any special sense is no longer wanted, and the authority of the Church is overthrown. Again, the miracles are to all but a very small portion of the Christian Church, an essential part of Christianity, and entitled to an equal credence with the other parts of the record; that is, when the Bible is looked upon as divine history. But science teaches that Nature's laws are the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; while the scientific study of theology, which Mr. Hollowell deprecates so much, is proving that all the special elements of Christianity are born of man, not God. Depend upon it, the old Churchmen were wise, and foresaw where such knowledge would lead, and did their best to trample it out. I think I detect in the lecture a purpose lying under the surface, and not wholly scientific; it is to prove that the Bible is the true religion; that science does not in reality clash with it, but only with mistaken or too literal interpretations thereof."

—"I am glad to see, from your remarks on Mr. Howard's communication 'The Claims of the Heart in Religion,' that you are likely to touch upon the subject at some length at some future time. The condition of enthusiasm or ecstasy experienced by those who enter upon the 'New Life' is an interesting study and constitutes, as it seems to me, the strongest pull-back in the life of many persons who are inclined to liberality in matters of religion. I know an instance of a person, of extreme radical views, whose only doubt of his position lies in his inability to wholly convince himself that his former condition and heart was simply a mental phenomenon. I enclose as a specimen of an allied condition, perhaps only an advanced phase of the same condition, an article from Zion's Herald. An article on the opposite side of the slip, entitled 'Mistaken in the Person,' contains some allusion to the same subject. I was pained to learn, a day or two since, from a Christian friend with whom I sometimes have a quiet tilt, that Mr. Abbot would bring up either in the Catholic Church or in an Insane Asylum. If I see you driven up to the doors of the former, I shall yet feel sure that you are really booked for the latter institution, and that the vehicle has only stopped to take an additional passenger."

—"Some time ago I saw an article, I have forgotten the writer's name, on Theo. Parker and Aminadab Judson. The writer credits Mr. Parker with the authorship of some lines beginning—

'Jesus, there is no dearer name than thine,
Which time has blazoned on his mighty scroll;
No wreaths nor garlands ever did entwine
So fair a temple of so vast a soul.'

Last Sunday evening the Universalist minister here gave a lecture on Mr. Parker in which he too gave Mr. Parker credit for the same. In Mr. Parker's 'Discourse of Religion,' page 286, occurs the same lines as a quotation. Can you tell me who is the author of the lines? [Will some one who knows answer?—Ed.] Please tell me also, if you can, why, if the wonderful things (miracles) attributed to Jesus did actually transpire, have not some other than Bible historians made mention of the facts?"

—"THE INDEX is read by the students with much interest. I extend to you a hearty 'God speed.'"

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be suspended during the months of July and August. Special notice will be given of any occasional meetings that may be held.

RECEIVED.

THE RADICAL. Published Monthly. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Bromfield St. 1871. August. $3.00 a Year.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD. A Monthly Magazine of General Literature and Science. August, 1871. New York: THE CATHOLIC PUBLICATION HOUSE, 9 Warren St. $5.00 a Year.

THE PRESS. An Illustrated Journal. July, 1871. Chicago: HORTON & LEONARD, Publishers, 108 & 110 Randolph St.

LIVE STOCK JOURNAL. For the Farm, the Turf, the Dairy, the Poultry Yard, and the Apiary. July, 1871. SPRINGER, BENT & Co., New York, 27 Park Place.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL. August, 1871. Published by JOHN E. MILLER, Chicago, Ill. $1.50 a Year.

Poetry.

THE FOLLY OF HUMAN PRIDE.

Know Nature's children all divide, her care;
The fur that warms a monarch warmed a bear.
While man exclaims, "See all things for my use!"
"See man for mine!" replies a pampered goose.
And just as short of reason he must fall,
Who thinks all made for one, not one for all.

POPE, ESSAY ON MAN, III, 43-48.

The Index.

JULY 29, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

NOTICE—THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

THE subscribers to the Capital Stock of THE INDEX ASSOCIATION are hereby notified that a meeting of said subscribers will be held at the office of the Toledo Printing Company, 90 St. Clair street, on Thursday, the 17th day of August, at 7 1/2 P. M., for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors, and adopting rules for the government of said incorporation.

E. P. BASSETT,
CALVIN CONE,
PETER H. BATESON,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
HENRY E. HOWE.

Toledo, O., July 8, 1871.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed; and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten "	1,000
A. E. MACAMBER,	"	"	"	1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	500
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Three	300
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	One	100
MISS A. HALL,	Deafance,	"	"	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	100
J. SEDGEBEE,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	100
CARL POST,	Painesville,	O.,	"	100
HENRY MILLER,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	300
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	500
J. L. WHITING,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Boston,	"	"	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	100
S. I. DURKEE,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	200
FRANK PRATHER,	Wellsville,	Mass.,	Five	500
E. F. DINSMORE,	Boston,	Mass.,	One	100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	200
W. J. POTTER,	Middlefield,	Ct.,	Fourteen,	1,400
G. C. GLATTE,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three,	300
W. C. GANNETT,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	300
	Boston,	Mass.,	"	300

$22,100

THE BREWING STORM.

We publish today on our first page an article by a gentleman of Detroit which is very timely and very true. How nearly we coincide with its general purport will appear from a passage in a sermon we delivered in Dover, N. H., May 8, 1868, immediately after concluding an engagement with the "Independent Society" which had begun to organize itself in that place. We quote the passage verbatim as delivered:—

"Two great questions present themselves to us for solution.

1. What distinguishes Christianity from all other historic religions,—in other words, what is its essential peculiarity, its foundation and corner-stone as a distinct religion?

2. Can Christianity, as such, ever develop itself into that 'absolute religion,' or pure spiritual theism, which by its very universality is broader, deeper, and higher than any of its special limitations? Or by this very development must it commit suicide as an historical faith, and perish as Christianity in order to survive as Religion?

No questions involve issues which are fraught with more tremendous consequences to mankind in their highest interests, or influence more powerfully the deep springs of civilization. The fate of the vast Christian Church, with all its affiliated institutions, hinges on the answer which the inexorable logic of events must give to these questions in time to come. A mighty religious revolution, compared with which the Protestant Reformation was the merest child's play, is silently and invisibly creeping upon us, and sooner or later must shake the whole civilized world with the throes of a spiritual earthquake.

The oncoming of the great Rebellion, which for four years made the republic tremble from dome to corner-stone, was discerned by a few prophetic spirits alone, who saw in the antagonism of ideas a chart of the misty future. The same antagonism of ideas, the same terrific battle between freedom and authority, must repeat itself on a higher plane; the same spirit of slavery which eight years ago ruled the political world rules today the religious world, and the crash must come.

The elements of the strife are here today; the forces which must precipitate it are here also. The Catholic Church on the one hand, as the only pure embodiment of the principle of Christian authority, and Free Religion, which has but just begun to embody itself, on the other hand,—the tremendous Slave Power and the little knot of Abolitionists,—have come to blows already in Cincinnati in the recent controversy between Archbishop Purcell and Mr. Vickers. Under the banner of Christianity, upheld by the Catholic Church, the various Protestant sects, Evangelical and Liberal alike, will yet range themselves as a single army; while to the banner of Religious Freedom will flock all from whose souls the beneficent genius of modern science has stricken off the shackles of superstition.

The signs of the times are plain to all who can discern in them the manifestations of great principles. Ideas are in conflict, and truth must in the end win the day. What, then, can be of more absorbing interest than the questions I have proposed? If Christianity is to conquer, it will not be as Methodism or Baptism or Congregationalism or Episcopacy nor yet as Liberal Christianity, but as Romanism; these half-way sects cannot hold their ground, but must forever be moving, either backwards toward the Catholic Church, or forwards toward Free Religion. It has been well said by Dr. Hedge,—Reason or Rome; there is no middle ground. It becomes, then, of prime importance to understand what Christianity in its essence is, and to cast its horoscope by the astrology of ideas."

IS CHIVALRY DEAD?

The Toledo Commercial indulges in slander in default of wit:—

"The people of San Francisco hissed Susan B. Anthony, a few evenings since, for defending Laura Fair, whom the New York Tribune calls 'the murderess-prostitute.' They continued their hisses until she was compelled to abandon that feature of her discourse. Poor Susan is soured at humanity, because no masculine specimen could ever be drawn into her web by the laws of affinity or anything else; hence, whenever she finds a woman who has made war upon society, broken up a family, or caused the life of a man to be taken, her sympathies are aroused. Really, Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony are acquiring a reputation of no enviable character by the doctrines which they are promulgating upon social questions."

We have as little liking as any one for some of the utterances of these ladies. But a paper which thus wars upon women, not by openly confronting and arguing down their doctrines, but by sneaking, Indian-fashion, behind a tree, and shooting foul and false insinuations behind their backs, must have a liver of most unsullied whiteness. Its Pecksniffian piety makes no amends for such unutterable cowardice and meanness.

If Miss Anthony and Mrs. Stanton are mistaken in their sociology, no respectable person doubts that they are pure women who believe in womanly purity. Cerebral incapacity may be unable to discriminate between pity for a friendless and condemned woman on the one hand, and a brazen-faced endorsement of her crimes on the other; but it requires utter paralysis of truthfulness and manly honor to account for such innuendoes as the above. Put into plain English, the Commercial's charge is that Miss Anthony sympathizes with a prostitute's plot to seduce a married man into profligacy, to ruin his wife and children, and at last to murder the victim outright; and that she would gladly do the same herself but for lack of the requisite fascinations. Does the Commercial dare to say openly that it believes this? No, verily! But out of a wicked prejudice it dares to hint it. Yet the Commercial is a champion of the gospel—according to Fashion. Out upon the pious poltroonery that has only just pluck enough to shoot poisoned arrows at a lady's reputation! Crown the brave warrior with laurels—he has struck a woman.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The pamphlet REPORT of the Proceedings of the recent Annual Meeting, in Boston, of the Free Religious Association is now ready. It contains, in full, John Weiss' essay on "The Attitude of Science to Religion," O. B. Frothingham's essay on "Superstition and Dogmatism," and W. J. Potter's essay on "The Natural Genesis of Christianity;" also a carefully prepared abstract of the addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell and others,—together with the report of the Executive Committee and other proceedings of the Business Session. Price of the pamphlet Thirty-Five cents; in packages of ten or more Twenty-Five cents each.

The Association has also printed an edition of Col. Higginson's essay on "The Sympathy of Religions," which attracted so much attention when published in the Radical last February. Price Twenty cents; in packages of ten or more Fifteen cents each.

Either of these pamphlets may be obtained by addressing the Secretary, W. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass., or S. H. Morse, Editor of the Radical, 25 Bromfield St., Boston.

W. J. P.

M. Taine, lecturing to his class on the "Philosophy of Art," says:—"It is not my province to direct you; it would be a serious embarrassment. Besides, I say to myself, there are only two precepts yet discovered of real value; the first enjoining you to be born with genius, which is an affair of your parents, and not mine; and the second enjoining devoted labor in order to master your art, which likewise does not depend on me, but on yourselves. My duty is simply to explain facts to you, and show you how these facts are produced." Such is the spirit of the modern teacher, who does not aim at the establishment of a school or the imprisonment of young minds in rigid doctrines, but simply gives his pupils materials to work upon and encourages the free action of their own faculties. The clergy are slow to learn this lesson.

The finest element of Darwinianism is Mr. Darwin's unmatched ingenuousness. He has taught the world a great lesson. His books ennoble even more than they instruct.

KESHUB CHUNDER SEN.

A report has been in circulation that Chunder Sen, soon after his return to India from his visit to England, was converted by some Methodist missionaries, and, abandoning the Brahmo Somaj, had publicly announced himself a Christian of the Methodist order. It cannot be said that the report obtained much credit. The popular sectarian mind of Christendom eagerly grasped at it, but, before there was time for it to spread very far, the contradiction came. The sectarian officials even among the Methodists, to whom the glory of the conversion was attributed, were very wary about giving their confidence to the story, for greatly as they must have desired to believe it, they knew too well how small the chances were of securing such a convert. Those who in England had become most intimately acquainted with Mr. Sen's opinions and character, felt sure from the outset that there must be some egregious mistake in the report. And their feeling was soon proved to be true. It turned out that the story originated in the conversion of an obscure preacher of the Brahmo Somaj of similar name, over which unwonted success the Methodist missionaries made great rejoicing. Even this conversion, however, it is said, was but temporary.

Just about the time that this story of Chunder Sen's conversion to Methodist Christianity was getting into circulation in England and this country, he wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Free Religious Association, endorsing for a coadjutor and friend a specimen manuscript of what Mr. Sen naively described as "an Anti-Christian book," for which the friend wished to find a publisher in England or America. The fact that Mr. Sen should have lent himself as an agent towards securing the publication of an "Anti-Christian" work, and the more than willingness to serve his friend that was evident in his letter, did not argue that he had become a very zealous Methodist. He apparently wrote in entire unconsciousness of the report of his adoption of Christianity, which had gone before his letter; and the letter, which arrived in due time, might have been given to the public, had there then been any need, as a refutation of the story of his conversion.

In truth, Chunder Sen is a man who is so thoroughly informed in all the phases and history of Christian theology and so entirely imbued with the rationalistic scholarship of England and America, and has withal such a horror of Christian sectarianism, that his conversion to Evangelical Christianity may be regarded about as impossible as would have been the conversion of Theodore Parker, when at the height of his Music-Hall heretical career, into a Methodist revivalist preacher. At the same time it must be said that there is not a little of Methodist fervor in Chunder Sen's writings and speeches. Any one who has read many of them must have discovered, that, while his mind has been educated into the type of the transcendental-rationalistic school of religious thought, he has a good deal more of what is recognized in Christendom as the Evangelical type of piety than is commonly possessed by English or American rationalists or even by Unitarian Christians. The religious sentiment, naturally more fervid in the Asiatic than in the European mind, is very strong in him; and, having learned so much of Christianity and regarding it, as he professedly does, so highly, were it not that his mind has been so thoroughly trained in the rationalistic intuitional philosophy and scholarship, and that he believes so profoundly in India having a specific religious mission apart from Christianity, it might not be very difficult for him to take the step that he was mistakenly reported to have taken. But as he is, the step would be a very astounding one, if not absolutely impossible.

That some of the subordinate members of the Brahmo Somaj, who have not had Chunder Sen's advantages of learning, should be drawn into Methodist Christianity, would not greatly surprise us,—though we do not know that there is any special prospect of it. It is not difficult for them to turn from their old Hindu faith to man-worship,—while they have already a missionary zeal, a fervor of spirit, a belief in the immediate operation of the Divine Spirit upon the human mind in specific answer to prayer, which makes them akin to the Methodists among Christians. If one can judge from the spirit that shows itself in their church, it would not be a hard task to lead it to adopt the revival system.

But against this tendency it is to be hoped that the well-balanced spiritual rationalism of Chunder Sen and his scholarly fellow-laborers among the leaders of the Brahmo Somaj will prevail,—saving the religious sentiment from extravagant one-sided excesses of development on the one hand and keeping off the shoals of materialism on the other.

W. J. P.

COURAGE AND INDIFFERENCE.

There was a brief moment of dispute in the afternoon of the late meeting of the Free Religious Association, not on any cardinal point of opinion, but on a point rather of sentiment. One of the speakers at the morning session, discussing the mutual relations between science and religion, took the brave position that, let science weaken or destroy what religious beliefs it might, let it even take away the rational supports from the deepest and dearest, such as the existence of a personal God and the faith in a personal immortality, it would still leave us ourselves, friendship, humanity; and the universe we live in, made more glorious by the revelations of order, harmony and beauty that science has brought. We should have, at all events, the truth; and the truth, whatever it might be, would justify itself by its satisfying effects on the mind. We should therefore fear nothing; for if there be no personal God, we shall surely come to see that it will be as well for us as if there were; and if the hope of conscious immortality must be abandoned, other hopes will rise to take its place; the heart will adjust itself to the new situation, and will substitute quality of being for duration of existence. Whatever the order of things be, it must be good. And they that understand the order of things will perceive and feel sure that it is good. Truth remains, and with truth, strength and joy.

The statement was challenged, under the impression apparently that it encouraged indifference in matters of faith,—seeming to imply that it was of little consequence what one believed or disbelieved, affirmed or denied,—whether he were theist or atheist,

Spiritualist or materialist. But was that inference a fair one? Did Mr. Higginson say that it was all one to him whether there was a living God or not? Did he intimate that it ought to be all the same to anybody? That the brave soul should be willing to surrender the citadel of its faith at the first summons of the enemy—indeed that it would be well to let it be understood in advance that no resistance would be made, that there was no citadel to defend, nothing worth fighting for, that the enemy might come and take possession whenever he would? Mr. Higginson, on the contrary, avowed his own belief in conscious immortality and in a living God; to him the constitution of the universe involved those facts; they were positive and precious to him; but they were positive and precious because they represented organic facts of the universe,—not because they pleased or comforted his mind. If they did not represent organic facts of the universe, he could find in them no delight.

Is this position illogical or dangerous? It is surely no uncommon thing for a man or a woman to hold possessions exceedingly precious and yet to resign them patiently when necessity bids. It is, to say the least, conceivable that a true man should fight stoutly for his beliefs, contesting the ground inch by inch, and yielding only at the last moment to overwhelming proofs, and yet, when the proof comes, should accept the situation with a cheerful determination to make the best of it and extract the results of victory from defeat. What else does every good soldier? What competent commander ever goes into the field without fairly contemplating the possible contingency of disaster, and planning to repair it if it comes?

It is precisely in this respect, among others, that the rational believer differs from the sectarian of whatever kind and name. He admits the possibility of defeat on the field of technical or formulated opinion, but he does not admit that defeat there can be his ruin.

If his bark sink, 'tis to another sea.

The sectarian, the dogmatist, the main-tainer of an opinion, stakes his life on his definition. If that goes, all goes, and chaos comes again. Driven from his entrenched position, his last ditch yawns. The rationalist knows that chaos cannot come again. He fights behind no Chinese wall, but in the open field, and instead of a final ditch expects to find a bridge.

It was replied to Mr. Higginson that, if God were given up, then was everything virtually given up; the base of being was removed, and things became at once shadowy and evanescent. True, if God and one's conception of God were the same thing; if, as an Orphic seer once said, "We create God, for He is one of our ideas." But if the base of being remains the same however we may think about it, the case is altered, and we but shift our conception, rooted ever to the same spot of unchangeable reality.

The position taken by Mr. Higginson argues anything but indifference. It shows a two-fold care,—a care for the present and a care for the future; a double courage,—a courage to strive for a real conviction, and a courage to commit one's self to a strange conviction. It is not commonly found that people are less tenacious of life as the hour of their departure approaches; nor is it a frequent experience that they who are the readiest to go when the time shall come, are anxious to hasten the time's coming. Even the cordial believers in heaven are not anxious to get there, but make a hard fight for a few days more of earthly misery. A better fight still will people make for their heaven, though patient in their anticipations of other heavens lying beyond. However brave one may be in view of possible issues, the belief in God and in immortality is too precious to be surrendered without a struggle. "If my bark sink"—but it shall float as long as I can make it.

O. B. F.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Many ask me whether the general increase of liberal religious sentiment among all the sects is favorable or otherwise to the spread of Free Religion, as inculcated by THE INDEX and its editors in their different modes of ministration to the public.

Mr. Collyer, now in England, in a letter to the Christian Register or the Liberal Christian several months since, made a remark in relation to Mr. Connor and his Society in Milwaukee, which would seem, indirectly at least, to answer the question. But the answer seemed to me to break down all distinctions not only between Mr. Connor and Mr. Collyer, but also between Henry Ward Beecher and both of them. For Mr. Collyer fully endorsed Mr. Beecher, and intimated as one reason why Mr. Connor's congregation is not larger, or does not increase, that he is surrounded with other societies orthodox in belief, but, like Mr. Beecher, so liberal as to be all that he requires. I am sorry Mr. Collyer's letter is not before me, but am sure I do not misrepresent it. It appeared to me at the time that Mr. Connor should recommend his congregation to enter those liberal neighboring societies and retire, or seek other fields of labor not so fortunate in their surroundings.

To me, the Free Religious statement is something positive and distinct, as well from liberal Christianity as conservative; as well from Protestantism, so-called, as from Catholicism, or Judaism. I should hold unhesitatingly with Mr. Darwin, were it not that sometimes the gulf between the brute and reasoning creation, between Mr. Barnum and his menagerie, seems to me unbridged and unbridgeable. Rather perhaps I should say, there are links just there unsupplied; and that to furnish them would be like attempting to weld iron and clay, as in the vision of the prophet. I see no difficulty up to that point with Darwinianism.

So in Free Religion. In my estimation, it is not a step in a series, a continuance, but a creation. Hebrew prophecy tells of "a new heaven and a new earth, in which the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind." Is it not time to begin the fulfilment of that prophecy—begin it by more than mending the old?

The general tendency of all the sects is backward and downward, not upward and onward and Mr. Connor was never more needed than now, and nowhere more than among those liberal associations so "like Mr. Beecher;" unless he has become like them, which cannot be supposed.

I have just been in some towns where the liberal but still adhering sectarianism abounds. The once bold and brave aboli-tionists have returned to it, if, indeed, numbers of them have not gone farther back. And worse than all, they are teaching their children and grand-children, in Sunday schools and catechisms, lessons which I know neither they nor some of their ministers believe. Some have told me so themselves.

I once learned the "Assembly's Shorter Catechism;" and learned it in good earnest, for my parents believed in it, and so, doubtless, did their minister. But in the Unitarian and Universalist denomination, authorized question-books are used, and lessons taught to young and old, which, if less terrible than Calvinism, are not more true; and in which, often neither parents, teachers, superintendent nor minister believe!

And so I am not sure that increase of what often passes for "liberalism," is any advantage to the cause of Truth and of Free Religion as inculcated by THE INDEX.

P. P.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

"GOOD AND BAD GUIDES."

MR. ABBOT;—No doubt many, if not most, of those who have read your strictures on Taylor's "Diegesis" think that you have shown the author to have been "a charlatan" and me a dupe. Three weeks from the time you first opened that volume, the result of many years' labor, one of which was spent in a British jail for alleged blasphemy, a book which purports to be "a discovery of the origin, evidences and early history of Christianity, never yet before or elsewhere so fully and faithfully set forth"—three weeks have sufficed for you to prepare to annihilate it at one blow, and prove its author an ignoramus. Let us see who it is that has "buted his head against a stone wall."

1. Ignoring the demurrer which Taylor puts in, and which I repeated, that the single passage in Tacitus referring to the Christians, if not spurious, fails to prove that such a person as Jesus existed, but only that an early Christian sect so held, and blinking the twenty reasons which he gives for considering the passage a forgery, as against the opposite conclusion arrived at by some of the wisest and best men in the world, you, as if to maintain at all hazards a position you had taken that scepticism as to the fact of Jesus' life and death has nothing to show for itself except unreasoning suspicion, attack the author of the "Diegesis" as an unreasoning, blundering, falsifying sceptic.

2. To prove him a blunderer or a falsifier in affirming that the first publication of any part of the "Annals" of Tacitus was by Johannes de Spire in 1468, you cite a Harvard class-book which dates the first publication nearly a half century later. Now I have found seven authorities in support of Taylor's assertion, namely, Anthon's Classical Dictionary, Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, the American Cyclopædia, the Encyclopædia Britannica, Murphy's Tacitus, Frere's Biographie Generale, and Dibdin's Bibliotheca Spenceriana. Authorities are divided only as to the question whether the first publication was by John of Spira in 1468 or by his brother Vindelin in 1470, the edition being without date. This first publication contains only the last six books of the Annals, in one of which is found the passage about the Christians. The edition of Pope Leo X., published in 1515, contains the then newly discovered first five books—not the last six, unless they were copied from the edition of 1468.

A copy of that earliest edition exists in the library of Earl Spencer, or did when Taylor wrote, and in it quite possibly he found the supposed date of the manuscript, namely, in the eighth century.

3. The next earliest manuscript containing the book in question belongs therefore, according to your authority, to the eleventh century, and contains, you say, the last eleven books. There is evidently some mistake here, for only the first six and the last six are extant of the sixteen. What "a vast misfortune" that such inaccurate text-books should be used in our colleges! What a pity they "should be published, circulated, or read!" In all the subsequent discoveries of manuscripts it seems that only a part of one book of the Annals was added, namely, the sixth.

4. But you concede that the manuscript of the eleventh century contains so many Christian corruptions that it is rejected in all good editions. And yet you are highly indignant at Taylor for hinting a suspicion that the Christian possessor of the earlier manuscript might have corrupted a single passage. O consistency! It matters not whether the interpolation was made by his or a prior hand; the multitude of corruptions of the Christian scriptures in the middle ages is enough to justify suspicion in regard to most manuscripts.

5. The fact that all of the thirty other manuscripts of the Annals are still more recent is consistent with Taylor's assertion that the latter are all taken from the former. I regret that he, like too many other writers, was not more careful to cite his authorities for this, as well as for some other affirmations, though his citations are generally very abundant.

You have called him several hard names which I trust you will live to regret, when you shall have realized that the criticism of the nineteenth century has much to add to that of the eighteenth, though priests deny it and worldly-wise scholars blink it. If you will take the trouble to read Taylor's "Syntagma," you will see how effectually he dealt with the Rev. John Pye Smith, who undertook to answer a manifesto of five pages by Taylor, being an epitome of his subsequent "Diegesis." That Christian minister, in a book of sixty pages, heaped more than sixty epithets upon his adversary, but succeeded only in proving to the enlightened reader that he himself was an egregious blunderer, if not a falsifier of facts.

6. A just appreciation of Taylor may be found in that most rare work, the "Anacalypsis," by Godfrey Higgins, London, 1836, the fruit of twenty years study and research, averaging nearly ten hours each. He speaks of the author of the "Diegesis" and "Syntagma" in the highest terms, quotes from him quite largely, making no less than eighteen citations or references, and confirms many of his positions. In regard to the Essenes he says:—

"It was my intention to have had a much longer chapter than I have given relative to them in this work, but the learned and ingenious deist, the Rev. Robert Taylor, has superseded me. It is of no use to re-write the substance of what he has written respecting them in his Diegesis, and written better than I could do." (Vol II, p. 44.)

Higgins is also one who reasons doubtfully as to the historical existence of Jesus, as will appear by the following quotations:—

"Certainly the fact noticed by Mr. R. Taylor that Philo described the Essenes before Christ was born, and that Eusebius has shown that those very Essenes, so described, were Christians, at once proves that the Christians of his sect were not the followers of the man who lived and preached in the reign of Tiberius." (Ibid., p. 46.)

"St. Paul preaches in a very pointed manner Christ crucified; this was in opposition to the Christ not crucified of the Gnostics, and in later times of the Manicheans and Mohammedans. Gnosticism was the secret religion of the conclave. They had Jesus of Bethlehem for the people and Jesus of Nazareth for the conclave and cardinals. For the people they had to have Jesus crucified; for the conclave, Jesus not crucified. This will appear to many persons at first absolutely incredible. Most fortunately the church has been guilty of the oversight of letting a passage of Irenæus escape. One of the earliest, most respected and most quoted of its ancient bishops, saints and martyrs, tells us in distinct words that Jesus was not crucified under Herod or Pontius Pilate; but that he lived to be turned fifty years of age. This negates the whole story of Herod and Pontius Pilate. This he tells us on the authority of his master, Polycarp, also a martyr, who had it from St. John himself and from all the old people of Asia." (Ibid., p. 129.)

In spite of a multitude of passages of like import, Higgins does admit at the conclusion of his work that Jesus lived and was put to death. But this admission is so much at variance with his previous argument that the Christian editor whose duty it was to carry out the dying injunction of the author and print the second volume, notes the statement with exultation.

7. You say, Mr. Editor, that I misapprehended your admission that "but for Paul Jesus might never have been heard of," because you had referred to the Gospels as at least establishing the leading facts of his career. I did not suppose you had entirely discarded that evidence, except John's Gospel; but you have now indicated just how much of the Synoptics you regard as "approaching to certainty," in your statement of your entire agreement with the passage of Strauss in which he says that, "with the exception of the journey to Jerusalem and his death, the facts of his life are unfavorably situated." You deny not only the resurrection of Jesus, which has been the sheet-anchor of Christianity through almost the entire Christian era, but most of the record of his life; and yet you insist that he lived and was put to death. I do not deny it, but I do say that the doubts sometimes expressed as to his historical existence are something more than "scepticism without argument," and that scepticism has something more to show for itself than "unreasoning suspicion." Furthermore, I venture to express the opinion that the fact does admit of a reasonable doubt.

W. H. B.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 6, 1871.

[1. It was not the object of the early apologists of Christianity to prove the historical existence of Jesus, but the truth of his claims; for their opponents little dreamed of questioning the former. That this is true, appears from an exceedingly rare work before us, written by Thomas Taylor, the "Modern Platonist," which contains a collection of extracts from Celsus, Porphyry, and Julian, the most famous opponents of the early Christians. Celsus says:—"The disciples of Jesus, living with him, hearing his voice, and embracing his doctrines, when they saw that he was punished and put to death, neither died with nor for him, nor could be persuaded to despise punishment; but denied that they were his disciples. Why, therefore, do not you Christians die with your master?" Porphyry accuses Jesus of "inconstancy and mutability," because, having said that he should not go to the feast of tabernacles (John vii), he yet afterwards went. Julian, also, upbraids the Alexandrians for worshipping Jesus as a god, but it does not occur to him to deny that he ever lived:—"You dare not worship either of these deities [the sun and moon]; but this Jesus, whom neither you nor your fathers have seen, you think must necessarily be God the Word." The ancient attacks upon Christianity were directed, not against the historical existence of Jesus, which was taken for granted, but against his religion in general and his divinity in particular.

Now the only conceivable motive a Christian could ever have had for forging this passage of Tacitus must have been a wish to prove the bare fact that Jesus had lived and been crucified as the founder of the new religion—a fact not called in question by any powerful antagonist. In every other point of view the passage would be a most damaging one to the Christian cause, since it accuses the Christians of abominable crimes,—a sufficient reason for its not being cited by the Christian Fathers. The "Diegesis," therefore, is singularly in error in saying that it "would have served the purpose of Christian quotation better than any other, etc." Furthermore, Robert Taylor very conveniently forgets (if he ever knew) the passage in Juvenal, Sat. I, 155-156, which undoubtedly alludes to the same persecution of the Christians by Nero that Tacitus describes, and which thus indirectly corroborates the latter. Tacitus states what was the common belief of the Romans at that time; and this common belief is strong evidence that Jesus was actually crucified as the leader of the new sect. No motive that is plausible can be assigned for regarding this passage as a Christian interpolation; for it is utterly opposed to Christian prejudices and beliefs.

As to the charge of "blinking" Taylor's "twenty reasons," it is sufficient to say that they are all swept away together by our disproof of his pretence that John of Spira interpolated the passage in question, which, he says, "rests upon the fidelity of a single individual." To take them up one by one, and show either their falsity or irrelevancy, would be superfluous, after the main proposition they are brought to prove has been absolutely disproved. When you cut a man's head off, it is not necessary to complete the execution by cutting off his twenty fingers and toes one by one.

2. "W. H. B." says that we have attempted to prove Taylor a blunderer in affirming that "the first publication of any part of the 'Annals' was by Johannes de Spire in 1468." We are at a loss how to construe such a misrepresentation. In the mildest view, it is inexcusably careless. We proved Taylor a blunderer in affirming that "all other manuscripts and printed copies of the works of Tacitus are derived" from the single manuscript of John of Spira—which is a very different thing. The oldest and best manuscript of the "Annals" was not brought to Italy until 1513, forty-five years later than the above date; and there are over thirty other manuscripts besides. So far as the present argument is concerned, "W. H. B." might as well collect authorities to prove that the King of the Cannibal Islands is fond of cold missionary, which would have quite as much bearing on the point. The ponderous "seven authorities" controvert nothing that we said.

3. Whenever we fall into a mistake, we are perfectly willing to own it. Our statement that the Codex Casinensis contains the "last eleven books of the 'Annals'" was an inadvertency; for we had in mind at the moment merely the fact that this manuscript lacks the earlier books which are contained in the older manuscript. It slipped our mind for a moment that both manuscripts lack the seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth books, because those were not concerned in the discussion. The fine German edition of Tacitus before us, over whose supposed blunder "W. H. B." makes merry, does not of course contain them, and is not responsible for any carelessness of ours. For this slip of the pen, which fortunately does not in the slightest degree affect our argument, we apologize with due contrition.

4. But "W. H. B." makes another incomprehensible misrepresentation of what we wrote. He says we "concede that the manuscript of the eleventh century contains so many Christian corruptions that it is rejected in all good editions." We made no such concession. We said that the corruptions it contains are rejected in all good editions—a very different thing from saying that the manuscript itself is rejected. On the contrary, our confidence in the genuineness of the disputed passage is based on the fact that it has successfully passed the ordeal of modern criticism, which, while detecting and rejecting many Christian interpolations in the manuscript, has endorsed this passage as not an interpolation. "W. H. B.'s" apostrophe to "consistency," in view of his strange perversion of our statement and his unsuccessful attempt to turn its edge, sounds a little flat.

5- The "fact" is that Robert Taylor, in declaring that "all other editions and manuscripts of the 'Annals'" are derived from John of Spira's "single manuscript" (what manuscript?), shows himself to be what we called him, a "literary charlatan." The oldest and best manuscript of the "Annals" was not brought to Italy till nearly fifty years after the publication of John of Spira's edition; and this Taylor either did not know or did not choose to mention. He might well be chary of quoting "authorities." His own unsupported assertions were much more useful for his purpose.

6. It is unnecessary to say anything about the "Anacalypsis," since its author admits all that we claim. But the extracts above given more than suggest a suspicion that it is a work quite as untrustworthy as the "Diegesis."

7. Most certainly we disbelieve the story (or stories)—they are many and contradictory) of the resurrection. But we cannot regard the doubt whether Jesus claimed the Messianic throne and was put to death under Pilate in consequence of this claim, as in any degree "reasonable." Robert Taylor, at least, has done nothing to make it so.—Ed.]

"SPIRITUALISM AND SUPERSTITION."

IN THE INDEX of July 8, is an article with the above title by O. B. Frothingham, on which please allow me a word of comment and suggestion. The assertion that an "immense amount of superstition lies dormant, and not altogether dormant, either," in Spiritualism, made by an essayist at the late meeting of the Free Religious Association in Boston, is the key-note and opening of the article. It is stated that the belief in the presence of spirits and the possibility of intercourse with them is inseparable from the wish to cultivate such intercourse, and that "it is hard, even for cultured and thoughtful persons, to escape the impression of Christian and other teachings" which lead us "to think of spirits as angels and of angels as illuminated." The "belief in the direct agency of spirits in human concerns" is thought especially dangerous. Books containing "alleged revelations of speculative truth from eminent" spirits are spoken of, and men who consult spirits in business matters, and parents who consult their children in the other world.

Mr Frothingham says he refused an exchange on Sunday with a trance-speaker on the ground that "the method was irregular and dangerous;" and to the Spiritualists it is suggested that, "if they would secure the favor of sensible people, they must let them see that they are not at war with good sense."

The summing-up is: "Here is the ground for a complete structure of superstition. Every kind of delusion may come in. The many will follow fancy to the ruin of reason."

To all of which I would say—Here are a million men and women, Spiritualists today, but yesterday many of them in the churches, educated in the credulity and superstition of which the sects are full, taught to accept blindly miracle and Book and creed. Can it be expected that even the best and largest views could at once emancipate and train them to full mental and spiritual life and vigor? Yet it is not true that great advance has been made in the light of their new views and knowledge of the future life, in the use of reason and judgment, little used before? I think it is, and should utterly deny, from a somewhat extended knowledge, that the many had followed fancy to the ruin of reason; as it is apprehended they may in the future. But I should say that reason never was so free and strong as now, not forgetting the folly that ever keeps it company.

Who shall say—"I would or would not have another life and spirits coming sometimes to us;" as though the human soul could be bent to any belief or disbelief, regardless of its own demands and aspirations? This is the "orthodox" method; let it never be ours. Mankind have ever looked with longing eye and listened with waiting ear for some sign or word from the life beyond, and this looking and waiting grow with the ages. Who can stop it? To a great company of people, among them persons cultured, critical, and eminently rational, belief has grown to knowledge that spirits do communicate; and even sometimes influence our mortal lives. Who shall or can shut the Gates Ajar? Is it not well to see more clearly the light that will shine, and not be dazed or confused thereby?

In suggesting that intercourse with spirits has led to necromancy and delusion, and may in the future, Mr. Frothingham makes an omission singular indeed for so clear-minded a man. He omits to say that, while in the past all these things, in the Bible or out, were consigned by religious teachers to the realms of miracle and supernaturalism, Spiritualists believe and teach that they are natural, and in accordance with laws strict as Science can ask for; never to be accepted as authority; that spirits, while in a world of higher conditions, are yet fallible, and may and do err; that reason, conscience, intuition, and every faculty of the soul, are to be free to "prove all things" in this or the other world, "and hold fast that which is good."

No trance-speaker is accepted as authority; no book of "alleged revelations" asks or gets blind acceptance on that ground. On the broad scale the million of Spiritualists in this country have reached a higher measure of freedom of thought than any other equal number of persons; and this emancipation, this royal exercise of their own powers, is the grand result of their knowledge of spirit-presence and communication, and of the great awakening of thought, intuition, reason, and aspiration which has come with the Spiritual Philosophy. This is my conviction, and in uttering it I do not ignore weakness and absurdity among those who call themselves Spiritualists.

The past has caught dim glimpses of the spirit-life through the haze of superstition, and priests and soothsayers have used their bleared visions for their own base ends. The present is beginning to see that spirit-life in the light of love and spiritual freedom, and to test the rich gleams that come from "beyond the veil" by the exercise of judgment and conscience.

Is not this far more and better than "an opening through which any kind of a delusion may come in?"

Richest gifts of power and character may be perverted to basest ends, but the abuse is no argument against the use.

If Christian and other teachings led us to view spirits as angels, illuminated in some supernatural way, let us learn better by the help of a host of intelligent Spiritualists who have put away these childish teachings.

Mr. Frothingham, professing eminent reverence for individual judgment, refused an exchange with a trance-speaker because he considered "the method irrational and dangerous;" but the danger and irrational methods of Orthodoxy do not prevent the Free Religious Association from inviting its clergy to their platform. Were it not well for Mr. F. to give even trance-speakers a hearing, and leave his audience to judge for themselves?

[It should not be forgotten in this connection that Mr. Frothingham, as one of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association, joined in inviting to their platform such Spiritualists as Robert Dale Owen, Prof. Denton, Miss Lizzie Doten, Mrs. Cora Tappan, &c. His objection in this case was only against trance-speaking, which for the time being extinguishes the speaker's "individual judgment." In Mr. Frothingham's absence from America, we say this in justice to him.—Ed.]

A suggestion is made to Spiritualists to avoid "be-lug at war with good sense." It might be fair on their behalf to suggest that, while it is well to avoid and outgrow dogmatism and superstition, the poorest method of such avoidance is to live in the chill realms of logic, and miss the light and life and warmth of the primal and growing instincts and wants of humanity, so that logic becomes poor and reason loses somewhat of its grand power from want of this light and warmth, which come only from a full culture and harmonious exercise of every mental and spiritual faculty.

"We must, at all costs, be rid of superstition," it is said, and we are told—"Let us prefer to have no other world, than to have it full of troublesome, meddling beings, who interfere with the rational order of the world we dwell in."

To get rid of superstition the soul must have full scope to reach out and up, and find what shall meet its hopes and aspirations. While this poor picture of the Life Beyond may be a reflection of distempered fancies, it is not at all the ideal of a larger life, rich in opportunities, abundant in works of love and wisdom, and helpful in hours of need to us still struggling in the battle of life, which gives hope and strength to many Spiritualists.

As to the influence of spirits over mortals, I have no fears but that self-centred and noble souls, in the body or out, will gain from the good and overcome the bad; and no doubt Lowell spoke the truth, as the true poet ever utters what is deepest and most divine within him, when he said:—

"We see but half the causes of our deeds.
Seeking them wholly in the outer world,
Unconscious of the spirit-world, which, though
Unseen, is felt, and sows in us the germs
Of pure and world-wide purposes."

I have used the terms Spiritualist, and so forth, for convenience' sake, not because I like them, or claim within them any monopoly of truth. To Mr. Frothingham and the noble company of the Free Religious men and women the world owes much, and there is a unity of spirit in all who seek light and freedom. With such, comment or criticism is not crimination, but truth-seeking.

G. B. S.

We met with a witty and unanswerable retort in a sketch of a short trip through a portion of Ireland. The writer is conversing with his car driver:—

"You are a Catholic, Jimmy?"

"Yes, your honor."

"And you pray to the Virgin Mary?"

"I do, your honor."

"Well, there's no doubt she was a good woman. The Bible says so. But she may have been no better than your mother or mine."

"That's thrue, your honor. But then you'll allow there's a mighty difference in their children."—Ed.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

RIFLES, SHOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS, Gun Material. Write for Price List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [83-108.]

WANTED—A SITUATION. The subscriber, who has had several years experience in teaching such studies as are generally pursued at Massachusetts High Schools, and also in giving piano-forte lessons, would accept a moderate compensation at a place where Bible-reading is not required in school, and where no attempt would be made to interfere with his religious convictions or with the management of his school. Address A. D. JACKSON, care of SAMUEL JACKSON, JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS. 78-88

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 78tf

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 78tf

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 684 B.C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 78-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88yl

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE, BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,
Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.
D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

PUBLICATIONS
OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is especially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on the "RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahma Somaj;" also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England;" and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infidelity: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

THE TWO DOCTRINES OF THE BIBLE ON SABBATH-KEEPING: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS CONCERNING SABBATH-KEEPING: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.

"It Injures Our Business?": Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?
Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.
These four for 10 cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
7041 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Publisher & Bookseller,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

The Origin of Species, By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
The Descent of Man, By DARWIN, 2 vols, each.... 2 00
Wallace on Natural Selection, (London)..... 2 00
Mivart on the Genesis of Species..... 1 00
Man's Place in Nature, By HUXLEY..... 1 25
Origin of Species, By HUXLEY..... 1 00
Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condition of Man, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
The Earthward Pilgrimage, By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
History of European Morals, from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols, 8vo..... 6 00
Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
Chips from a German Workshop, By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
The Old Roman World, By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
Short Studies on Great Subjects, By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE..... 1 50
Lecture on Calvinism, By the same..... 75
The Heavens, An illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
Words and their Uses, By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
Steps of Belief, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
Nature and Life, By Rev. ROBERT COLLYER..... 1 50
Sartor Resartus, By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edition..... 90
The Choice of Books, Same..... 75
Essays of Elia, By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
Thoughts about Art, By PHILLIP GILBERT HAMERTON..... 2 00
Words of Weight on the Woman Question, (London)..... 2 25
The Friendships of Woman, By W. R. ALGER... 2 00
A Day by the Fire, LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
Sanctum Sanctorum, THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
Carlyle's Essays, Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
Among My Books, By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 2 vols..... 5 00
Society and Solitude, By the same..... 2 00
Topics of the Times, By JAMES PARTON..... 2 00
Success and its Conditions, By E. P. WHIPPLE... 1 50
Literature and Life, By same..... 1 50
Tablets, By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
Companions of My Solitude, By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
Organization in Daily Life, Same..... 1 50
Realms, By the same..... 1 50
War and Culture, By same..... 1 50
Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms, By same..... 1 25
Ten Great Religions, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
Light and Electricity, By TYNDALL..... 1 25
Our Girls, By DIO LEWIS..... 1 50
Studies in Literature, By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read,—NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
Principles of Psychology, By HERBERT SPENCER..... 2 50
American Religion, By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
Fragments Of Science For Unscientific People, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Light Science For Leisure Hours, By R. A. PROCTOR... 3 00
Handbook Of Legendary And Mythological Art, By Mrs. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 3 50
Hereditary Genius—Its Laws and Consequences, By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
The Races of The Old World, By CHAS. L. BRACE..... 2 00
Little Women, By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
Wallace's Review Of Darwin's Descent Of Man, PAPER..... 25
Heat as a Mode of Motion, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Buechner on Force and Matter, (London Print)..... 3 75
Essays, By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE..... 1 00
Aristotle's Ethics, (Bohn's Edition)..... 2 00
France before Europe, By MICHELET..... 1 00
Roman Imperialism and Other Essays, By J. R. SEELEY, Author of "Ecce Homo"..... 1 50
The Republic of Plato..... 1 25
The Book of Golden Thoughts, By HENRY ATWELL... 1 25
Colton's Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words..... 1 25
Consolations of Travel, or The Last Days of a Philosopher, By SIR HUMPHREY DAVY..... 1 50
The Poetical Works of HOOD, WORDSWORTH, SHELLEY, KEATS, MOORE, SCOTT, BYRON, full gilt, and on tinted paper, each only..... 1 75

Address,
HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher and Bookseller,
Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.
N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:
Locky's History of European Morals, 2 vols.....$6.00
Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols...5.00
Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols.....5.00
Weiss's Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, 2 volumes.....6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870 (price $2.50). Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):
Darwin's Origin of Species, price.....$2.00
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price.....2.00
Essays in Criticism, by Matthew Arnold, price.....2.00
Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, with portrait, price.....2.00
Any volume of the writings of Theodore Parker or Henry D. Thoreau, each.....2.00
On the Heights, Auerbach.....2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.
For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.
For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.
For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.
For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones.....	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. R. S. D.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Hum of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac H. Wise.....	48
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 31.

TOLEDO, OHIO, AUGUST 5, 1871.

WHOLE No. 84.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY]

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

TRIFLES.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, April 23, 1871.]

"The unremitting retention of simple and high sentiments in obscure duties is hardening the character to that temper which will work with honor, if need be, in the tumult or on the scaffold."

EMERSON, Essay on Heroism.

In that incomparable satire, "Gulliver's Travels," Dean Swift wrecks his hero on the shore of a country inhabited by pigmies. Exhausted by fatigue, Gulliver flings himself on the ground and falls asleep. During the long hours of his slumber, the pigmies bind him hand and foot to the ground on which he lies. On awakening, he endeavors to rise, but discovers himself to be securely fettered by myriads of tiny threads, any one of which, taken singly, he might snap asunder by the careless motion of his finger, but which by their multitude become strong as links of iron and rivets of brass. His struggles are all futile. The great "Man Mountain" lies at the mercy of his puny foes.

Such is the power of trifles. "It is only a trifle!" says the fool, and is overcome; but the wise man keeps on the watch, and escapes. In a large view of things, there is no trifle; everything is important, and tells appreciably on results,—appreciably, that is, by an intelligence vast enough to appreciate. But it often takes a vision more piercing than that of the eagle to see from the beginning to the end, from the cause to the effect. Hence we speak of trifles as if they existed, not knowing that we thereby make confession of our ignorance, and simply betray our own blindness to the "large relations of little things." In taking "trifles," therefore, as my morning's subject, I wish to show that they cannot wisely be despised,—that the greatest errors of thought, the greatest lapses of conduct, and the chief miseries of life, have frequently, if not always, their real origin in disregarded trifles. In our intellects, our consciences, our lives, we are snared and captured, like Gulliver, by the multiplicity of little things.

1. First, then, I would make a plea for accuracy of thought, and, as a means to this, exactitude in the use of words. It is customary, I know, to think that the analysis of words, the definition of them and the precise determination of what they mean, is work only for lexicographers and pedants and logical hairsplitters. Hundreds of times, for instance, has it been said or written to me that I make a very useless fuss over the word "Christian;" that names are of no consequence in comparison with realities, etc., etc. Now, as a matter of fact, it is those who are resolved to retain the word "Christian" at all hazards, and to discover some fine-spun interpretation of it, remote from its meaning in the mouths of the people, that shall justify them in retaining it, who show the strongest interest in the word. If they did not feel internally that the name "Christian" has great value in many respects, socially and otherwise, why should they take the trouble they do to make labored reconciliations of it with radical ideas, and thus to prove themselves authorized to make it stand for principles the exact opposite to those it has stood for from the beginning of Christian history? If they really held it to be the trifle they say it is, they would be indifferent whether they retained it or not. But their conduct shows that they deceive themselves in saying it is a trifle.

Nor is it a trifle, in point of fact. Names and words are symbols of thought, and are absolutely indispensable to all expression of thought. Just as in algebra the correctness of the results obtained depends wholly on the correctness and consistency with which the algebraic symbols are employed, so in all statements the correctness of the ideas conveyed depends wholly on the accuracy with which words are used. The hearer or reader may fail to appreciate their force, as many persons would fail to understand algebraic equations; but nevertheless the words of common speech are just as much symbols as the x , y , z , of the algebraist, and, if loosely used, serve only to bewilder and mislead. Hence I hold the writer or speaker who is lax or careless in the use of words, or who professes indifference to their exact and proper meaning, to be one of those who befool themselves and help to befool the world. The trifles they despise make all the difference between error and truth. Socrates well said:—"Be well assured, most excellent Crito, that to use words improperly is both to be unjust to the thing itself and to do some injury to our own souls." So also Confucius said:—"What is necessary is to rectify names. If names be not correct, language is not in accordance with the truth of things. If language be not in accordance with the truth of things, affairs cannot be carried on to success. Therefore a superior man considers it necessary that the names he uses may be spoken appropriately, and also that what he speaks may be carried out appropriately. What the superior man requires is just that in his words there may be nothing incorrect." [Analec., XIII, 3.]

Accuracy in the use of words, however, vitally important as it is to every writer, reader, speaker, and hearer, is only a means to an end, namely, accuracy of thought. The more accurately an inaccurate thought is expressed, the worse for those who listen or peruse. The great object of all education is to prevent inaccuracy of thought. Knowledge is accurate thought; ignorance is inaccurate thought. Truth being the correspondence of thought with things, and error being a want of this correspondence, it is plain that any inaccuracy of our thought lands us in error instead of truth; and if we once start with an error, no matter how trivial, the farther we proceed, so much the farther we diverge from truth's strait and narrow path. To call any inaccuracy of thought, therefore, a trifle, is really to despise truth itself, and to put ignorance and folly on a par with knowledge and wisdom.

Now the one great aim of science is to discover truth,—that is, to correct the inaccuracies and extend the domain of our thinking. No man can claim to be scientific who looks on any error of thought as trivial; for the scientific man, above all others, knows how unspeakably important it is to know the exact truth. A seemingly infinitesimal error is frequently enough to vitiate the most elaborate investigations, and practically to frustrate years of toil. Science knows no such things as trifles. The minutest details of fact she values and treasures up; the most insignificant correction of an observation she considers of vast importance; the suspected existence of an error, however microscopic in quantity, she regards as sufficient reason for laborious experimentation, calculation and re-calculation, until the error is either discovered or proved not to exist. In fact, it is science itself that is showing mankind the folly of holding that there is any such thing as a trifle. All her triumphs are due to her principle that in the economy of Nature nothing is trivial, nothing is unimportant. The astounding accuracy of her measurements and weights, to which she is indebted for her magnificent discoveries of the phenomena and laws of the universe, has been born of her profound reverence for trifles. In proportion as she perfects her instruments and methods of research, new wonders are revealed to her patient inquiries; and by endlessly repeated experiences she has learned that infinitesimal errors of observation often stand between her and the most splendid results. Hence she labors with unwearying assiduity to be absolutely accurate in observation, calculation, and reasoning. She has learned never to echo that fool's motto—"It is only a trifle."

For instance, one of the most important and intensely interesting problems of astronomy is to determine the distance of the sun from the earth. This distance is not yet known with exactitude, though indispensable to the solution of numerous dependent problems. To the approaching transits of Venus over the sun's disc, which will take place in 1874 and 1882, and afterwards will not be repeated for more than a century, astronomers look forward most anxiously as the surest means of determining this distance. By a series of careful and most ingeniously devised observations they hope to be able to measure precisely the angle formed by two lines drawn from the sun's centre to two carefully selected points on the earth's surface. This angle is the sun's parallax; and from this, together with the length of the base line drawn between the two selected points of observation, the sun's distance can be calculated. There are the greatest difficulties to be overcome in discovering the exact value of this parallactic angle; yet on the exactitude of its measurement depends not only the determination of the sun's distance, but also of his size and weight, of the dimensions of the solar spots, of the distances of the outer planets and the fixed stars, and many other points of the first importance. The answer to all these vital questions depends on discovering the exact degree of divergence between the two lines drawn from the sun's centre to the two points of observation on the earth. The minutest error in the measurement of this angle will cause an error of millions of miles in our estimate of the sun's distance, and consequently vast errors in the other quantities depending on it; and you can conceive what anxiety is felt by astronomers that the measurement shall be exact. If an error is made, will any astronomer call it a trifle?

Now this is the spirit of science in all kinds of investigation. In fact, science wages "war to the knife" against every species of inaccuracy in human thought; and its victories are the establishment of positive knowledge. Whoever, therefore, despises accuracy either of thought or of expression, and thinks that errors in either of these are mere trifles, betrays his own utterly unscientific spirit, his own utter incapacity to be a teacher of mankind. What we need is men who shall make us thoroughly ashamed of our looseness of language, looseness of conception, looseness of reasoning, and stimulate us to acquire accuracy in all these respects as the prime condition of real knowledge. Verbose, muddy-minded, conceited rhetoricians and wind-bags are simply a public nuisance. They should be made to vacate the instructor's platform, and occupy the learner's bench. They are the pigmies that by innumerable chains of error bind humanity to the ground.

2. We have the warrant of science, then, for declaring that there are no such things as intellectual trifles, and that exactitude of thought and expression cannot be too strictly demanded. Are there any such things as moral trifles?

To this question educated conscience gives as decided a negative as science gives to the other. The law of the ideal recognizes no distinction between great and small offences in respect to moral quality, however they may differ in degree. Wrong is wrong, and right is right. The court of Nature sits forever, without appeal, and the commission of evil is followed by instantaneous condemnation. Whoever violates the mandate of his own soul is a culprit forthwith, and his plea that the offence is only a trifle brings no mitigation of the penalty. It may well be that the offender is unconscious of the sentence at the time; but there is a heavier penalty than pain. Dereliction is deterioration. Nobody ever evaded that law, as men evade an act of Congress. Still less did any one ever "drive a coach and six through it," as men do through human statutes. Felt or unfelt, the lash descends, and the blood is drawn at every stroke. The moral trifles, as we exculpatingly term them to ourselves, are poison to our character, and we grow worse while we turn a deaf ear to the stifled remonstrances in our own breasts. Persistence in practices which we feel to be a descent below our proper moral level becomes the death-warrant to our nobility. The great axe of the guillotine falls, and the dripping head of our ideal tumbles into the basket. I know of no murder so pitiable and tragic, as this execution of the ideal in a young soul. Devastated France offers no spectacle to the eye of humanity more irretrievably sad. He who has once learned to call any wrong a trifle, and to treat it as a permissible peccadillo, has entered a path which tunnels the twilight to emerge in night. What moral recuperations may be possible if a longer term be allowed us in the Hereafter we dream of, it passes my skill to guess.

But that men here do seemingly extinguish the inner light of aspiration, and imbrute themselves by willing adoption of degraded codes of conduct, is a fact from which I would gladly shield my eyes, if it were lawful ever to blink a truth.

Yet this transmutation of metals, reversing the alchemist's hope and changing gold into lead, is a work of time, and begins in every instance with contempt of moral trifles. The neglected promise ripens into the conscious lie; the accidental error in a bill, detected but left uncorrected, passes into the wilful overcharge, and this into the artful swindle; the cowardly or politic suppression of conviction develops into a contempt for truth itself and a sacrifice of all noble manhood for "success" as the supreme good; the tacit acquiescence in perceived injustice becomes at last cruel and hard oppression of the poor. And so on. Out of the moral trifle sprouts the Upas sin; and all that is living, beautiful, and sweet perishes seemingly from the arid character. Alas, what deed should so start our pitying tears as this slow suicide of the soul? Moral trifles—that is the key to this history that I wish I might call fiction.

Emerson thus tells a similar story:—"We have seen or heard of many extraordinary young men who never ripened, or whose performance in actual life was not extraordinary. When we see their air and mien, when we hear them speak of society, of books, of religion, we admire their superiority; they seem to throw contempt on our entire polity and social state; theirs is the tone of a youthful giant, who is sent to work revolutions. But they enter an active profession, and the forming Colossus shrinks to the common size of man. The magic they used was the ideal tendencies, which always make the Actual ridiculous; but the tough world had its revenge the moment they set their horses of the sun to plough its furrows. They found no example and no companionship, and their heart fainted. What then? The lesson they gave in their first aspirations is yet true; and a better valor and a purer truth shall one day organize their belief. . . . Oh friend, never strike sail to a fear! Come into port greatly, or sail with God the seas. Not in vain you live, for every passing eye is cheered and refined by the vision."

Such will he never be who sleeps while the multitudinous pigmies of despised moral trifles lash him to the kindred dirt.

3. Lastly, I find a species of trifles I know hardly how to classify, but will call trifles of common life,—trifles indeed, though magnified into mountains in the average opinion. I mean the swarming host of paltry cares, anxieties, hopes, fears, desires, schemes, interests, that make us the slaves of the passing hour, and thus chain us hand and foot to the earth. We kneel so long among the rubbish of life, and pore so intently on the ground, that we cannot straighten ourselves up without a severe twinge of the back-ache. We suffer Care to spin like a spider her gossamer toils about us, until she has wrapped us in an infrangible web and begun to suck the best blood in our veins. It is disastrous folly to mortgage so much of our happiness to that which we cannot keep within our own control. It is wisdom not to harness oneself into one's own wagon. Better dispose of the vehicle, if a horse is beyond our means. I regret to see one bury himself in daily cares and omnivorous occupations that devour all his strength and zeal for ideas. A life contracted to the narrow circle of selfish interests loses all its breadth and beauty; it becomes supremely uninteresting, and wholly unproductive of inspiration to the world. It is participation in universal interests that lends to human souls their supreme dignity. Who cares for him who cares only for himself? Yet what a benediction follows to the grave him whose life has enriched the lives of all about him! We are of value to humanity precisely as we make humanity of value to ourselves. The devotion to veritable trifles, which makes so many men and women querulously rotate like humming-tops about their own axis, and take no part in the larger movements of their kind, is a species of infatuation with the particular, the private, and the valueless; it sunders the universal ties of humanity, and infects the character with the dry rot of selfishness. There can be no grandeur, no beauty, no permanent interest, in a life which thus pours itself into a hole in the ground. For all the good that incidentally results from it, men thank the inevitable laws that utilize the meanness of the mean, and turn it, like compost, to universal account. To immerse oneself in the petty details of one's own concerns, so as to lose the quick sympathies of social progress and a living brotherhood with the world, and feel no conscious identity with that universal Life which breathes into every noble soul a sentiment of oneness with all intelligent being, is to limit self to veritable trifles, and reproduce on the stage of real life the old farce of Gulliver.

But do not suppose I would underrate the importance of small duties. Life is a sum of infinitesimals. Yet we poorly live it unless we discover in it the infinite also. The regular routine of the counting-house, the office, the factory, the store, the minutiae of household drudgery, the care of children, the regularly recurring tasks that are known as "chores,"—these are all duties, and take on dignity when viewed as involving universal obligations. I only protest against a ruinous subdivision of ourselves, or the drowning of great ideas in a deluge of petty details. Unless we lift our thoughts to the universal and the eternal, we fail to do justice even to the temporary and the particular. The importance of the obscure duties of life lies wholly in what we put into them,—in the spirit with which we encounter them. A grand remembrance of the sacredness of all duty in the most toilsome items of human experience, gives majesty to the trivial, and lifts what were otherwise trifles indeed into opportunities for the exercise of sublime virtues. This temper in the performance of small tasks saves them from triviality, and relieves us from the worry, fret, anxiety, vexation, irritation, distraction, that too often overwhelm the impatient heart. What high-minded woman could endure a life of unending washing of dishes and darning of stockings, of dusting, sweeping, scouring, sewing, cooking, if noble love for husband and child did not flavor these irksome cares with divine sweetness? What high-minded man could endure the wrangles of competition, the pitched battles of human selfishness, the hateful turmoils of public life, the crazing din of the market, the exchange, the caucus, the court, the street, except for the thought of home and the hope that others will reap some benefit from his hard labors? Better still, if all this toiling and molling is seen to be part of the universal education of humanity,—if the weary soul forgets not that, before the stalk of the tulip can reach the air and sunlight, and crown itself with petals of gorgeous beauty, it must first push up from the bulb through the darkness and dampness of the loam. The cares of life, with all their annoyance and fatigue, are the soil from which the faithful soul extracts the elements of a divine and most precious perfume.

The real test of character lies in little things. It is not the overwhelming griefs or the great but rare emergencies of life, which best unveil the soul and show forth its true stature and proportions. Many a man can rise to the heights of occasion, and put forth a marvellous strength of will under excitement, who loses his equilibrium in the unostentatious battlefields of daily experiences. He vanquishes the giant, and then surrenders to the dwarf. It is not the oarsman who can make the most brilliant "spurt," and for a few moments lay out the most of muscular power, that wins the race; a competitor who relies on trained endurance and educated sinews is pretty sure to bear away the palm. A young engineer once told me that, being engaged in constructing a railway, he ordered a gang of Irishmen to carry some rails up a steep bank. The men boggled and shirked and made no headway, until, angered by their shiftlessness, he seized the rails himself, and bore them up the bank alone. But the next day, on attempting to carry them back, to his fresh surprise he found he could not lift them from the ground. These spasms of effort are not what accomplishes the great results of life. It is the steady conquest of trifles that at last ensures the great victory. Under the stimulus of sudden pressure, the mind will often evince a power unsuspected by itself; but when the excitement subsides, it has been only weakened by the effort. True moral strength must be developed by constant warfare with the trifles of daily life, and cannot always be inferred from the composure men exhibit under the stress of a sudden grief or a great crisis. The test of heroism is at home. It is the little frictions of common experience, the temptations to small deceptions, the wear and tear of small anxieties, the nettle-stings of small provocations, the thorn-like asperities of small disappointments, that constitute the crucial test of character. He who is trained to victory in this school is a conqueror indeed. The spirit which remains unroughened by the raspings of petty trifles is steel of the finest temper and hardest grain. Many a hunter who would face unflinchingly the onset of a mad-dened lion would run in dismay from a nest of hornets. He who can vanquish such foes has learned the art of war.

If we find ourselves immersed in these trifles of common life, to the great detriment of our spiritual dignity and worth, I see no way to escape drowning but to get out of the water. The first step in the cure of the narrow selfishness thus engendered is to go to work for others—to identify ourselves with interests larger than our own. The effort required is the very medicine we need. What concerns self most nearly is naturally enough most interesting; but an interest in the progress and welfare of our race, in the large movements of human thought and the gradual advancement of human civilization, can be acquired by any one who will vigorously take hold and help. The trifles will suffocate all noble character, if they master it; and it is action, not dreaming, that must come to the rescue. A man who has not heart enough to give either time, money, or strength to the promotion of some great cause, is one of the hopelessly asphyxiated. But he who is willing to do his part of the work laid upon his race, will find that the universal fountain is opened in his own soul. The weariness, the pain, the labor, with which he fights his way out of the entanglement of purely selfish ambitions and concerns, become the educating discipline by which moral majesty is won. Looking for no reward, the reward is nevertheless great. It is a privilege not to be bought with gold, to carry in our breast the consciousness that, if death knocks at the door tomorrow, we can cheerfully go with him whithersoever he may lead, saying in brave and simple truth—"I have lived a noble life." Death has no javelin for him who has thus made himself invulnerable—no sting for him who has thus by his own virtue extracted it. To such as he, death comes only as a friend.

Many years ago, in company with a friend, I climbed Mt. Wachusett. Until the summit was nearly reached, the path wound through thick woods, whose interlacing boughs and leaves only here and there gave glimpses of the glorious landscape beyond, and caused many an impatient anticipation. At last we emerged upon the uncovered crown of the noble mountain, and drank in the beauty of the scene. From the low and level South to the giant peaks of the White Mountains on the North, from the ragged ridges of the Hoosacs on the West to the flashing waters of Cape Cod Bay on the East, the panorama of the Great Artist lay outstretched before our awed and silent gaze. Then I thanked the tantalizing leaves and twigs which had hitherto concealed that vision of enchantment, and rewarded our brief suspense with so surpassingly grand a surprise.

When we have climbed this mountain of our human life, and stand upon the highest peak of time,—when the splendor of the unrevealed breaks freshly upon our view, and the boundless panorama of eternity lies open to our gaze,—may we not be grateful to the trifles that hid awhile the glory of the unguessed future, and crowned a brief though painful toil with the full burst of its magnificence upon our vision? I know not. But so runs my dream.

"I stand on high,
Close to the sky,
Kissed by unsullied lips of light—
Fanned by soft airs
That seem like prayers,
Floating to God through ether bright.

Wind-swept and bare,
The fields of air
Give the weaned eagles room for play;
On mightier wing,
My soul doth spring
To unseen summits far away."

THE SUNDAY LAW AGITATION.

[From the Cincinnati Commercial.]

It has been decided by the highest tribunal in the State that the observance of the Sabbath can be legally enforced only as a police or municipal regulation. The fact that it is a Christian duty to keep the day holy can not be recognized by the Commonwealth. The fact, affirmed by all orthodox believers, that the Bible enjoins its observance, is one with which the State has nothing to do. The Legislature might select any other day of the week, and by statute forbid common labor on that day, and make a violation of the law punishable by fine and possibly by imprisonment. The question is now raised whether the State has the power claimed for it. Can it make it unlawful to do that on one day of the week which it is lawful to do on any other day? The pretension to such power is seriously questioned; and if we understand the purpose of the organization perfected in Arbeiter Hall, it is proposed to test the power of the State to interrupt the progress of lawful occupations by police or municipal restrictions.

Separate the question from its religious bearings; consider it only in the light in which the Supreme Court affirms it must be judicially regarded; make it a simple question whether the State has inherent right to interfere and suspend the lawful business of a citizen for any given period of time, and without indemnification for the loss of time and profits, and the Sunday laws would hang by a thread so slender that it would be a miracle if they were sustained a moment.

We have at least three holidays in the year—Christmas, New Year, and the Fourth of July. They are observed with greater or less strictness, by common consent. There is no law respecting them, unless it be such statutes as make grace days of the payment of bank and certain other monetary obligations. Let us suppose the Legislature, recognizing the popular custom, and, convinced that we are a sadly overworked people and need more days of rest than are noted in the calendars, should authorize their observance, and make it a punishable offense to labor during their continuance. How long would the people tolerate such restrictions? What Court would sustain the action of the Legislature?

Yet if the State may legally except one day in every seven, and enjoin its recreative or restful observance, asserting its right so to do as inhering in its municipal power, there is no limitation to the right, except that of reason, and it may as justly enforce respect for national and other holidays as for Sundays. The proposition that we need more than one-seventh of the time for rest might be very stoutly maintained. A seventh of the time for rest was sufficient in a period of the world's history when men rather vegetated than thought or labored, and when longevity was reckoned by centuries rather than years.

But however evident the proposition might be made, has the State the right to set apart a fifth instead of a seventh of the time for relaxation, and prevent the citizen who may think he is in neither physical nor mental need of that amount of repose? Is the State empowered, in short, to become the sanitary guardian of the individual, and make laws regulating his hours of rest and labor? If it have the power to legislate for the prolongation of life, and the improvement of the general health of the citizens of the commonwealth, why should it stop with mere elementary laws? Why not legislate also as to the amount and quality of the food to be taken into the system, and decide by law what is hurtful, and therefore forbidden for us to eat or drink? The Spartans paid great attention to physical development. Marriage between persons hereditarily or chronically diseased were forbidden, and children who were likely to grow up deformed or so physically invalidated as to become a burden to the State or a charge to their friends were legally killed. If the law did not expressly order them to be destroyed, it encouraged their destruction by its silence. The result was undoubtedly advantageous in this respect, that only able-bodied men and women were produced, of such strength and beauty of proportion and physical function that they have been the admiration of all later times.

The power of the State to step into the family and social circle, dictating for the general good what should be done or omitted, what should be eaten and what worn, who should be permitted to grow to manhood or be destroyed in infancy, was not disputed. But we have different ideas now. Individual freedom to think, speak and act, so that the rights of none are encroached upon, is the central idea of free government. Whatever it is lawful to do at one time, it should be lawful to do at all times; it being left to the good sense and conscience of the citizen to determine when to do and when to abstain from doing. This growth of individual freedom is the most remarkable trait of modern civilization and government, and it will continue to develop until perfect liberty within the bounds of laws preventing individual encroachments upon common rights is attained.

The Sunday laws are now so far in arrears of popular sentiment that practically they are a dead-letter. Now and then we have a zealous magistrate who thinks it a part of his duty to revive and apply them, and he proceeds to select out of them certain ones whose enforcement he thinks will tally with the feelings and convictions of enough people to sustain him in his righteous effort. He knows that he can not enforce these laws and regulations impartially; it is no longer practicable. He may shut up some shops; he can not close all. He may arrest the distribution of beer, he can not stop the sale of milk. He may enjoin the running of street cars and omnibuses; he can not close the stables which hire vehicles for pay. He finds himself acting partially and in the opinion of many arbitrarily, and involved in absurdities of action from which neither the excellence of his motive nor the weakness of his head can free him. And the end of his labor is vanity and vexation of spirit.

If the advocates of Sunday laws put their defence of them on religious grounds, the question assumes quite another phase. They do this in popular discussion and declamation. They dare not venture upon that sort of defence in the Courts. They know the ground is untenable, and must remain so until they wed Church with State, and make legislation as to moral duties at least depend upon ecclesiastical decisions and theological codes. When that is done, there will be an end of secular civil government, and an end also of that political and social freedom which has been wrested from power after long toil and centuries of suffering and bloodshed.

THE COOLIE TRADE.

[From the Shanghai (China) News-Letter, of May 11, 1871.]

The persistent efforts of the Anglo-Chinese press in exposing the hideous character of the coolie traffic has driven that nefarious business to the care of those flags that are still implicated in the African slave trade; and now, a case having come within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Hong-kong, the subject is likely to attract sufficient attention of all governments whose citizens reside in China. It must be obvious to the treaty powers that foreigners can never be safe in China so long as man-stealing continues to be a source of revenue to any of their number. This is the case with Portugal, through her colony at Macao. American and English vessels have long been debarred from transporting kidnapped Chinamen, but the protection of other flags renders the evil as rife as ever. The case which brought this matter before a British Court was a demand of rendition made by the Canton authorities for a coolie who had escaped from the Nouvelle Penelope, the captain and crew of which were slain at sea by coolie passengers, that is to say, imprisoned slaves.

Chief Justice Smale's decision must afford gratification to every humane mind, accompanied as it was by a searching examination of the whole subject. For not only was the coolie set free, but the seizure of the Nouvelle Penelope, and destruction of captain and crew by the kidnapped men, was justified. In his judgment the Chief Justice raised the question of the right of an owner of property against a robber, to take from the robber, by force and at the risk of life, property when it is feloniously withheld, and whether a man whose person is stolen, whose liberty is gone, has not the same right to take the life of the robber of his person and liberty, in order to recover its absolute possession. "To me," says the Chief Justice, "in the absence of argument to the contrary, the mere statement of the question answers itself in favor of the prisoner." Such a dictum is enough to take the breath out of a judge of the Taney school.

In an elaborate course of reasoning the Judge made out that the coolie trade differs in no material respect from the slave trade; the slave trade is piracy, and a capital offence. "Had the Nouvelle Penelope been a British ship carrying these coolies on the high seas, the captain would have been subject to suffer death, as pirates, felons and robbers upon the seas ought to suffer." According to an act of George IV, the penalty has been lessened to a period of transportation for not less than thirteen years.

While newspaper statements of the atrocities of the coolie trade do not go far in directing to it governmental attention, these facts respecting it which are laid before the world by a Supreme Court can scarcely fail to move Cabinet Ministers. Necessity is clearly laid on the treaty powers of compelling Portugal to abandon a traffic which is like a perpetual war on China, and which places every foreign interest in this land in jeopardy.

The Nouvelle Penelope case may be taken as a fair illustration of the horrors which attend man-stealing in China. After being collected in different portions of the Canton province by kidnapping, or by fraudulent representations, they were crammed, 310 in number, in a barracoon at Macao, from which they were conveyed by Portuguese soldiers to the vessel and placed under hatches. When allowed to appear on deck they found themselves restricted to the forward part of the ship, there being between the main and mizzen masts a barrier, which was seven or eight feet high and four feet thick. This barrier was guarded by cannon at the doors; in short, all the appliances of a slave were in requisition. Suicide, to which the coolies often resort after being shipped, was carefully guarded against. Notwithstanding which two jumped overboard at sea, one of whom found rest, the other was recovered. At length, driven to despair, when three days out, they rose, killed the captain and several of the crew, and put the ship back to China, by which many escaped. According to English law, as interpreted by Chief Justice Smale, the coolies committed no crime in striking for liberty, but the French Consul at Canton demanded their arrest and execution. Sixteen poor wretches, all who could be discovered, were sent down with great display to Macao for decapitation. An islet was selected for the ceremony in the harbor, which enabled the Lusitanians to have a full view of the spectacle. One whom they had failed to capture made his escape to Hong-kong, whence his rendition was demanded by the Vice-Roy of Canton, evidently under pressure from the French Consul, and in consequence, in part at least, of the Tien-tsin massacre. To the gratification of the entire foreign community, he was after a protracted trial set at liberty.

Few are aware of the magnitude of this iniquitous traffic. Within a short period, half-a-dozen or more ships, carrying above three thousand coolies, have been seized and destroyed by the miserable captives.

"Will men," asks the Chief Justice, "who believe there is a Providence, not see a Nemesis in these events?" In conclusion, he said, "I hope this matter will be, as I believe it certainly will be, investigated in Europe, that we may all receive such light and instruction as we each require, and so that what is right may hereafter prevail," nobly adding, "If I am wrong in the view I have taken of the matter, I shall bow respectfully to correction from competent authority, but until my decision is reversed, that decision is, and must be, the law of this Colony."

THE CLERGY STILL FOR OPPRESSION.—The question of the extradition of the Communists has been agitating the public mind in European countries, and especially in Belgium and England, ever since the fighting ceased. Belgium and Spain promised, on the demand of the French Government, to deliver up the refugees as criminals. Switzerland said that each case should be decided on its merits, and in England the matter is under advisement. There can hardly be a doubt, however, that the offences of the Communists are sufficiently political in their character to entitle them to the right of asylum. Their means, no doubt, were horrible, but then, if any foreign government undertook to decide what operations in civil war are justifiable or military merely, and what criminal, it would make the offer of refuge to political offenders which every constitutional government holds out farcical. There is hardly any ground on which the present French Government might demand the surrender of Puyat and Grousset on which they might not also demand that of the elderly criminal who is enjoying himself at Chislehurst, is the recipient of attentions at the hands of the royal family, and was presented the other day with a blasphemous address from a batch of clergymen, hoping he would go back and save France from an "infidel republic." There is not a member of the Central Committee who is not far more respectable than he; and that so much blood of the poor, and ignorant, and miserable should be flowing in the gutters of Paris while he was being patted on the back by courtiers and ministers of the Gospel in England, is one of the spectacles which do much to shake the faith of the masses in our system of morals, and make them ready tools in the hands of every incendiary and adventurer who gets a hearing from them.—N. Y. Nation.

CHARACTERISTIC ANECDOTE OF ALEXANDRE DUMAS.—After his son's great success with the "Dame aux Camelias," Alexandre wrote to him as though from a stranger, congratulating him on the book, and expressing a desire to make the author's acquaintance. "I myself am a literary man," said he, in conclusion, "and you may have heard my name as the author of 'Monte Christo.'" Dumas fils was equal to the occasion. He wrote immediately in reply, expressing the pleasure he would have in making his correspondent's acquaintance, principally on account of the high terms in which he had always heard his father speak of the author of "Monte Christo."

An Edinburgh paper says that, in these days of revival-services, it is to be expected that a variety of motives will operate in gathering audiences, but surely few would ever dream that the following—given as a literal fact—would find a place among them:—"Were you at the meeting last night, Nelly?" "Ay; I hadna muckle to do, an I thoct I micht as weel gang, as it would save the candle!"

In the Senate of the United States on Saturday, February 18th, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from further consideration of the petitions praying for an amendment to the Constitution recognizing the Christian religion. That body is evidently little inclined to listen to these religious appeals.—Iconoclast.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Please find enclosed two dollars, as I wish to renew my subscription for your paper for another year. Will you also have the kindness to change the address as follows My school-term is near its close, and I shall return to my home in the North in the course of two weeks. I was particularly pleased with the last number of THE INDEX. Mr. Potter's article on 'Southern Reconstruction' interested me much. I have been engaged in the work of educating the freed-people of the South for nearly six years, and have come to know that the greatest impediment to their progress is the church—the greatest demoralizer is a so-called religious revival. A curse of this kind came upon this community early this spring, and carried all before it. People were gathered into the church by scores. Little children only eight or nine years of age professed to have most wonderful experiences, and were seized and dragged inside the fold. Meetings were held until a late hour every night; and our scholars would come to school the next day with weary steps and listless looks. Those who became converted considered it a part of their religious duty to contribute their mite towards keeping up the credit of the church by circulating pious untruths about the infidels (meaning Miss — and myself), and warning others to beware of our influence. The pastor was particularly zealous on our account, denouncing us from the pulpit, and exhorting the parents not to send their children to our school; and what was still worse, encouraging the pupils themselves to disobey our rules. We lived through the storm, but at the expense of broken masts and torn sails. We had a few, a very few faithful friends to stand by us; and now the excitement is over, others are coming around us with loud professions. But I think we have learned which is dross and which pure metal. THE INDEX has been a great comfort to one through all. One of my pupils, a boy of sixteen, always takes it up to read when he comes in. Said I to him one day, 'My paper is very small, is it not?' 'Yes,' said he, 'but it has great things in it.' Please excuse the length of this letter; but I get impatient sometimes under religious persecution, and must give vent to my indignation."

"Allow me to give you an encouraging word. You need not fear for the success of THE INDEX, if you keep it up to the past. I consider it the very best advocate for religious freedom in existence. When you ask the Jew or the Catholic to meet us as sane men and women should, and talk of the difference of our opinions, it seems they can hardly refuse. When you have another Convention, as last fall, I will make an effort to meet the leaders of the Association. I feel deeply interested in the movement."

"Please find enclosed ten cents for THE INDEX for August 20, 1870, and February 4, 1871. Your discourse on 'Noise,' I have read several times. The pen picture is so real and so true that every earnest soul whose thoughts rise higher or whose sentiments sink deeper than the surface current of life, must find there its experience mirrored in most beautiful and fitting language. The poem in last week's issue of THE INDEX, 'The Child's Picture,' is a gem of tender thought. I would like to send both of the above named papers to a friend."

"Discontinue your paper to my name, and send it, if you please, to some one more in sympathy with your pernicious doctrines."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be suspended during the months of July and August. Special notice will be given of any occasional meetings that may be held.

DONATION.—The INDEX ASSOCIATION acknowledge with thanks the receipt of $2.00 from Mr. WILLARD TWITCHELL, Syracuse, N. Y., to be used in sending THE INDEX to some person unable to pay for it.

RECEIVED.

HISTORICAL MEMORANDA RELATIVE TO THE DISCOVERY OF ETHERIZATION, and to the Connection with it of the late Dr. WILLIAM T. G. MORTON. Prepared by the Committee of Citizens of Boston chosen to raise a Morton Testimonial Fund. Boston: Printed by RAND, AVERY & FRYE, 3 Cornhill. 1871. pp. 16.

THE DIVINITY OF HUMANITY. By A. W. STEVENS. Cambridge: Press of JOHN WILSON & SONS. 1871. pp. 16.

THE FEASIBILITY OF SINLESSNESS. A Sermon preached July 9th, 1871, in the Unitarian Church, Syracuse, N. Y., by Rev. JOSEPH MAY, of Newburyport, Mass.

THE JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY. July, 1871. St. Louis: E. P. GRAY, ST. LOUIS BOOK & NEWS CO.

AMERICAN JOURNAL OF MICROSCOPY. Devoted to the Elucidation of Scientific and Popular Microscopy. G. MEAD, Managing Editor. Chicago: E. SPEAKMAN & Co., Publishers, 182 South Clark Street.

PETERS' MUSICAL MONTHLY. August, 1871. J. L. PETERS, Publisher, 599 Broadway, New York.

Poetry,

GREEN RIVER.

Though forced to drudge for the dregs of men,
And scrawl strange words with the barbarous pen,
And mingle among the jostling crowd
Where the sons of strife are subtle and loud,
I often come to this quiet place
To breathe the airs that ruffle thy face,
And gaze upon thee in silent dream;
For, in thy lonely and lovely stream,
An image of that calm life appears
That won my heart in my greener years.

BRYANT.

The Index.

AUGUST 5, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

NOTICE—THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

THE subscribers to the Capital Stock of THE INDEX ASSOCIATION are hereby notified that a meeting of said subscribers will be held at the office of the Toledo Printing Company, 90 St. Clair street, on Thursday, the 17th day of August, at 7½ P. M., for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors, and adopting rules for the government of said incorporation.

E. P. BASSETT,
CALVIN CONE,
PETER H. BATESON,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
HENRY E. HOWE.

Toledo, O., July 8, 1871.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed; and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten	" 1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	" 1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	" 1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	" 1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	" 300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	" 300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	" 300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	" 300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	" 500
J. G. HOLZWARTH,	"	"	One	" 100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	" 100
C. AUCHARD,	"	"	"	" 100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	" 3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	" 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	O.,	Three	" 300
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	One	" 100
Miss A. HALL,	Defiance,	"	"	" 100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	" 100
J. SEDGEBER,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	" 100
CARL POST,	Painesville,	O.,	"	" 100
HENRY MILLER,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	" 300
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	" 500
J. L. WHITING,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	" 100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Boston,	"	"	" 100
J. E. SUTTON,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	" 100
S. I. DURKEE,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	" 100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	" 100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	" 1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	" 200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	" 200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	" 200
FRANK PRATHER,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
E. F. DINSMORE,	New York,	N. Y.,	One	" 100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	" 200
W. J. POTTER,	Middlefield,	Mass.,	Fourteen,	" 1,400
G. C. GLATTE,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three,	" 300
W. C. GANNETT,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	" 300
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	" 300
MISS E. EMERSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	" 100

$22,600

SPENCER'S "PSYCHOLOGY."

The first volume of Herbert Spencer's "Principles of Psychology," following the "First Principles" and the two volumes of "Principles of Biology," constitutes the fourth in the series of ten volumes which are designed to set forth the entire system of this indefatigable thinker. It comprises five Parts, devoted to "Objective Psychology," together with an Appendix; and in the second volume of this department of his philosophy, Mr. Spencer intimates that he shall consider "Subjective Psychology." It is greatly to be hoped that the gigantic undertaking which he has marked out for himself may be ultimately accomplished, and that this man of almost miraculous industry and patience may live to behold his ten volumes finished—his life-monument built. Whatever shall be the final verdict of posterity concerning the adequacy of his system as an all-inclusive philosophy of the universe, there can be no question that it will be reckoned one of the noblest achievements of the century, entitling its author to an enduring fame.

It is manifestly impossible to attempt a criticism of this philosophy, or even of the single volume before us, in THE INDEX. Whoever has any curiosity to learn our opinion of the preceding two volumes will find it in the North American Review for October, 1868, in an article on "Philosophical Biology," to which Mr. Spencer has published an elaborate reply in his pamphlet on "Spontaneous Generation." We regard his philosophy as open to criticism on vital and fundamental points; and we are confirmed in this opinion by seeing that he quite fails to understand the criticisms we made. This is the only explanation we are at liberty to adopt for the somewhat singular fact that the criticisms he successfully replies to are such as we did not make, while those we did make he either concedes to be valid or silently passes over. It is evident, therefore, that the same mental one-sidedness which originally caused these defects in his system prevents his perception of them when pointed out; and the annoyance he manifests at our critique is the result of a surprising misinterpretation of what we wrote. That we should develop his philosophical principles into certain inevitable consequences, seems to him a grievance because he did not intend those consequences; as if, having laid down premises, he had a sort of control over their conclusions! Logic pays heed only to its own laws, and consults no man's intentions.

The following sentences from the present volume will be interesting to those who claim Mr. Spencer as a "materialist" (a name which he very energetically repudiates):—"Though of the two it seems easier to translate so-called Matter into so-called Spirit, than to translate so-called Spirit into so-called Matter (which latter is, indeed, wholly impossible), yet no translation can carry us beyond our symbols." [p. 162.] "See then our predicament. We can think of Matter only in terms of Mind. We can think of Mind only in terms of Matter. When we have pushed our explorations of the first to the uttermost limit, we are referred to the second for a final answer; and when we have got the final answer of the second, we are referred back to the first for an interpretation of it. . . . The antithesis of subject and object, never to be transcended while consciousness lasts, renders impossible all knowledge of that Ultimate Reality in which subject and object are united." [p. 627.] It is manifest from these and other utterances that it would be the height of injustice to call Mr. Spencer a materialist. But it remains true, nevertheless, that, judged by its dominant principles (with which the above sentences stand in contradiction), his philosophy tends to materialistic conclusions. Like many another philosopher, he fails to see the drift of his own system. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York, by whom also the pamphlet above mentioned was issued last year. For sale in Toledo at Stebbins's.

THE NEW TREATY.

Since every newspaper in the land has been moralizing more or less tediously over the "Treaty of Washington," there is no necessity that we should echo their platitudes. Its final ratification is a triumph of good sense, not of virtue. Neither England nor America can afford to go to war. They know it; and their treaty is simply a confession of the fact. We take sincere satisfaction in the peaceful settlement of a very dangerous debate; but we do not think the Commonwealth of Man is to be inaugurated to-morrow. The treaty is the child of "self-interest well understood" (to quote the apt phrase of Jouffroy), and by no means the result of moral greatness on either side. The real gain to mankind lies in the fact that self-interest has conquered the passions in a conspicuous and influential case. By and by a higher motive still will rule the nations. We rejoice in the taking of this one step in advance; but it is rather hypocritical in the people to be congratulating themselves on their magnanimity and moral superiority to the rest of mankind. The simple truth is that commerce is doing more to abolish war and civilize the world than all the preaching and praying in Christendom. If it had not created common interests which men refuse to sacrifice to blind hate or national jealousies, the treaty would still be the dream of a few visionaries and impracticables. Nations are slowly growing intelligent. By and by they will be virtuous.

The Independent has the following cordial notice of a good friend of ours:—

While differing from him so widely on some subjects, we have a most genuine admiration for the genius of our friend Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, and we are pleased to hear that besides his old subjects—"The Aristocracy of the Dollar," "Literature in a Republic," and "The Nation's Debt to the Soldiers,"—he is to lecture on Natural History next winter, under the title "Thinking Animals," a subject that must be full of fascination in his hands. We are the more free to speak of this knowing that Col. Higginson never seeks newspaper notice, and wishing, as we do, that men like Higginson, of first-rate ability, might crowd off the rostrum some of the charlatans whose capital consists in self-puffery.

Committees who are making arrangements for Lyceum lectures next winter will do well to preserve the above for reference.

J. J. Tayler said, "Men of action are constantly driven into practical inconsistencies." This is true even of our Free Religious friends. So long as they were merely speculative, and critical of existing organizations, they got along swimmingly; but in that unlucky day when they formed an Association of their own, they were put upon the defensive, like the rest of us. It is true that they did not do much, but they should not have done anything, if they wished to maintain an impregnable position.

Will the Christian Register, in which we find the above, please point out what the Free Religious Association has done that is inconsistent with its principles?

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The pamphlet REPORT of the Proceedings of the recent Annual Meeting, in Boston, of the Free Religious Association is now ready. It contains, in full, John Weiss' essay on "The Attitude of Science to Religion," O. B. Frothingham's essay on "Superstition and Dogmatism," and W. J. Potter's essay on "The Natural Genesis of Christianity;" also a carefully prepared abstract of the addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell and others,—together with the report of the Executive Committee and other proceedings of the Business Session. Price of the pamphlet Thirty-Five cents; in packages of ten or more Twenty-Five cents each.

The Association has also printed an edition of Col. Higginson's essay on "The Sympathy of Religions," which attracted so much attention when published in the Radical last February. Price Twenty cents; in packages of ten or more Fifteen cents each.

Either of these pamphlets may be obtained by addressing the Secretary, W. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass., or S. H. Morse, Editor of the Radical, 25 Bromfield St., Boston.

W. J. P.

NO MIDDLE GROUND.

Those who hold to what is called Free Religion take, on one essential point of argument, the same position with the great body of the Christian Church. They maintain with the church that Jesus was either creator or created, God or man. They also agree with the ablest evangelical writers in this, that, if Jesus was a man, he apparently claimed too much for himself,—assuming a power in heaven and earth which did not belong to him, and asserting an identity with God which was not compatible with merely human birth.

This has seldom been more forcibly stated than by Rev. E. H. Sears in a late essay in the Monthly Religious Magazine, under the title, "The Word Made Flesh;" in which, as the Independent well says, he distinctly renounces not only the Socinian but the Arian view. Take the following extract as a specimen of the essay:—

"Jesus asserts repeatedly, and without any qualification, his pre-existence. 'I came down from Heaven'—is the announcement which startles his hearers and excites the Jews to anger and charges of blasphemy; but he repeats it in sharp significance and will not explain it as metaphor. He asserts an existence of his own before that of Abraham; and the connection shows that he does not mean merely that he was the Messiah in the counsel and foreknowledge of God, but that he had an existence of his own which was without time, and therefore was before Abraham. . . . But why go into any verbal interpretations? The egotism of the Johannean writings is so stupendous and persistent that we are shut off to the conclusion that, if Christ was a 'mere man,' though a sage or prophet, he was a man whose self-assertion transcended all the bounds of reason and modesty. For what is the bearing of sage and prophet who have any just apprehension of their function and calling? According to the depth and fulness of their wisdom and inspiration, so will the entireness of their self-abnegation be. . . . Nor would it make any difference in this respect, though the messenger who speaks in the name of God were angelic or super-angelic. If greater and wiser than men, so much the more perfect would his self-abnegation be."

"Not any man, however great, or greatly inspired, could be thus exalted so as to receive joint honors and worship with the Supreme in any system of pure theism. Not any angel or archangel could be thus exalted; nay, the higher his exaltation, the further away would he be from such homage, for the lower down and the furthest from sight would be all that is himself, when ascriptions of glory and dominion were ascending 'to him that sitteth on the throne.' And if Christianity has thus exalted a mere man, however great and good, if it has thus exalted any created being whatever, it is as gross a system of idolatry as can be found among any of the religions of the earth."

Up to this point, Evangelical Christianity and Free Religion hold together, as distinct from the current evasions of the Unitarian and Universalist bodies. At this point, Free Religion parts company from the Church, and asserts that Christianity has thus exalted a mere man, and accepts the consequences. It is probable that Mr. Sears overstates the facts, because he makes no allowance for exaggerations in the record; but his essential ground is impregnable. Jesus was God or man; if God, the Church is right; if man, Free Religion is right. And if Jesus was man, it is impossible now to disentangle him from that web of Messianic imagination that either his followers or himself (apparently both) contributed to throw about him.

He stands, for those who hold to Free Religion, as the sublimest instance of that type of character of which Savonarola is a minor representative—a pure enthusiast who is at last misled by the very elevation of his aims, and believes himself spiritually exalted above humanity. The beautiful virtues which he manifested may redeem this mistaken attitude to the heart, but not to the intellect; and even the heart itself is at last more refreshed and helped by Jesus when it finds in him the limitations of a man.

T. W. H.

"GUARD!"

The able Unitarian weekly known as the "Christian Register" is not half so hostile to Free Religion as some of its old-lady readers in spectacles believe. When the New York Liberal Christian changed its base to the extreme "right wing" of the denomination, the Christian Register of Boston swung round some distance toward the more radical "left wing;" at least, so some of its readers thought. At one time we were not sure but its plan was to swallow up THE INDEX, employ Mr. Abbot as assistant editor, and unfurl the banner of "Free Religion and Unitarian Christianity—Liberty and Christ, now and forever!" What it was that made the Register halt,—whether it was some ominous growls from grey-haired constituents, or too confident welcome shouts from young radicals, or a warning dream, or some threatening sign in the heavens seen from the editorial Mount of Vision,—we of course are unable to say. We simply know this, that all at once the Register seemed to halt and "about face," and proceed to "mark time." It came so near "Free Religion" that, if it didn't fall in love then, we think it would really shake hands with us now, if it could do so without turning squarely around and breaking ranks—which, of course, would never do. If its editors have occasionally, in order to pacify blood-thirsty spectators, thrust out bayonets at us, they seemed to do it with an apology, softly, as though their bayonets were swathed in linen and anodyne. Now this sort of treatment seems very merciful; but, after all, we say—"Don't! Don't be so afraid of hurting us. We are not at child's play to be 'slaughtered with pins.' If we have a vulnerable heel, we would thank you to find it. Strike and parry like men in earnest. If you can open Mr. Abbot's 'Truths for the Times' with the sword of your logic, then do it; if you cannot do it, then is it not honest to acknowledge it frankly? The 'reserve force' of prestige and prejudice will only last a generation or two. As for quaker-guns, blank cartridges, and sham fights, whether on paper or elsewhere, they are an insult to men of courage and brains; and brains, as Wendell Phillips says, will rule this country."

Feeling in this way, we were very glad to see in the Register a little piece of well-aimed criticism of Free Religion, under cover of comments on Mr. Potter's recent address before the Alumni of the Cambridge Divinity School, on "The New Protestantism,"—which the writer calls "able, frank, and earnest, and meant to be entirely fair." So far as Mr. Potter's address is concerned, the criticism, indeed, is not at all to the point, since he did not maintain, as the critic assumes, that Theism must necessarily be the terminus of free inquiry, and did not even use the phrase "Free Religion,"—his main point being the justification of free thought, wherever it should lead. The critic says:—

"Mr. Potter did not satisfy us that loyalty to Christ is at all incompatible with loyalty to Freedom; and even if he had succeeded in this, we should have failed to see anything but another form of similar servitude in Free Religion, to which he apparently invites us. . . . On our way home we passed the office of a man who is excluded from the Free Religious Association by its creed, which is to be found in the word 'Religious.' Of course this word implies assumption of the existence of God and a religious nature in man. Free inquiry is thus pursued only under Theistic conditions. The conscientious Atheist is asked to make a virtual profession of religion by joining a body the very name of which implies that his favorite inquiry is not an open question. . . . If Atheists have any rights that Theists are bound to respect, there may well be protests against this 'new departure,' and demands of a new departure from the Free Religious terminus. He asks us to remove the word Christ from our banner. Will he be so consistently obliging as to grant the request of those who wish the word God taken off from his flag?"

This criticism, though not to the point with regard to Mr. Potter's discourse, must be admitted to be fair as against the Free Religious Association, and forces us to "guard." We think, however, it can be successfully met. In reply, I for one would say—Suppose we do have the word "God" on our flag, is it not a broader and better word than "Christ?" If the logic of free fellowship forces us to erase "God," how much more does it force them to erase "Christ?"

But whether the word "Religious" necessarily implies belief in God is questioned. We are sure, at least it was not the wish of the originators of the Association, to exclude anybody who desired to join it. This will be seen especially by several passages in the first address of President Frothingham in 1868. He said:—"When we call this a free religious association, we mean to say it is an association which puts no limits whatever on human thought, so it be earnest, so it be truth-seeking; and we do not undertake to say whether it is truth-seeking or not." And again:—"Our purpose is to open doors and windows, to offer an opportunity, to offer a home where all can come and sit together." That expresses the spirit and intent of the Free Religious Association. And when they used the word "Religious" in their Constitution, it was not because of its limitations, but because of its breadth. All words necessarily have some limitations, since it is by their definitions that they exist; but they chose this because no word that they could employ seemed less exclusive. As to free inquiry in the Association "being pursued only under Theistic conditions," we reply that, if the "conscientious atheist" believes with Stuart Mill that there may be a religion without a God, then the term "Religious" need not trouble him; or if he can define Religion with Mr. Abbot, as "the effort of man to perfect himself," then also the term "Religious" does not bar his admission to the Association.

But suppose the term "Religious" does at present imply an "assumption of the existence of God and a religious nature in man" (as I think it does), even then can the Association be justly charged with exclusiveness? Not unless as a matter of fact it does practically exclude by the word some one who would otherwise join and co-operate with it. Where is there a "conscientious atheist" who feels himself excluded from the Association and is aggrieved thereby? No word or association can be called narrow which does not actually and today bind some one's free thought. The word may be narrow, or may have been narrowly defined; but if it expands with expanding wants, then it is broad enough. If no one's freedom is actually hampered by the necessary limitations of a word, then thought is free, and the word is practically as good as though it were as broad and boundless as the universe. But whenever there shall be any considerable number of men, yes, one man who calls himself an "atheist" and who cannot conscientiously call himself "religious," as Mill might not, and yet wishes to join us in our efforts to advance "Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love," then I would certainly favor some amendment to the Constitution by which he may be admitted. We will stand by our principle, even if we do not stand by our name and Constitution.

W. H. S.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

In THE INDEX of July 15, one of your "editorial contributors," in remarks on the last Free Religious convention, seems to me to have done injustice to one of the invited speakers, Mr. William Denton. Similar or worse disposal of him I had seen in one or two other papers. Neither Mr. Denton nor the Spiritualist will or need thank me for interposing; but justice to my own feelings impels me to say this word.

Your editorial contributor says:—

"He (Denton) said nothing new, nothing that had not been said, and said perhaps better, by other speakers on the same theme."

With the sentences following this, as to Mr. Denton's manner, I should perhaps differ only as to quantity and number. But then "O. B. F." should remember that he himself had hurled a javelin, a whole quiverfull of javelins, directly into the very face and eyes of the faith and philosophy of Denton as an ardent Spiritualist. He stood alone on the platform, as a Spiritualist; the evening was far spent; the audience had many of them left; and it certainly required more courage than I could boast to rise there as he did, at all. He is an earnest, honest worker in the general cause of "Free Religion," and one not to be spared, still less despised. Wherever I go, the Spiritualists are doing more than all other influences combined to arrest the tide of religious bigotry and superstition, and to uphold the rights of free speech and discussion on every important question, and in behalf of every human being, woman or man. That the Spiritualists heard the attacks made on them by Mr. Frothingham on that evening in respectful and dignified silence, was only what I should have expected, complimentary as it was to them. That they so vociferously applauded Mr. Denton's defence of them and their cause, was alike creditable to their sense of justice and right. I am especially glad "O. B. F." ascribes the "uproar and applause," as he calls it, to the right source, "the multitude of Spiritualists the hall contained," instead of to outside barbarians, as some other reporters did, who it seemed to me must have known that there were no such in the house. I sat all the evening among the fringes of the congregation, in different localities, without seeing or hearing one rude or disrespectful demonstration.

But your readers, and every friend of your great enterprise, should thank "O. B. F." for the closing column of his communication. I have long felt that it suffered for want of just those influences he describes near his close; just such names as he mentioned—particularly a Garrison and a Theodore Parker.

The Spiritualists have always appealed to exactly those classes described by "O. B. F." as hitherto not yet sufficiently reached by the ministrations of the "Free Religious Association." When the two organizations shall sufficiently understand each other, I think they will co-operate without an uncomfortable friction; and certainly with immense augmentation of power and of grand and glorious result. And unless they are stronger than Omnipotence, they will ere long find they have both and all of them enough to do against their common foe.

I have no room to report my own personal progress. Every Sunday shines upon me somewhere at a meeting, sometimes with a congregation mostly Spiritualists; at other times, the "Free" and other liberal religionists predominate. I always endeavor to declare the whole counsel of Truth; and, though at this season of the year audiences are small, I am always heard with apparent satisfaction and joy. Lately my lecture on "Young Men's Christian Associations" is much in demand; and I understand our friend Charles K. Whipple, of Boston, has recently issued another number of his excellent series of tracts, with those organizations as his theme.

P. P.

Father Secchi, the eminent astronomical observer who has contributed so many discoveries to the science of solar physics, in a work just published estimates the temperature of the sun at ten million degrees of the Centigrade thermometer—a temperature which would correspond to eighteen million degrees Fahrenheit. It would take salamanders or satans to enjoy such a climate as that. But it is nothing to what Zion's Herald anticipates for "Free Religionists."

Nature for June 15 quotes the following old Latin couplet by a "learned Englishman" (pity he should be thus anonymized into oblivion!):—

"Dæmonas ex mundo quisquis proscripserit audax, Esse brevi nullum dicet in orbe Deum."

Which might be paraphrased as follows:—

"The wretch who dares the Devil slay,
Would serve his God the self-same way."

Hope is the delicate coloring of the rainbow. It does not stop the rain; but it makes the rain beautiful.

The most terrible punishment of hypocrisy is inability to be sincere with oneself.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

ONCE MORE.

TITUSVILLE, PA., July 10, 1861.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—You took my friendly censure in my last letter so good-naturedly, and responded so kindly to it, that I feel encouraged to say one word more and to venture a final advice. All that can be urged by the friends of both journals and their esteemed editors to bring about a reconciliation between you and Mr. Seaver, has been said in those two earnest letters of Mr. J. Sedgwick and "R." in No. 80 of THE INDEX, but I am very sorry to say, without effect. You, as well as Mr. Seaver, insist obstinately on being (what none is entirely) in the right, and consequently neither of you will yield anything to the other; neither will say the wise word of Cajetan in Schiller's "Braut von Messina":—"I, the wiser, salute first." As, then, all solicitude of your mutual friends cannot avail anything with either of you, I would request you both to "bury the hatchet," and not only say or write not one word more about the matter any more yourselves, but not allow any of your correspondents to allude to it henceforward. This seems to me the only possible way to bring about the so-much desired reconciliation, and a co-operation of the two journals so essential to the prosperity of them. Having now said all I wished to say on the subject, allow me to answer your strictures on the Investigator, which are all but correct. You say:—"The position of the Investigator as stated above (by me), is that of 'Negative Dogmatism.'" Now I claim that this is not "as stated above;" and that "the position of the Investigator" is not that of "Negative Dogmatism." True, I said there was not as much science, or rather not as much erudition, found in the Investigator as in THE INDEX; but not that it was "unscientific, narrow, and antiquated," as you do. And allow me further to say that you are not less in error when you allege that—"It is unscientific, because it is dogmatic and shuts off all unprejudiced inquiry on the highest subjects." This indeed is a very false accusation, and I know of no paper, THE INDEX not excepted, that opens its columns to views opposed to the Investigator more freely than that paper does. You overlook the fact, sir, that the Investigator's motto is, "Hear all sides, and then decide." A better one you cannot advise; and (what is better yet) a motto that adorns not only its picturesque vignette, but is also the spirit of its pages. Does that make it "Negatively Dogmatic?"

True, the Investigator is, to its praise be it said, on the whole Atheistical—unbelieving (in God, Immortality, Religion, &c.); but it is for all that not any more negative than THE INDEX for not believing in Christ or the Bible. Nor is it more "dogmatical" for expressing or avowing its unbelief in the existence of a God than THE INDEX is for expressing or avowing its belief in the same. The fact is, the Investigator is only negative (or rather positive) in denying the existence of the Bible God (or any personal God); and though it is also too materialistic to believe in any "spirit" or "spiritual God"—and with good reason too—it is not "dogmatizing" on this point, but merely pronounces it as its opinion, allowing others to have or to favor other opinions or beliefs. All that it demands of them, in such a case, is not to accept or to form any opinion from mere hearsay, teaching or habit, but to examine for themselves its truth or falsehood. Is this "Negative Dogmatism?"

True, again, the Investigator declares it as its opinion that the existence of a God is not only "unproved," but that it, according to the constitution of man and the present state of science, seems even to be "unprovable;" that Immortality, for the same reasons, seems to be no more a fact; that Religion is no natural faculty of man, but only a consequence resulting from education, teaching, habit, &c.; that Moral and Reason, on the contrary, are such natural, inborn faculties; that Ethics are the deductions of Moral, the judgment and enunciations of Reason, and independent of Religion; that this latter is only beneficial to man in so far as it coincides with, is identical with, Moral and Reason; but that when it is opposed to them (as all religions more or less are), it becomes Superstition, Fanaticism, Bigotry, Intolerance, and, as such, the greatest evils that ever cursed or are still cursing mankind—as the history of all religions proves abundantly; that therefore Moral and Reason are the only and true "saviors" of mankind; that Humanity progresses and is made happy only in proportion as it becomes moral and reasonable, and freed from the prejudices of religion. Hence, that the aim of all true reformers, philanthropists and Liberals—"Infidels"—must be to make clear the enormous difference between Religion and Moral, to show the fallacy of the former, the importance and salutariness of the latter—that, as "Ignorance is the mother of devotion," and Religion too, so are Science and Education and Knowledge the mother of true virtue and thus of the real progress and happiness of mankind.

I would like very much to go more into detail, and explain especially the nature of the several points in question; but my article is growing lengthy and you want short ones. Let us, then, turn at once to authorities as judges. But I must confess my scepticism in consulting them on religious questions. I value science as much as yourself, or any lover of science and of the Truths obtained by their aid, and have as high an esteem for our men of science as any body; but when they treat of Religion, I will own up to a little distrust—perhaps you will call it prejudice—against them, and most of all against the scientific men of America. However more liberal, free, independent our citizens of the Great Republic may be than the people of Europe, the men of science of Europe are decidedly more free and fearless than those of America. These latter share somewhat too unscientifically in the general character of the nation, impressed on it by the old Puritan settlers. Take our Agassiz as an instance. Do you believe that (man of science and thorough naturalist as he is) he actually believes in the Bible as he writes, or as he said in his oration at the Humboldt festivities at Boston last year? So, however willing I am to trust them in their purely scientific researches, you will allow that there is some reason for hesitating to confide in scientific men when they treat on religious questions. But let us nevertheless examine what they do say.

You quote Herbert Spencer as saying;—"The Atheistic theory is not only unthinkable, but even if it were thinkable, would not be a solution." Admitted. But does he only speak thus of the "Atheistic theory," as your quotation would make one believe? By no means! "Criticising the essential conceptions involved in the different orders of belief," says he (First Principles, p. 43, Appleton's edition), "we find no one of them to be logically defensible. Passing over the considerations of credibility, and confining ourselves to that of conceivability, we see that Atheism, Pantheism, and Theism, rigorously analyzed, severally prove to be absolutely unthinkable." Is this making only Atheism unthinkable, or "all orders of belief" unprovable? In like manner might I also cite numerous passages from the other writings of this strongly logical and philosophical author, if my limits would allow.

Mr. Darwin says (Descent of Man, Vol. I, p. 62-63, Appleton's edition):—"There is no evidence that man was originally endowed with the ennobling (?) belief in the existence of an Omnipotent God. On the contrary, there is ample evidence, derived not from hasty travellers but from men who have long resided with savages, that numerous races have existed and still exist who have no idea of one or more gods, and who have no words in their language to express such idea." But, as if being afraid (for the above given reasons) of having said too much, he adds:—"The question is of course wholly distinct from that higher one, whether there exists a Creator and Ruler of the universe; and this has been answered in the affirmative by the highest intellects that have ever lived." Yet he is compelled to say further—"If, however, we include under the term 'religion' the belief in unseen or spiritual agencies, the case is wholly different; for this belief seems to be almost universal with the less civilized races. Nor is it difficult to comprehend how it arose." And after having clearly shown how this belief was quite naturally engendered out of the ignorance of men and their consequent superstitions, he says (p. 65):—"The belief in spiritual agencies would easily pass into the belief in the existence of one or more gods." And finally (in Vol. II, p. 377) he says:—"The belief in God has often been advanced as not only the greatest, but the most complete, of all the distinctions between man and the lower animals. It is, however, impossible as we have seen, to maintain that this belief is innate or instinctive in man."

The already great length of this article forbids further quotation, potent and sustaining the Investigator's theory and position as they might be. I will then conclude with that trite aphorism of Germany's great genius, Schiller:—

"Which religion do I profess? None of all thou mayest name.
And why none? Because of Religion."

Schiller, then, sustains the Investigator's "Negative Dogmatism" pretty well, I think; and the fallacy of your strictures will be clearly seen as soon as Schiller's non-religion is rightly understood.

With great esteem,

Truly yours,

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

[We print the above with considerable reluctance, since we had given quite enough space to the subject discussed; but we yield to Mr. Einstein's urgent request for its publication, though thus neglecting to follow the very good advice he himself gives. It is necessary to add, however, that he has misunderstood what we said about the Investigator.

We did not quote Mr. Spencer as favoring theism, but as disfavoring atheism, both of which he regards as unthinkable. Mr. Darwin's language is a striking confirmation of our own views as expressed in our late Boston lecture. Who fails to perceive the vast difference between his position and that of "more or less positive denial?"

A stronger passage than the above quotation from Schiller could not have been cited in support of THE INDEX. Instead of advocating non-religion, it advocates Religion in the most emphatic manner; and we are surprised that Mr. Einstein could so completely have missed its meaning. Schiller says he professes "none of all the religions" (i. e., Christian, Jewish, Mohammedan, &c.); and why? Because of his faith in Religion (i. e., universal spiritual Religion, as opposed to historical religions). In other words, he is too religious to be a Christian. If Mr. Einstein doubts this interpretation of the passage, he will certainly not doubt the following stanza from Schiller's "Die Worte des Glaubens":—

"Und ein Gott ist, ein heiliger Wille lebt,
Wie auch der menschliche wanke;
Hoch ueber der Zeit und dem Raume webt
Lebendig der hoechste Gedanke,
Und ob Alles in ewigem Wechsel kreist,
Es beharret im Wechsel ein ruhiger Geist."

In fact, by his quotations our friend has materially strengthened our position, so far as "authorities" go (which is not very far). The finest modern minds are the most willing to confess their ignorance, and the most unwilling to accept anybody's hard, bald negations for positive knowledge. No one seeks who believes that nothing can be found; and the mischief of a "negatively dogmatic" attitude is that it extinguishes thought. Just in proportion to the "positiveness" with which any one "denies" without absolute proof, is his attitude unscientific. THE INDEX neither denies nor affirms positively on the great questions agitated by modern thought; but it seeks to learn continually, and believes that there is much to be learned. Whoever regards these questions as already satisfactorily answered, betrays a want of acquaintance with the actual state of human knowledge. That is why we object to dogmatic negations, against which the spirit of science makes most emphatic protest.—ED.]

FREE RELIGION AND BIGOTRY.

Mr. O. B. Frothingham, President of the Free Religious Association, at its late convention in Boston, in his address on "Superstition and Dogmatism," charged Spiritualism with building up a new superstition. In speaking of Spiritualists, he withheld from them their distinctive appellation, designating them by the narrower name of Spiritists. He was promptly corrected by the next speaker, Professor Denton, in a manner that secured the approval and hearty applause of the greater part of the audience. But Mr. Frothingham, though corrected, is not convinced. He renews the attack on Spiritualism in THE INDEX of July 8, in an article entitled "Spiritualism and Superstition."

In its opening he again alludes to the question of appellation, and insists that Spiritualism is a less fitting name than Spiritism. An associate of Mr. Frothingham in the Free Religious movement, in a brief article in the Radical for June, 1868, sharply and pathetically complained because Spiritualists would not call themselves Spiritists, and spelled Spiritualism with a capital S.

This difference of opinion ceases when one recognizes that Spiritualism is both essential and phenomenal, and that those two phases of it, the inner or essential and the outer or phenomenal, are both comprehended by one term. Spiritualism designates phenomenal Spiritualism; but Spiritualism without an adjective includes not only Spiritism but all ideas and spiritual entities and emanations which inhere in and are evolved from the human spirit. With all who recognize that man, whether living or dead, is a living spirit, the term Spiritualism has broadened in its significance, and to them developed a store of consequences previously unrecognized. Spiritualists are therefore active in promoting political, social, and religious reforms. Thence it is, why some Spiritualists prefer the word Spiritualism to Spiritism and spell it with a capital S, and why the conservators and inheritors of the old regime find it hard to fellowship them.

Mr. Frothingham writes that "it is not a belief in the real existence or actual presence of spirits that constitute superstition, but belief in their direct agency in the control of human concerns." Has not Mr. Frothingham in this statement gone too far, or not far enough? According to his gauge, to believe that they are actually present, and accompany us wherever we go, and are present with us, both when we wake and when we sleep, is not superstition; but to believe that they ever act in and control human concerns is superstition. The reason of the distinction which he makes in the name, is not very apparent. Courts of law sometimes determine that the mere presence of a person at a transaction makes him an actor in it.

Mr. Frothingham refers to instances that he knows of where men would not undertake financial enterprises until the familiar spirit approved, and to other cases where parents accept instruction from their deceased children, and married persons listen to counsel from their deceased partners. Such conduct he evidently regards as superstitious. Is a Free Religionist open to the charge of superstition, if, being perplexed as to what disposition he shall make of his surplus funds, he consults with and follows the advice of his banker in investing them; or if, being in ill health, he follows the advice of his physician? If not, how can he consistently maintain the charge against the Spiritualist who in his perplexities consults with his disembodied friend or physician who, Mr. Frothingham admits, may be present with him? The Free Religionist and the Spiritualist probably act alike so far as to appreciate the advice received, at the value which subsequent results show it to be worth. If good, their confidence in their advisers is strengthened; if bad, they probably would change their advisers or forego them altogether.

Mr. Frothingham says that it is now several years since he declined changing places on Sunday with a Spiritualist speaker, because the Spiritualistic method of arriving at truth by the passive reception of ideas or impressions seemed to him irrational and dangerous. He does not agree with Wordsworth, who sung:—

"Nor less I deem that there are Powers
Which of themselves our minds impress;
That we can feed this mind of ours
In a wise passiveness."

But where lie the irrationality and the danger that disturb Mr. Frothingham? Is it that he does not know what may be said by the speaker? Does he ever really know in advance what any speaker, Free Religionist or Conservative, other than himself, may utter from his platform? He has some knowledge of them or their general reputation, and, trusting to that, is not afraid to extend to them the hospitalities of his platform.

Why not apply the same principle in receiving Mediumistic and Spiritualist speakers?

But whom would Mr. Frothingham's apprehension of irrationality and danger exclude from his platform? First, the disciples of Jesus who should act obediently to the injunction of their master not to be anxious, and to have no thought beforehand, and not to premeditate what they should say; in the synagogue, but to speak what should be given to them at the hour, would find no admittance from Mr. Frothingham.

Second, Jesus, who acted on the same principle that he recommended to his disciples and trusted to the inspiration that came to him at the hour of speaking, owing to Mr. Frothingham's apprehension of irrationality and danger, would, notwithstanding all the sweet things that the Free Religionists have said concerning him, receive from Mr. Frothingham a very courteous refusal to an application for the use of his platform on Sunday.

Third, A. J. Davis, in the preface of his "Morning Lectures," says that "sometimes he had not chosen his theme or the line of argument to be pursued, until he came to address the congregation." Of course Mr. Frothingham's fear of irrationality and danger would exclude him; and as Mr. Davis is generally recognized as the most advanced representative of Spiritualism, a declination to exchange with him may fairly be interpreted as an exclusion of all Spiritualist speakers from Lyric Hall platform, while it is under the control of Mr. Frothingham.

It can hardly be doubted, from his known liberality, that he would accept an invitation for reciprocity of services with a Unitarian or Evangelical divine, if perchance he should receive one; but, as appears by his statement, he could not change platforms with a speaker engaged by a congregation of Spiritualists. Other instances are within my knowledge where Free Religionists have declined to interchange acts of courtesy with Spiritualists, for the sole reason that they were Spiritualists. Mr. Frothingham closes his article by expressing his preference "to have no other world, rather than one full of teasing, troublesome, meddlesome beings, who interfere with the rational order of the world we dwell in." Whether this expression of his preference will secure to him or not such a prospective world as he desires, the future will decide; and whether what now constitutes his notion of "rational order" will then continue to be his highest standard of perception, is another problem which for the present remains unsolved.

ALFRED E. GILES.

Boston, July 12, 1871.

The Universalist has a long and quite interesting article on "Our Free Religionists." We have no desire to parody any of the blows which it strikes at this organization, but we deny the right of the Universalist to make the Unitarian body responsible for it because "Rev. Col. Higginson," and several other "Unitarian clergymen," "in good ecclesiastical standing with the Unitarian denomination," are among its prominent members. We do not know that "Rev. Col. Higginson" has any "ecclesiastical standing" that is worthy of mention, and we can imagine the breadth of his smile if he should be threatened with the application of a denominational "knife or cautery." It is long since he cared a copper for the denomination, and the other gentlemen mentioned by the Universalist take only an infinitesimal interest in its affairs.

The Free Religious Association is not responsible for the Unitarian denomination, nor is the denomination responsible for it. This is a notorious fact; and what does the Universalist mean when it says, "Under the name of Christian Unitarianism an organization is already formed and operating, whose sole object, it cannot fail to be seen, is to dishonor Christianity, and if possible root it out forever"? Because a handful of men who are, or have been, Unitarian ministers, identify themselves with an entirely undenominational association, the majority of whose members are not Unitarians, that Association is no more a Unitarian organization than the American Anti-Slavery Society was because Samuel J. May, Jr., and Rev. Dr. Furness appeared upon its platform. We ask the Universalist to practise what it preaches in its concluding sentence: "Let us have honesty and fair dealing."—Christian Register.

It is the best things that are capable of the worst abuse; the very abuse may test the value.—Theodor e Parker.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PISTOLS, HOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS, Gun Material. Write for Price List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [E3-108.]

WANTED—A SITUATION. The subscriber, who has had several years experience in teaching such studies as are generally pursued at Massachusetts High Schools, and also in giving piano-forte lessons, would accept a moderate compensation at a place where Bible-reading is not required in school, and where no attempt would be made to interfere with his religious convictions or with the management of his school. Address A. D. JACKSON, care of SAMUEL JACKSON, JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS. 78-88

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 684 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($30 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE.

BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,

Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.

D. G. FRANCIS,

75-87

17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is especially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on the "RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by W. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahma Samaj;" also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England;" and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,
The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.

Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.

"It Injures Our Business?" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?

Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.

These four for 10 cents.

Address

CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,

43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

70tf

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Publisher & Bookseller,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

The Origin of Species, By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
The Descent of Man, By DARWIN, 2 vols, each.... 2 00
Wallace on Natural Selection, (London)..... 2 00
Mivart on the Genesis of Species. 1 00
Man's Place in Nature, By HUXLEY..... 1 25
Origin of Species, By HUXLEY..... 1 00
Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condition of Man, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
The Earthward Pilgrimage, By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
History of European Morals, from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols. 8vo..... 6 00
Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
Chips from a German Workshop, By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
The Old Roman World, By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
Short Studies on Great Subjects, By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE..... 1 50
Lecture on Calvinism, By the same..... 75
The Heavens, An illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
Words and their Uses, By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
Steps of Belief, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
Nature and Life, By Rev. ROBERT COLLYER..... 1 50
Sartor Resartus, By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edition..... 90
The Choice of Books, Same..... 75
Essays of Elia, By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
Thoughts about Art, By PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON..... 2 00
Words of Weight on the Woman Question, (London)..... 2 25
The Friendships of Woman, By W. R. ALGER... 2 00
A Day by the Fire, LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
Sanctum Sanctorum, THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
Carlyle's Essays, Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
Among My Books, By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 2 vols..... 5 00
Society and Solitude, By the same..... 2 00
Topics of the Times, By JAMES PARTON..... 2 00
Success and its Conditions, By E. P. WHIPPLE... 1 50
Literature and Life, By same..... 1 50
Tablets, By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
Companions of My Solitude, By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
Organization in Daily Life, Same..... 1 50
Realma, By the same..... 1 50
War and Culture, By same..... 1 50
Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms, By same... 1 25
Ten Great Religions, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
Light and Electricity, By TYNDALL..... 1 25
Our Girls, By DIO LEWIS..... 1 50
Studies in Literature, By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read,— NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
Principles of Psychology, By HERBERT SPENCER... 2 50
American Religion, By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
Fragments Of Science For Unscientific People, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Light Science For Leisure Hours, By R. A. PROCTOR... 3 00
Handbook Of Legendary And Mythological Art, By MRS. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 8 50
Hereditary Genius—Its Laws and Consequences, By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
The Races Of The Old World, By CHAS. L. BRACE... 2 00
Little Women, By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
Wallace's Review Of Darwin's Descent Of Man, PAPER..... 25
Heat as a Mode of Motion, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Buechner on Force and Matter, (London Print).... 3 75
Essays, By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE..... 1 00
Aristotle's Ethics, (Bohn's Edition)..... 2 00
France before Europe, By MICHELET..... 1 00
Roman Imperialism and Other Essays, By J. R. SEELEY. Author of "Ecce Homo"..... 1 50
The Republic of Plato. 1 25
The Book of Golden Thoughts, By HENRY ATWELL... 1 25
Colton's Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words 1 25
Consolations of Travel, or The Last Days of a Philosopher, By SIR HUMPHREY DAVY..... 1 50
The Poetical Works of HOOD, WORDSWORTH, SHELLEY, KEATS, MOORE, SCOTT, BYRON, full gilt, and on tinted paper, each only..... 1 75

Address,

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Publisher and Bookseller.

Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is TWO DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).

For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

Lecky's History of European Morals, 2 vols.....$6.00

Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols...5.00

Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols.....5.00

Weiss's Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, 2 volumes.....6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870 (price $2.50). Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

Darwin's Origin of Species, price.....$2.00

Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price.....2.00

Essays in Criticism, by Matthew Arnold, price.....2.00

Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, with portrait, price.....2.00

Any volume of the writings of Theodore Parker or Henry D. Thoreau, each.....2.00

On the Heights, Auerbach.....2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.

For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.

For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.

For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.

For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,

LOCK BOX 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....	4
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	5
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	6
Sunday Schools.....	7
Friendship.....	8
Grief and its Compensations.....	9
The Hebrew Prophets.....	11
Capital Punishment.....	12
Human Ideals.....	13
The Essence of Religion.....	14
The Management of Children.....	15
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. R. S. D.....	16
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Notes and Beams.....	29
The Devil's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 32.

TOLEDO, OHIO, AUGUST 12, 1871.

WHOLE No. 85.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT. Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

FEAR OF THE LIVING GOD.

[A Discourse by O. B. Frothingham.]

"It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

HEBREWS, X, 31.

I wonder how many people know that this text is in the Bible. I wonder how many know that it is in the New Testament. I wonder how many know that it is in the most carefully finished book in the New Testament. I wonder how many of those who knew of its existence understand what it means, or ever tried to understand it. If it were written thus:—"It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living Satan," or "it is a fearful thing to fall out of the hands of the living God"—that would be intelligible. But the passage as it runs is loaded, every word, with incomprehensibility to modern Christians. I will not try to carry you back to the state of feeling about God which prevailed two thousand years ago, even in the Christian Church. Two thousand years are a long time; and when everything else that people thought and did then looks so very strange to us, what they thought and did about religion should not surprise us.

I might explain the sentence I have quoted by two others in the same chapter, the one immediately preceding this—"We know him who hath said, Vengeance is mine, I will repay:" the other concluding the chapter—"For our God is a consuming fire." But to explain these sentences so that they would seem true to a modern mind would be as hard as to explain the text. Let us give up all attempt, then, to get fully into the mind of those dark ages of Faith, and see what there may be in our own modes of thought that throws light on these strange words.

Is it not common now to think of God as standing for moral law, judgment, retribution? Is he not the representative of the accusing and avenging conscience? When is he instinctively thought of? In dark days, in gloomy times, in periods of fear, when calamity befalls, or sorrow comes, or death approaches, or the sense of guilt oppresses the mind. How is he commonly thought of then? As the Being who darkens the day, makes the time gloomy, produces the fear, sends the calamity, causes the sorrow, inflicts the death, holds over the sense of guilt the rod of penalty. He is the awful Being. At the mention of His name men droop their heads, lengthen their faces, subdue their voices, let the light out of their countenances, and recall their misdoing. The word "punishment" calls up the thought of God. The mention of hell suggests Him. His attributes are the great swelling attributes that appal. He is Omnipotent; men are pigmies before Him; they are grasshoppers; He can blow them away as dust; they are as a sleep. He is Omniscient. He knows what everybody is about, knows what they are thinking of, what they are feeling; has a detective in every bosom. All over Christendom people tremble as they think of that Justice that holds every one to the letter of the Law, and makes each answerable for his deeds without regard to all those fine considerations which diminish the weight of personal responsibility. All over the world God is a terror. It is the effort of religious men to make him felt as a terror. Often he is the worst of terrors—a vast, vague, shadowy, haunting terror—a bugbear, as men call it. Hear men pray to him. Read the Church litanies. Listen to the warning counsel given to wilful, vicious, and criminal people. "Be careful. You are watched. The Avenging Angel is dogging your footsteps. You are rushing to your doom." Christian men and women have not yet outgrown the feeling that the living God is an un-sleeping policeman, incessantly walking his rounds. It is still the fashion to talk to people about him as parents talk to their adventurous children, telling them the bears will catch them if they go out of doors. This, I say, is a habit of mind ever with us. I believe it is still an inveterate instinct with us to get as far away from God as we can, to think of him no oftener than we must, and to rescue from association with him as much of our life as is possible. To fall into his hands is to suffer; to fall into his hands is to be shut up in prison; to fall into his hands is to be punished. There is a general impression that we are safest when we are out of his reach.

I do not say that our deliberate thoughts of God are so terrible as these. Our people would probably resent the charge of entertaining such black beliefs. They say handsome things of God. They give him sweet names. They praise him in songs. But, for all that, they do not care to come too near him. A chill creeps over them when they think of that. They will then feel their poorness and weakness. They will have to see dreadful sights. It is a "fearful thing."

Now this I take to be the effect of ignorance. It is blindness of mind. Very intelligible blindness, very natural and pardonable blindness, but still a very sad and pathetic, yes, and a very painful and hurtful blindness. It is the blindness that leads people to imagine that unknown lands are infested with wild beasts; that the wilderness is peopled with goblins; that solitary places are evil places; that unexplored seas are full of monsters; that untried roads are dangerous roads; that the atmosphere is haunted by spirits of the air; that new sciences are perilous, new knowledge uncanny, new opinions hazardous, new acquaintances temptations, new experiences damaging to the soul, new experiments in life things of questionable salvation.

Let us try to suppose an island savage to be made acquainted with the fact that he lived on a round globe. Let us suppose him to have on his mind a clear image of the earth as a round globe. Let us go further, and suppose him to think of himself as standing on the topmost summit of the mighty ball, shelving downwards from him on every side as far as the horizon line, the heaving waters that encompassed his island tossing uneasily, as if they were struggling to keep their position on the steep declivity. Suppose now that to this savage islander, trembling on his point of rock, should come a civilized man from the other side of the globe, who should tell him of the possibility of passing from where he stood to the opposite side of the ball, and that, not by going straight down through the middle of it, but by going round it on the outside by sliding down the steep declivity, dipping over the edge of the horizon and crawling along the under side head downwards, like a fly on a ceiling. Can any imagination do justice to the poor savage's terror, as he conceives himself tearing down that awful rapid and dashing over that dizzy verge? And then suppose our educated traveller to tell him something about the immensity of space in which floated the globe he was on,—the billions and billions of miles of distance, where was nothing but bleak, impalpable vastness, black to the eye, noiseless to the ear, senseless to the touch, where was nothing to breathe, where was nothing at all but, incalculable leagues apart, bewildering crowds of globes, lowering and glaring, spinning and whirling, with nothing to hold them or move them. Would not the terror of the poor savage be horribly increased, as he imagined himself falling into this terrific void, falling, falling, and never ceasing to fall? And would he not cling more desperately than ever to his little speck in the sea as the only hold he had on existence?

In much the same way as we imagine that poor savage to feel about falling off his island into the bottomless space, do ignorant people seem to feel about falling into the hands of the living God; and almost as hard is it to convince them that they may safely launch out into unexplored spaces of thought, as it might be to convince the islander that, in putting off from his island, he would not be hurried along frightful rapids—would not be dashed over a precipice—would not be dropped off the globe into a bottomless void, but would proceed as over a perfectly level surface—would have his head always in the air and his feet always on the ground—would have the stars above him just as they were, and in the course of his proceedings would find other islands and continents, other trees and plants, other men and women, living industriously, peacefully, and happily in towns and great cities, no more apprehensive of falling off the globe than he was before he knew it was round. We have no fear of slipping off the planet; we have no dread of infinite space; our ships are sailing round the planet all the time. We know that the force that keeps our feet planted where they are, whether we be on the upper or the under side of the ball, keeps everything else in place, keeps in place the distant stars, keeps in place the comets and aerolites. We know that the great laws are invisible, and that things invisible are under Law; we know, in a word, that we cannot fall out of the hands of the Living God, and that because we cannot fall out of them, we are safe. All this the European might tell the savage. He might describe his voyage to the island, the vessels he met, the lands he saw, the ports he touched at, the races he encountered; but still the savage would remain unsatisfied.

So, from far-off regions of thought and experience, travellers bring the tale of their discoveries; but the unknown will still be the perilous, and to enter upon it will be a "fearful thing."

We have a faith in which we have been educated, in which we have lived, to which we have been wonted. It is comfortable and warm to us. We feel safe in it. It is our home. It is our tower. With every part of it we are familiar. We have touched its extreme edges all round. From this point we gaze abroad, as the islander might, upon an ocean of restless, tossing, troubled minds, questioning, doubting, fearing, tumbling about in the whirl of speculation; some seeming to rush furiously along, some apparently trying to keep their footing on a smooth descent; some slowly sinking from view; some hovering on the verge of a precipice; and we say—"Alas, poor souls! They are lost. They are slipping off the planet. They will tumble into the dreary spaces of unbelief, atheism, despair. For what is there out there to hold them?"

A man has lived all his days under aristocratic institutions, like Thomas Carlyle, for instance. Order for him is associated with government; and government, in his mind, is associated with a governing class, or a governing person who holds other men subject to him. To him belong the right and privilege and power. Rule and authority are his. This will give to law its force. Army and navy are his arms. He has power over life and death. So accustomed is he to such an order of things that, though he knows these governing men to be of the same stuff with all other men,—though he knows that these governing men can have no real power save such as belongs to their manhood,—though he knows that the human alone is entitled to rule, and that the human is not held as a monopoly by any set of people,—he cannot conceive of any safety out of that condition of things. From his aristocratic enclosure he looks abroad on men, experimenting on other forms of government, venturing on new fields of social existence, tampering with entire institutions, and is filled with terror. He sees them "shooting Niagara," and afterwards plunging down, down into absolute chaos. "What!" he exclaims, "allow men to govern themselves! Let them choose their own rulers, make their own laws, regulate their own institutions, launch forth upon the untrodden sea of republicanism and democracy! Put the ballot into uneducated hands! Admit the working-men to the franchise! Let the rabble be represented! Let the ungoverned say what shall be government! What can come of that but anarchy?" It is, you see, the same old distrust of the living God. It is the same old fear that, outside there, the space is infested with evil spirits. It is the islander's fear.

Everywhere we come across this fear, and everywhere it is the same torment. The living God is terrible. The Conservative has it. He is never safe unless he is protected by Law. Everything must be provided for by Law. The Law must undertake everything, and the letter of the Law must be adhered to. And so, when any one comes along who proposes to let people manage their own affairs in their own way, to build their own railroads, pave their own streets, mend their own sewers, educate their own children, maintain their own worship, feed their own poor, nurse their own sick, reform their own criminals, they are seized with a formidable trembling, and talk anxiously of the danger there is of falling off the social planet into shoreless, bottomless space.

The same superstition prevents people from adopting new customs of living, and makes them feel more comfortable in the discomfort they are used to, than in trying some new experiment of existence. They do not know where they are going, and not to know where they are going is to be apprehensive lest they be going to a bad place. We see it in the reluctance with which political privileges are granted to women, in the unwillingness to adopt the rational treatment of children, in the indisposition to trust principles, however rational, in the jealousy of what are called theories—as if sound theories were anything else than truths to which men were not accustomed, the living God who was outside the limits of ordinary experience! Nothing is more difficult than to imagine people who go away forever, as going into the sunshine. And the reason it is so difficult is here—the unknown is the dark, the untried is the dangerous. Except the little spot that we stand on, the world is full of evil spirits that lurk in the air.

And the secret of this monstrous and disabling error is the old notion, not yet outgrown, of God as a jealous, watchful, prying, censorious Being, who has no confidence in his children, and who does not feel kindly towards them; a Being, therefore, whom they must hold in distrust and suspicion, and be very careful to keep on the right side of. How slow we are to use the results of our experience in new fields!

We have, as I said before, no fear of falling into the hands of the Living God when we start in trains across a continent, or sail in ships out on the deep sea; for we know that the winds are his messengers, the flaming fires his ministers. We know that the telluric and etherial forces befriend, that gravitation is a powerful servant, that we never can be out of the reach of air and light, and that the living God has no symbols and no agencies more beautiful than these. Here we have demonstration that the unknown is the beneficent. The open mid-ocean is safer than the harbor. When the storm threatens, the pilot keeps clear of the coast. Why should we not feel that the Living God fills with his presence the immense outlying space of mind where our thought has never been, and the vast outlying reaches of experience where our fearful barks have never ventured? Why fear falling into the hand of the Living God, when we launch forth upon the deep sea of knowledge, or reason, or faith, or feeling, more than we fear the same catastrophe when launching forth upon the salt brine of the Atlantic?

Is it answered that, in the latter case, we are certain, and in the former cases we are not? But how did we become certain in the latter case except by experiment? We were not always certain. There are people now who deem it a tempting of providence to cross the ocean in a steam-ship, or to take a railway train. Is it replied again that, in the latter case, we conform to certain rules which ensure our safety? We build ships after a certain model; we have learned how to regulate steam; we understand how to adjust ourselves to the elements; science tells us precisely what we must do when we launch away upon the deep of adventure; we have chart and compass and sextant; the course is marked out for us? True again. But are such appliances wanting when we commit ourselves to those other seas upon which the soul puts forth under providential direction? Are there no laws of right-mindedness? Has the Heart no compass in its pure affections? Has the Conscience no star in its loyalty to rectitude? Has Reason no pilot in its fidelity to what it knows, in its allegiance to what it is convinced of? Surely the Living God does not confine himself to the department of mechanical forces. The chambers of the air are not his only dwelling-place. He is not omnipresent merely as electricity or gravitation. He is intelligence; He is love; He is justice; He is beneficence. You would not say He is to be trusted as atmosphere and distrust as Mind! We have no fear of him as a Force, but we dread Him as a Spirit! We can venture to touch His hand, but we cannot venture to fling ourselves upon His bosom! We can commit our lives to Him, but we shrink from trusting Him with our souls! He has furnished our barking for commerce between land and land; He has not supplied our souls for their more necessary voyage from one region of experience to another! You would not say that!

Certainly, there needs to be caution, prudence, practical wisdom, in making sure that we are in his hands. None but the foolish put off to sea in bowls, or trust themselves to the elements as children play with fire. None but the foolish say—"We take our chance; we know nothing; we have taken no precautions; we simply know that God is good, and will take care of us." It makes no difference what we do or how we behave; we venture in the dark, knowing that at the instant when it seems likely to cover us, the very night will be light about us. They who do that find that the Living God is living law, living justice, living reason, living common-sense, who will have no scruple to blow them up, or send them to the bottom, or starve them out as He did those miserable, deluded colonists of Jaffa. It is a fearful thing for such people to fall into the hands of the Living God. But it is so simply because He is a God of order and equity and truth. This summary dealing with outlaws and fools furnishes the grand reason for trusting him on the part of right-minded men and women. At all events, it is time we abandoned the idea that the unknown is the terrible, or that the Living God is a thing to be afraid of in advance of all experience.

Nay, we have experience. Multitudes have trusted themselves to the Living God, and have found it very sweet to do so. Broad thinkers, cutting themselves adrift from the quiet moorings of their Faith, have launched away under the guidance of knowledge, and, instead of falling sheer into the gulf of unbelief and despair, have found themselves floating over sunny waters, beneath heavens lit with the glory of new constellations; have discovered islands and continents never heard of before; have made acquaintance with fresh territories of thought, and have learned how beautiful it was to be citizens of the world, free to come and go where they would, in full faith that the further they went the more wondering, reverential, and loving they would become, provided they went in sober earnestness and faith.

Venturing to believe in humanity, we have tried republican institutions; and in proportion to the fidelity of our experiment has been the demonstration of its success. Mr. Carlyle's frightful picture of "shooting Niagara" provokes a smile. In live humanity we find there is a live Deity; and so far from its being a "fearful thing" to fall into his hands, we are only praying that we may have grace to fall into his hands more entirely. If anything will save us from the fearfulness of the ancient systems of government, which assumed that the living God dwelt in a palace and left it only to prowl round the gardens and awe intruders, it is trust in the principle that people are best governed when they govern themselves.

It was believed in the olden time that the State must maintain religion; that, if it did not, the evil one who was constantly going about seeking whom he might devour would snap up many souls, as a vulture snaps up chickens, and would bring the whole land to the barrenness of infidelity. The State did cease to have any concern with religion, and the churches multiplied innumerable. Never was so much worship. Never so much piety. Never so much personal faith or conviction. Never so much deep individual concern for spiritual things. The wicked one who prowled about seeking whom he might devour, proved to be the Living God stirring in his children's hearts the embers of the personal religious life.

It was believed in the olden time that either the Church or the State must undertake the support of schools. It was a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the malicious demon of ignorance which infested the world. But on the voluntary system, which throws on people the responsibility of educating themselves, the schools not only increased in numbers but improved in quality. There is better teaching, better discipline, better school architecture and regulation. And so on in other things. We have discovered that the whole universe is filled with the Living God; that the Living God is not living jealousy, or wrath, or cunning, but living truth and goodness and beneficence. We have learned to see Him in the elements that bring us health, comfort, prosperity, happiness. We have learned to see Him in the elements which bring discipline, experience, wisdom. We have learned to see Him in air and light, in the fine gases, in muscle, nerve, fibre, and tissue, in organs and functions. We have learned to see Him in intelligence and affection, in the glow of aspiration and in the courage of a noble will. We have learned to see Him in the wise economies that administer life, in the knowledge that centuries have built up, in the principles that brace us in our difficulty and solace us in our grief. We have come to the belief that the dreadful thing is to fall out of the hands of the Living God, to fall out of knowledge and reason and truth and charity, to fall out of confidence and trust, to remain so shut up in our narrow houses of belief or custom that we do not know what the Living God is, and are continually fancying that he is living ogre or living devil.

Is it a fearful thing to fall into the hands of health or understanding? Is it a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the Being who will make you better? Yes, even if in making you better He make you for the time feel worse.

I know men dread nothing so much as health and knowledge. We will go about with an ugly pain in chest or side, fearful of getting into the hands of a wise physician who may tell us our complaint is more serious than we imagined and calls for immediate treatment; as if, so long as we were ignorant of the complaint, it was not there! As if the physician in telling us of it put it there, and made it incurable! None dread cold water so much as they who most need it. None loathe medicine like the sick. The crisis of virtuous experiments is always fearful. It is a fearful thing when the drunkard puts away his glass; when the opium-eater discards his poisonous drug; when the idler sets himself to work; when the dissolute man enters on a course of virtue; when a pleasure-seeker is immersed in care; when a person of luxurious habits is compelled to endure wholesome hardships; when one who has all he wants is deprived of a portion of his means, and is obliged to work hard to get what he once had for nothing. It is a fearful thing for a mother or father to lose a child, and to be driven by sorrow out of the sweet seclusion of a home untroubled by affliction, into the blank spaces of loneliness; when the winds of restless thought blow chill, and the bitter night dews of grief fall, and the feet stumble over graves, and the blackness of doubt closes round, and only a star, now and then visible in the night heavens, calls back the remembrance of the skies that used always to smile. It is a fearful thing when one who has never questioned his belief first begins to question it, and, stepping out of his old home of Faith, sees what looks like a howling wilderness about him. It is a fearful thing when one who has always dwelt on problems he could master, and has felt perfectly at home with the ordinary questions of his lot, finds himself face to face with problems he cannot master, and gropes about in the dark for an answer to questions that baffle his intelligence. All experimenting of this kind is a fearful thing—all venture into the land of the unknown, though it has been going on for thousands of years, and has always resulted in the nobleness of mankind. Nothing is so fearful as Novelty in custom or institution. However confident their anticipation of heaven, none are ready to die. But experience teaches us that the fearfulness is for the instant. The momentary shock of the plunge over, a new set of powers comes into play; a new order of satisfactions reveals itself to view; a new and broader existence disclosed. We come to learn that to live under law, to live justly, healthfully, obediently, trustingly, is the furthest possible from being a fearful thing. The liar, the thief, the traitor, the murderer, would all be the happier for falling into the hands of the Living God. Let His hands make the criminal's arrest; let his hands institute the discipline; let His hands execute the sentence; the pain will be brief, the peace will be everlasting.

I plead, then, for full faith in the Living God—for full confidence, in the mysterious—for full trust in the unknown. I plead for the substitution of a spirit of quiet repose for a spirit of fear, as we think of the power that holds our destiny in its hands. I plead for a spirit of courage in meeting emergencies, facing difficulties, coming in contact with trials, encountering what seem to be evils, entering upon new and untried paths of life. Let us be sure that there is no demon but the demon of doubt, fear, ignorance, in our own timid bosoms; that out of doors all is light and power. How simple all this is! yet how dark! The words of the old Christian Apostle sound in our ears almost like impiety. Yet how many practically regard them so!

"Yes, write it in the rock!" Saint Bernard said;

"Grave it on brass with adamant pen."

"Tis God himself becomes apparent, when God's wisdom and God's goodness are displayed. For God of these his attributes is made."

Well spake the impetuous Saint, and bore of men

The hearty suffrage. Now not one in ten

Recalls the obscure opponent he outweighed.

God's wisdom and God's goodness! Ay, but fools

Misdefine these, till God knows them no more.

Wisdom and Goodness, they are God! What schools

Have yet so much as heard this simple lore?

This no Saint preaches, and this no Church rules;

'Tis in the desert, now and hereafter.

THE IGNORANCE OF THE CLERGY.

[From the Catholic Advocate, Louisville, Ky.]

It is quite refreshing to read some of the tirades of infidel writers on the utter ignorance of the clergy on subjects which these writers consider of so much importance, that every other subject is to them of no importance at all. Especially spicy is an article we read in a paper printed in Ohio somewhere and called THE INDEX. This paper is devoted to the propagation of "Free Religion," whatever it means by that. It advances theories about God and man that are very far from being new and just as far from being well put or presented by these intellectual giants. They are wholly out of temper with the clergy of every denomination, because they do not see the evident orthodoxy of their opinions and very peculiar belief, and forthwith they sound it abroad that the clergy are always behind the march of science. They, no doubt, believe what they write, as they are of the opinion, that what does not come up to the views of THE INDEX must surely be behind the high point of modern science. The theory of Darwin on the descent of man being its latest discovery, and that not new either, they think it very unbecoming in a Rev. Methodist minister to be unwilling to consider being kicked by a mule as a family quarrel. They cannot have patience with any one who will deny the very plain fact that he comes from a snail, a lizard, an ape, or perhaps an ass. Indeed, so very noble is this genealogy that it is provoking that our ears are not longer, and that, by some unaccountable mistake, we have not tails. It is indeed enough to excite the pens of these learned men to sharper wit against the dolts of ministers who do not see that the theory of Darwin is as plain as two and two are four. What on earth can one say against it? Nothing! It struck dumb the world and the rest of mankind when it was first announced, long before Darwin was born, and every day but adds to the proof that mankind came from something very low, while itself came from nothing. Any minister of the gospel that cannot see how beautifully this system is evolved, and how reasonable and intellectual it is, must be at the far-end of science and deserving of the contempt of these men of Toledo who are trying to make a living by publishing THE INDEX. What must be very amusing to every one is the fact that these Toledo men seem to believe what they say. They are wholly innocent of what must be plain to every one else, that Darwin himself laughs in his sleeves at the stupidity of the numbers he has gulled into believing, as true, what he wrote as a joke, but, afterwards seeing that he could turn an honest penny by it, put it forth as the latest and best discovery of science. This the clergy of every denomination understand well, and hence not only hold to the Mosaic account of man's descent, but turn into ridicule or do not notice at all the mad ravings of men who are trying in every way to trace the origin of man to a source more degraded than we are willing to give the brute creation. It is strange that this ignorance of the clergy has not been noticed in all the past. We have been simple enough to think that, as a body, they were equal to any other class, to say the least. They have generally tried to exhort men to prove themselves worthy of their high origin, and could not see anything to be gained for liberty, morality or science, by pointing man to the slimy snail as the point whence he came.

THE TRUE TIME OF THE SABBATH.

[The following extract from an article contributed to the Morning Star very forcibly illustrates the folly of a superstitious reverence for the "Sabbath," though written with a different purpose.—Ed.]

I stated in my former article: "It is impossible that there can be any specific day for the whole world; because the time of the rising of the sun differs at different places all around the earth."

Melancthon takes exception to this statement, and says: "Can my brother mean that there can be no specific day? Does he not rather mean no specific time? The time of the rising of the sun at Jerusalem and at the city of Washington would widely differ, but the seventh day from creation at these different places would be the same."

I do mean, "there can be no specific day" observed all over the earth, and think I have proved it, and have shown that at some two places very near each other there must of necessity be nearly twenty-four hours' difference in the time of commencing the Sabbath, and have indicated where this difference really exists. But I ask further, if, as Melancthon admits, "the time of the rising of the sun at Jerusalem and at the city of Washington would widely differ, how can it be possible that 'the seventh day from creation, at these different places, would be the same?'"

I suppose that the term "day," when used in this connection, means a complete revolution of the sun. I am not aware that any one knows where the garden of Eden was situated. But for the sake of illustration, I will assume that it was, as some believe, somewhere near the meridian of Persia; and that at sunset on the day on which Adam and Eve were created, the first Sabbath commenced there. But at the antipodes, which would be somewhere on the Pacific coast of the United States, it was not sunset, but sunrise at that time. When did the first Sabbath commence at that point? There was twelve hours' difference in the time. Did the Sabbath commence at a different hour of the day? Or did it commence twelve hours sooner, or twelve hours later? If the first, then wherever we are, we must be in uncertainty when to commence our Sabbath, unless Melancthon can solve the question as to where the garden of Eden was located; and if either of the others, then Melancthon's idea about the "seventh day" being "the same," is exploded, and we are in the same uncertainty, on his principles, as to what day to keep, unless he can tell us whether the time is to be reckoned earlier or later.

But perhaps he will say this is only an ideal, and not a real difficulty. He may take the position that no one then lived at the antipodes to keep the Sabbath; that Adam and Eve were the only human beings then living; that they of course knew when the first Sabbath commenced; that the regular succession of weeks has been preserved from that time, and that the proper time for commencing the Sabbath is at sunset on each succeeding sixth day, down to the end of time. Very well. Let us see where this will bring us. Some of the descendants of Adam and Eve emigrated westward, and others emigrated eastward. Whichever way they went, it was their duty to commence the Sabbath on each sixth day evening, Friday evening, as we now call it. This emigration has continued westward and eastward, until the Anglo-American and the Chinese have met in California. How then? As the Anglo-American and his predecessors have passed westward, the day has extended twelve hours, and as the Chinese and his predecessors have passed eastward the day has shortened twelve hours; and hence the Chinese in California is twenty-four hours ahead of the Anglo-American; and if the latter is to commence his Sabbath on Friday evening, then by the same rule, the former must commence his on Thursday evening; because each person must, according to Melancthon, be careful to observe the seventh day of each week in regular succession from the creation.

And the same rule will hold good with every one else. If, like Carleton of the Boston Journal, Melancthon should make the tour of the world, and, sailing eastward, should return by the way of California, he would find that, during his absence, he had lived one day more than his friends who had remained in the United States; and he would therefore be obliged to commence his Sabbath on Thursday evening; while those who think with him, but had remained at home, would commence theirs on Friday evening. And if I adopt Melancthon's views, and also make the tour of the world, but go by the way of California, and return across the Atlantic, I shall find that I have lived a day less than my friends who remained at home, and while careful to keep the seventh day Sabbath, I shall have to commence it on Saturday evening, and thus, with the same views, there will be two days between us; while the other seventh day Sabbatharians will keep a different day from either of us. Probably Melancthon will call this foolish reasoning, but he must remember that he contends for the keeping of the "seventh day from creation;" and this is the logical result of acting on his claim.

Reputation is what men and women think of us. Character is what God and angels know of us.—Thomas Paine.

THE CINCINNATI SUNDAY AGITATION.

THE ARBEITER HALL RESOLUTIONS.

WHEREAS, Under the constitution of Ohio (article 1, section 7) no preference shall be given by law to any religious society, and no interference with the rights of conscience shall be permitted;

Resolved, That the question whether the individual citizen shall observe a day of rest from labor, and what day he shall select for such observance, or whether he shall do business or labor or abstain from it on any day, is not a public question to be regulated by legislative enactments, no more than the question what hat or clothes he shall wear, but a strictly private matter, the determination of which should be left to his own conscience, views of propriety, interests or desires.

Resolved, That the so-called Sunday laws and ordinances requiring men to refrain from common labor and making it a penal offence to do acts on Sunday which are lawful on any other day of the week, and which do not interfere with the public peace or the rights and liberties of anybody, must be considered an encroachment upon individual rights, incompatible with the spirit of our state constitution.

Resolved, That these laws cannot be uniformly and impartially enforced, and that a partial or arbitrary enforcement of any law conferring privileges and immunities on some branches of business or industry, or on some particular avocation, and also on certain classes of the people, which immunities are denied to other branches or avocations, must be considered a violation of the principle of republican equality and of "equal and exact justice to all."

Resolved, That the question whether or how to observe a day of rest might and will, in its general features, be regulated by custom, like the observance of the 4th of July, and Christmas and New Year's holidays, without legislative interference with private affairs or infringement of personal liberty.

THE PIKE'S HALL RESOLUTIONS.

"Although the constitution has prohibited religious establishments, it does not forbid judicial cognizance of those offences against religion and morality which have no reference to any such establishment, or to any particular form of government, but are punishable because they strike at the root of moral obligation, and weaken the security of the social ties. We therefore hold that the moral and religious sentiments of the American people, which have obtained the recognition of the moral government of God from the beginning of our national history, not only in the fundamental laws of the commonwealths of the Union, but in the administration of the several departments of the national government, and in the statutes and municipal regulations under which we have enjoyed the largest liberty compatible with peace, order and safety, demand the continuance of those legal provisions for the protection of our rights in the peaceful observance of the ordinances of Christianity, which have hitherto existed upon our statute books without detriment to morality, and without any interference with the consciences of any class of citizens. In making this demand we disclaim all design of creating any religious establishment contrary to the constitution, and all purpose of imposing our religious views and obligations upon others, and all expectation of policing men into the practice of moral duties; yet we insist that non-conscientiousness in religion is not entitled to the same respect that is properly due to conscientious convictions clearly defined and religiously observed. Irreligion is not equal to Christianity before the law. Judaism is specially and justly protected, but atheism is a negation, incapable of standing by the side of positive faith. Hence, in urging the continuance of the policy which has heretofore prevailed in this country in regard to the legal protection of religion, we ask for nothing that we are unwilling to grant to all men; therefore,

"Resolved, That the Sunday laws of our state and city are wise, judicious and wholesome enactments, in complete harmony with the constitutions of the state and the nation, with the genius of our government, with the moral convictions of those who founded our institutions, and of those who have preserved them, and that we are conscientiously opposed to any change of policy that would repeal them.

"Resolved, That the demand for the repeal of our Sunday laws is based not upon religious, but irreligious grounds; and coming as it does, not from the toiling multitudes who form the bone and sinew of the nation, nor from those engaged in legitimate and honorable trade, but from pleasure seekers and dealers in intoxicating beverages, whose business naturally tends to lawlessness, poverty and crime, can not be regarded as the voice of the people in the interest of morality, but of a class in the interest of dissipation, and should not be heeded by our law makers.

"Resolved, That we regard the preservation of the civil Sabbath, substantially as now regulated by law, as indispensable to the moral and physical welfare of the laboring classes; and the best and only available means of protecting them from the avarice of capitalists, and of securing to them a regular and stated day of rest, which the laws of nature imperatively demand.

"Resolved, That as citizens having in view the welfare of ourselves and families, the peace and prosperity of our city, and the interests of morality, we do solemnly protest against the proposition to repeal the Sunday laws, and will use all honorable exertions to maintain unaltered the time-honored policy of our government in regard to the toleration and protection of religion."

When Thackeray was at the Revere House in Boston, one Sunday morning, says The Commonwealth, he asked the landlord, Paron Stevens, where Theodore Parker preached. The landlord said he did not know. "Don't know!" exclaimed Thackeray in his most astonished tones. "Why, Sir, we've heard his voice away across the Atlantic. He is the greatest preacher in America." Stevens tells this story himself, and how cheap he felt in running about his house to find where the great iconoclast held forth.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I do not know whether I am a Free Religionist or not. I believe in free inquiry. I rejoice in the idea of a universal fatherhood and brotherhood. I love truth and want to know it, be it ever so homely. I believe, in the language of Pope:—

'All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul!'

or as the motto adopted by H. C. Cary—"All are parts of one harmonious whole, the soul of which is God." Yes, and I may add I believe in one destiny of all mankind. In regard to man I believe we should exercise all our faculties harmoniously in their legitimate spheres of action, according to the best light we have,—above all things be honest with ourselves and our fellow-man. Further, I believe in harmonious education as the foundation of all true and permanent reform in all vocations of life; and to this end I should be glad to see springing up all over the land lyceum institutes for free discussion and instruction in all that pertains to man's harmonious development, and these well supplied with books, apparatus, and lecturers, all connected in one great system, like the heart and arteries in the human system. We want more attention to human culture and less to creed squabbles. I hate this creed-spirit, this sanctimonious selfishness that says—"I am right, therefore you're wrong;" but I like the spirit of—"Come, let us reason together." These are some of my beliefs and aspirations. Please excuse my enthusiasm, for, like most others, I have my ideals of human perfection and yearn most earnestly to attain them. In this connection allow me to ask one or two questions. Are the evening schools mentioned in THE INDEX a part of the works of the Free Religious Association? To express myself more clearly, is that the practical part of Free Religion? If so, I heartily endorse that much of it, and would recommend an extension of the same to the country. I do not know whether I am a Free Religionist or not, nor do I care, provided I have the truth. I have no name for my faith; people may call it what they please, remembering they are responsible for all misrepresentations."

"Enclosed find one dollar for THE INDEX the other half of the year, and consider me a permanent subscriber. I think THE INDEX is doing much good; and as our Independent Society progresses, I think we shall be able to swell your list of subscribers. We have had six speakers in as many months, leading off with Connor and ending with Pillsbury, and others between equally good; but we are poor and few, and shall accept aid from any lecturer thankfully, or from any more able society. Meantime we shall do all we can for the cause of freedom. We have great faith in the efforts that are now being made towards harmonizing all theories and discords, and promising peace to all mankind."

"Please excuse my negligence in forwarding my subscription in time. I cannot do without THE INDEX, so accept the within for one year and continue to send the dear little paper."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be suspended during the months of July and August. Special notice will be given of any occasional meetings that may be held.

DONATION.—The INDEX ASSOCIATION acknowledge with thanks the receipt of $5.00 from Mrs. Margaret Chappell Smith, of New Harmony, Ind.

RECEIVED.

LECTURE ON THE BIBLE. Delivered in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, June 13, and in St. George's Hall, London, July 2, 1871. By Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, B. A., late Vicar of Healaugh. London: TRUEBNER & Co., Paternoster Row. Manchester: JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate. Ramsgate: THOMAS SCOTT, Esq. 1871. Price Sixpence. pp. 48.

THE LAWYER AND HIS CLIENTS, with an examination of Hon. George T. Curtis' Opinion on the Susquehanna Litigations. By ALBERT STICKNEY. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & COMPANY. 1871. pp. 75.

IN MEMORIAM. SAMUEL JOSEPH MAY. Born in Boston, Massachusetts, Sept. 12, 1797. Died in Syracuse, N. Y., July 1, 1871. Syracuse: Printed at the JOURNAL OFFICE. 1871. pp. 75.

THE REJECTED ADDRESS. Man's True Relation to Nature: his Origin, Character, and Destiny. By T. P. WILSON, M. D., Cleveland, O., Editor Ohio Medical and Surgical Reporter. Delivered in Philadelphia, June 6, 1871. L. H. WHITE, Publisher, No. 17, Public Square, Cleveland, O.: W. S. ROBISON & Co., 65 and 67 Franklin St. 1871. pp. 26.

YALE COLLEGE. Some Statements respecting the Late Progress and Present Condition of the University, for the Information of its Graduates, Friends and Benefactors. June 1, 1871. pp. 80.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. August, 1871. Rev. JOHN H. MORISON, D. D., Editor. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLES, Proprietor. No. 3 Beacon Street.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. Edited by Mrs. M. CORA BLAND. Indianapolis. August, 1871.

Poetry,

BEYOND THE VEIL.

He paused, and questioned with his eye
The hearers' verdict on his song.
A low voice asked—"Is 't well to pry
Into the secrets which belong
Only to God? The life to be
Is still the unguessed mystery;
Unsealed, unpiereced the cloudy walls remain,
We beat with dream and wish the soundless doors in vain."

WHITTIER. Tent on the Beach.

The Index.

AUGUST 12, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

NOTICE—THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

THE subscribers to the Capital Stock of THE INDEX ASSOCIATION are hereby notified that a meeting of said subscribers will be held at the office of the Toledo Printing Company, 90 St. Clair street, on Thursday, the 17th day of August, at 7½ P. M., for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors, and adopting rules for the government of said incorporation.
E. P. BASSETT,
CALVIN CONE,
PETER H. BATESON,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
HENRY E. HOWE.

Toledo, O., July 8, 1871.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed; and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten	" 1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	" 1,000
GUDLO MARX,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	" 1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	" 1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	" 300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	" 300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	" 300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	" 300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	" 500
J. G. HOLZWARTH,	"	"	One	" 100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	" 100
C. AUCHARD,	"	"	"	" 100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	" 3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	" 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Three	" 300
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	One	" 100
Miss A. HALL,	Deiance,	"	"	" 100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	" 100
J. SEDGEWICK,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	" 100
CARL POST,	Painesville,	O.,	"	" 100
HENRY MILLER,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	" 300
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	" 500
J. L. WHITING,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	" 100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Boston,	"	"	" 100
J. E. SUTTON,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	" 100
S. I. DURKEE,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	" 100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	" 100
S. L. SPENCER,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	" 1,000
JON. F. BARRETT,	Haverhill,	"	Two	" 200
E. W. WEIR,	Boston,	"	"	" 200
FRANK PRATHER,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	" 200
E. F. DINSMORE,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
W. J. DICKINSON,	Wellsville,	Kan.,	One	" 100
G. C. GLATTE,	New York,	N. Y.,	"	" 200
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Middlefield,	Ct.,	Fourteen,	" 1,400
Miss E. EMERSON,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three,	" 300
W. C. GANNETT,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	" 300
Miss M. C. PERKINS,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	" 100
W. H. DOWNES,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	" 300
B. B. SMITH,	Birmingham,	Ala.,	One	" 100
	Lansing,	Mich.,	"	" 100

$22,900

APPEAL OF THE LIBERAL ALLIANCE.

The subjoined appeal of the Toledo Liberal Alliance speaks for itself. It was prepared by a committee specially appointed for the purpose, consisting of Hon. J. M. Ritchie and F. E. Abbot; and with one or two verbal changes it was adopted by the Alliance. Several thousand copies have been printed for distribution in English and German, the German translation being also published in the Toledo Woechoentliche Express.

The necessity for political action in defence of the principle of purely secular government is increasingly evident, and political action is especially contemplated by the new organization. On a previous page will be found the two series of resolutions of the parties now so vigorously contending over the Sunday question in Cincinnati; and it is clear that the issue there made on the question whether the State has the right to enforce by legal penalties the observance of Sunday as a Sabbath, must be decided at last by some broad principle determining the relation which shall subsist between the State and the Christian Church. Without approving the action of the Cincinnati liberals in all respects, we are entirely with them so far as they can stand on the platform of the Toledo Liberal Alliance. This movement is not and should not be considered a "German" movement; it is a movement of liberal citizens, without regard to nativity, for the fuller application of the ground-principles of the American government.

That such citizens should organize in some effective manner for this purpose, and that such organization should be based on universal principles rather than local or side issues, must be evident to every one who appreciates the aptitude of the American people for ideas. Hence the appeal here made is entitled to the closest scrutiny of all American radicals, since it is believed to contain the platform, simple, brief, yet comprehensive, on which the great future party of Liberals must plant itself in the civil struggle that is surely coming. Whoever would avert the possibility of this civil struggle becoming also a military one, will see the necessity of teaching the as yet uneducated public to apply these great principles in the settlement of nascent issues. Just as the Abolitionists were in former times the true peace party of the country, and pointed out the only means which could have averted the Civil War, namely, immediate emancipation, so the Liberals today point out the only means which can avert a war even more dreadful still, namely, thorough and consistent separation of Church and State. The private liberty and the universal intelligence of the individuals composing the nation are at stake, and can be secured in no other way.

But without further remark we append the appeal.

TO THE LIBERALS OF AMERICA.

An Association of Liberals, called the TOLEDO LIBERAL ALLIANCE and open to all persons who sympathize with its objects, has been recently organized in this city for the purpose of "preserving and promoting social, civil, and religious freedom." To this end they propose to maintain and propagate the following principles:

1. The right of each individual to the largest liberty compatible with the equal right of every other individual.
2. The absolute separation of Church and State.
3. Free and universal education to be provided and enforced by the State.

That popular organizations, devoted to the above objects, are needed in America, is plain to every thoughtful, observant, and liberal mind. Although few persons might deny the abstract truth of the three principles above stated, it is evident that they are practically disregarded to a considerable extent in our national, state, and municipal legislation. A pressing necessity exists for impressing them more vividly on public opinion, and for securing a more thorough application of them in our laws. They are violated in various ways:

1. The "tyranny of the majority" is manifested in statutes which, though sometimes dead letters, too often practically infringe on the just liberties of the individual. Especially is this true of statutes designed to enforce religious observances and moral reforms by legislative means.

2. The final separation of Church and State is not yet fully effected in this country. Presidents and Governors proclaim religious fasts and festivities; chaplains are supported from the public treasury in Congress and in the State Legislatures, in the army, navy, and militia, and in various public institutions; Bible-reading as a part of religious worship is maintained in the public schools; grants of money and land are made to various sectarian bodies; churches and parsonages are exempted from taxation; the Sabbath observance of Sunday is legally enforced in many places; religious associations are actively and even openly engaged in political affairs for the furtherance of sectarian objects; religious riots, like the late outbreak in New York city, are liable to occur through the criminal connivance of public officials; dangerous attempts are even making to unite Church and State by a formal Christian Amendment of the United States Constitution; and in various other ways it is clear that the absolute separation of Church and State is a principle neither fully understood nor faithfully obeyed by the people of the United States.

3. The common-school education of all children in the country is not yet secured, nor will it be until it is conceded that parents and guardians have no right for any reason to deprive the children under their care of the right to be educated and thereby fitted for an honorable career in life. A more complete and universal educational system is manifestly essential to the perpetuity of republican institutions.

For these reasons the members of the TOLEDO LIBERAL ALLIANCE appeal to their fellow-liberals throughout the country to organize a similar Alliance in every city, town, and village of the land. The principles above stated are absolutely necessary to the existence of free popular government; and the signs of the times show that they are in increasing danger. The Corresponding Secretary of the TOLEDO LIBERAL ALLIANCE will communicate with all persons who may desire further information on the subject; and it is earnestly hoped that steps will be promptly taken to secure united action on all proper occasions.

TOLEDO, O., July, 1871.

MANSSEL'S "METAPHYSICS."

D. Appleton & Co. have just issued a neat reprint of Henry Longueville Mansel's "Metaphysics, or the Philosophy of Consciousness Phenomenal and Real," originally published as an article in the "Encyclopædia Britannica." It contains two main divisions, as indicated by the title,—the former being devoted to "psychology, or the philosophy of the phenomena of consciousness," and the other to "ontology, or the philosophy of the realities of consciousness."

This general division sufficiently betrays the philosophical bias of the work, since both the "phenomena" and the "realities" are included under the one category of "consciousness." That is to say, Mr. Mansel, in common with almost all of the leading modern students of philosophy (including even John Stuart Mill and his disciples, who are otherwise so profoundly at variance with him), accepts as "proved" the thesis of Kant, that "the real, in its highest sense, could not be an object of consciousness." [p. 267]. The logical outcome of this principle is idealism, pure and absolute. The ultimate effect of the application of the modern scientific method to metaphysics, scarcely yet attempted with any degree of rigor, profundity, or consistency, will be the establishment of philosophy on a thoroughly objective basis. The revolution started by Kant has nearly run its course. The necessity of a new revolution is uneasily and vaguely felt by the great masters of modern science, although no thinker has yet arisen of sufficient speculative genius to satisfy the want. Herbert Spencer is only a John the Baptist.

Mr. Mansel, whose death in his fifty-first year is just announced, is widely known as the author of "Prolegomena Logica" and the famous Bampton lectures on the "Limits of Religious Thought." He is the ablest and most distinguished champion of the distinctive doctrines of the Hamiltonian metaphysics, to which a more or less qualified adhesion is given by such men as Dr. Cairns, Prof. Fraser, Prof. Veitch, and Prof. Baynes. His present work is of standard value as a useful compend of the doctrines of his school. His style is admirably lucid; and all who are endowed by nature with the capacity for grappling with the deepest questions of pure thought will find themselves well repaid by study of his views.

For sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

SANCTIFIED IMMORALITIES.

"F. B. Dowd, of Davenport, was arrested the other day for circulating obscene works. He brought into court his own publications and a Bible, and endeavored to prove that certain passages in the latter were worse than those complained of in his books. The court decided that this was no justification and fined him."

The above paragraph is floating through the newspaper press of the country. It may well make the thoughtless think. Of course the existence of obscene passages in the Bible is no "justification" for the circulation of indecent literature; but by what right does the court punish the publication of secular indecencies and allow similar offences to go unpunished when committed in the name of religion? By what right does it fine F. B. Dowd, and tolerate the Bible Society? By what right does it thus discriminate in favor of inspired obscenity?

It would be a salutary lesson to the churches, if a prosecution should be commenced against the Bible Society for disseminating literature which, notwithstanding its alleged Divine origin, is fitted partly to corrupt and poison the minds of the young. In THE INDEX No. 81, one of our correspondents called for "household" editions of the Bible. What better way to secure them, than to teach the orthodox community by a sharp, practical proof that there are indecencies in the Bible too gross to be tolerated in any respectable family, and that the plea of "inspiration" and "Divine revelation" is no protection against the impartial execution of the law? Whoever should institute such a prosecution would do a great service to the cause of good morals. Either abolish the law against obscene publications altogether, or else apply it rigorously to all.

Resolved, That the use of Sunday as a day of rest from common labor and an opportunity for the highest culture is a great benefit, alike to society and the individual, if based on the free conviction and approval of the community; but that the ecclesiastical observance of it as the so-called "holy Sabbath" has no basis in duty, utility, reason, religion, or even in the Bible.

Resolved, That all persons, so long as they respect each other's equal rights, should be legally protected in using Sunday according to the dictates of their own consciences; but that all further legislation on the subject is both unjust and inexpedient.

He who finds his highest bliss in applause has his deepest motive in vanity.

F. R. A. PUBLICATIONS.

The attention of all persons interested in the Free Religious Association is called to the revised advertisement, on another page, of its publications. It will be seen that the Report of the late Annual Meeting of the Association is now ready for distribution. The price has been put lower than in previous years, and it is hoped that the sale will be correspondingly larger. The price of the previous Reports, whose contents are still very valuable, has also been reduced to twenty-five cents each. The friends of the Association cannot do it a better service than by buying and circulating its Reports. Every copy sold helps the Treasury of the Association, and, what is more, helps spread the best kind of information concerning the ideas and principles for which the Association exists.

Another representative publication which the Association has recently added to its list is Col. T. W. Higginson's essay, originally printed in The Radical, on "The Sympathy of Religions." Let this also be widely circulated and widely read. It is a subject now attracting general attention, and this is an excellent paper upon the subject. Friends of the Association, keep its published documents circulating!

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary F. R. A.

RELIGION AND ATHEISM.

The question has recently been raised whether a person who calls himself an atheist can be a member of the Free Religious Association. Does not the very name of the Association, it is asked, imply a belief in the existence of God, and does it not therefore contain a creed which necessarily limits membership to theists and excludes atheists? This question, it should be said, has been raised, not so much by the class of persons called atheists and who, it would seem, should be most interested in it, as by certain Christian believers who manifest a strong desire to fasten the charge of inconsistency upon the Association. Possibly there are some individuals of the so-called atheistic class who, not entirely understanding the objects and methods of the Association, may feel themselves excluded from membership by the insertion of the words "religion" and "religious" in the constitution. But as a matter of fact, there are many of this class who are members of the Association and apparently have not found any of their rights infringed upon, either by the terms of the constitution or by any action of the society.

And this fact presents the first point in the answer to the above question. As a class, persons who call themselves, or are called, atheists are not excluded from the Association and do not feel themselves excluded. Even though it should have to be admitted that there is a verbal antagonism between atheistic opinion and membership in a society that calls itself "religious," practically, it is seen, there is no antagonism. Within the last fortnight the names of two persons have been added to the list of members, who announced themselves as believing in "no revelations but those of science;" as being "sceptical as to the existence of a Deity," and as having "no faith that either science or intuition will ever be able to demonstrate the truth on that subject." Others of this class have been on the roll of membership from the first. If a strict definition of the term theist were to be insisted upon, it is probable that there are some members of the Executive Committee of the Association to whom the term could not be correctly applied. Were the line between words to be closely drawn, the Secretary might be more accurately classed as Pantheist than Theist. And if the popular conception of Deity that is in vogue in Christendom be made the standard of theistic belief, it is very certain that there are many prominent and active members of the Association who would be called atheists, and who, if the terms of that popular definition were to be accepted, would not deny the name. In point of fact, then, membership in the Free Religious Association is not actually limited to those who either by popular or by logical definition are classed as theists.

And if it be a fact that membership in the Association is not actually limited by theistic belief, the fact may be considered as settling another point,—namely, that it was not the intention of those who framed and adopted the constitution that the word "religious" should make any such limitations. The practical working of the organization from the beginning might fairly be taken as interpreting its intent on this question of fellowship. Yet, as the point is very important, it may be well to add a word or two more of evidence. The writer of this article had as much to do as any one with the framing of the constitution and the choice of names for the Association. He was present at all the conferences and Committee-meetings which finally resulted in the organization of the society. And he can state confidently that no word was uttered by any one on any of these occasions that breathed the least desire or suggestion that any person or class of persons should be excluded from membership. On the contrary the whole stress of the aim seemed to be concentrated in the other direction. The desire and determination were to make an organization so broad and to frame the constitution in such unmistakably liberal terms that all seekers of truth, of whatever name, would feel themselves included. And if there be any element of limitation and exclusiveness in the term "religious" as defining the scope and aims of the Society, the word certainly was not chosen for this reason, but rather because it was thought to be a word of the largest possible inclusiveness consistent with giving any idea of the purport of the organization. Here is a point that specially distinguishes the Free Religious Association from the religious denominations of Christendom. These latter, while varying greatly from each other in the terms and breadth of their fellowship, yet each and all put words and phrases into their articles of organization with the express purpose of somewhere limiting fellowship. But the former phrased its constitution with the express purpose of extending fellowship and making it unlimited.

If the objection still be urged, that, though this was the intent, it has been frustrated by the word "religious," which logically should exclude all persons of atheistic opinion, it might be answered that the logic of this reasoning is not beyond question. There are certainly many people who believe in religion who yet cannot be classed as theists; as, for example (not to raise the mooted question whether Buddhism is theistic or atheistic) Comte and his school of Positivists. Religion is at least a larger word than theism, and does not necessarily imply theism. It is certain that there have been persons who would be called religious both in spirit and in conduct who have had no belief in an individual, personal Deity; no belief in a God apart from the law and activity of the universe. And it is quite certain, too, that most of the so-called atheists are only protesting against the popular conception of Deity as individual and personal—as a Being who would still remain with his infinite, conscious sovereignty intact, though the whole universe, with all its finite phenomena of matter and mind, should be annihilated. Very likely a fair understanding of the matter would show that all of the class are only making this protest against the prevailing notions of Deity. For where is there a thinking man—and this class are almost without exception native thinkers—who does not admit that there must be somehow within the universe a Power that, to his thought, takes the place of the old idea of a personal God as the sustaining cause of all things, and who will not acknowledge that the human mind, however the fact is to be explained, is conscious of inherent obligation to a law of truth and right? He may call it nature, or law, or force, universal principle, or whatever other name; yet it stands to him for a Power to which man in a sense is subject, which it is well for him to learn more and more about, and with which he must come into harmony in order to attain the highest ends of living. And does not this recognition contain the essence of the religious sentiment?

But, after all, though this defence of the word "Religious" might be made, it would probably not be the ground which the Free Religious Association as a body would take with regard to the use of the word in its name and constitution. It may satisfy individuals, but a serious objection to it, when considered with reference to the entire Association, is that it implies a definition of religion—and to make any definition of religion, or of any other word, a necessary bond of the organization is just what the Association would avoid. Moreover, there are some persons who insist that the word "Religion" is synonymous with superstition, and that no definition of it can save it from abandonment when reason is fully recognized as sovereign: and it is to be assumed that the Association does not wish to exclude even these persons from its fellowship.

What, then, is the interpretation of the name of the Association that is most consonant with its principle of free fellowship? Is it not naturally and simply this? The Association invites, and provides opportunity for men and women of the greatest variety of belief, temperament, thought, to come together for mutual conference on problems that concern the highest interests of human life. The term "Religious" was evidently chosen to indicate the character of the problems which the Association would consider, and not any decisions that must be arrived at. It is, if any so please to phrase it, an organization for free conference about religion—based on the confidence that by the stimulus to thought which comes from a free interchange of views truth is both discovered and practically profited. And though theists amay not believe in religion, they have yet a great deal to say about religion. If they believe it a superstition and harmful to mankind, they have their reasons to give for so believing. The Free Religious Association says that those reasons are entitled to a respectful hearing; let them be answered if they can be, but heard they have a right to be. Nor does it as an Association decide between the parties as to which has truth on its side. Members may be as strong in their convictions on one side or the other, as their thought shall respectively impel them. But the Association only offers a free and impartial opportunity for earnest and sincere thought on both sides to express itself and win such approval from its hearers as it may. It says to Theists and Atheists alike, as to all other classes of believers or disbelievers:—"Only be true to your own thought and conscience, and make no attempt to impose your conviction on another's thought and conscience, and here you can come together for free and harmonious interchange of opinions on questions of the highest concern to human welfare."

That great mutual benefit would be derived from such equal and fraternal intercourse can hardly be doubted. On this point and one or two others involved in the general subject, something more may be said in a future number. Suffice it to add now that the incidents connected with the origin of the Association, the articles of organization which it adopted, and its entire subsequent history, all combine to show that the interpretation just given of the significance of its name is correctly drawn from the spirit and record of the Association itself.

W. J. P.

ERRATUM.—In the article on Keshub Chunder Sen in No. 83 of THE INDEX, in the statement concerning Mr. Sen's forwarding a MS. to this country, the word "endorsing" should have been printed enclosing. Mr. Sen said nothing about endorsing the MS. Probably he would not endorse all of it. He simply wished to help his friend in obtaining a publisher.

W. J. P.

The Illustrated Christian Weekly is beautifully printed, with fine illustrations, by the American Tract Society in New York, and edited by Rev. Lyman Abbott. We entertain a sincere respect for its editor, but very little for its objects. Many of the articles, however, are good,—chiefly those which relate to general topics. A religious paper which is obliged to resort to "illustrations" in order to make itself attractive is mainly interesting, from our point of view, as "illustrating" the decay of living faith in Christian doctrines in the public mind. The intense and sinewy old Puritans contrived to be "Christian" without "Illustrated Weeklies;" and if their descendants are driven to use such sensational persuasives to Christian faith, it is because Christianity is tottering to its fall.

The fine discourse of Mr. Frothingham published today on our first page will be put into tract form at once. Price, five cents a copy, or fifty cents for twelve copies. Orders are solicited from all who wish to help us in the publication of liberal tracts. If this experiment proves successful, we shall issue other tracts in the same manner.

GALLING YOKES.

It is not often that we can steal time to read stories; but "Pink and White Tyranny," by Mrs. Stowe, is one of the noblest teachers of the times. All that is best in the New England character has gone to the making of this book. The oaken fibre of a morality toughened and developed by generations of hard, stern experience, which is the material out of which John Seymour is made, is set beside the French flimsiness of his wife Lillie, like iron beside spun glass.

"Stand at your post, and, if need be, die there!" That is the lesson of the book, applied to a case which demands more moral heroism than any other—an unhappy marriage. Mrs. Stowe utters a protest against the "easy dissolution of the marriage contract" which every friend of woman will do well to ponder. "Is it possible that they [the friends of facile divorce] do not see that this is a liberty, which, once granted, would always tell against the weaker sex? If the woman who finds that she has made a mistake, and married a man unkind or uncongenial, may on the discovery of it leave him and seek her fortune with another, so also may a man." Aye, there's the rub!

We have been thinking much on this subject of late (as what thoughtful person has not?); and Mrs. Stowe utters here with startling force the thought which has been shaping itself with very great distinctness in our own mind. Given perfectly free divorce, which will most often avail themselves of it, women or men? Such freedom is a sword, cutting both ways; and it is men, not women, who wield the sword with power. For every woman made happier by divorce, a hundred women will be plunged into a living hell. That is the ugly fact that cannot be rubbed out; and woman's friends may well pause to ponder it. In their pondering it will be a help to have read this earnest, serious book of Mrs. Stowe's.

Roberts and Brothers, Boston, republish the story from Old and New. For sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

"Infidel," says the Golden Age, "has come to mean one whose religious opinions differ from the one who uses the term, and is oftentimes an unintentional compliment of a high order." True—and why? Because the man who can find no better argument than abusive epithets, like Dogberry, writes himself down an ass. This is paying a decidedly "unintentional compliment" to him whose superior intellect cuts off all resource but that of "calling names" and "making faces."

We observe that the Golden Age, however, is not eager to accept any such left-handed compliments. Instead of defending "infidelity," it argues for "Christianity." Those who so hastily quote the Golden Age against THE INDEX would do well to notice this fact.

Wendell Phillips pays a beautiful tribute in the National Standard to the memory of Gen. Edward N. Hallowell, who has just died at West Medford, Mass. Gen. Hallowell was second in command at Fort Wagner, where he was wounded, and after the death of Col. Shaw played a hero's part in that terrible but immortal conflict. Well says Mr. Phillips:—"The land whose keen peril called out such men can never fail. Their graves inspire us."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

SAMUEL J. MAY'S CHRISTIANITY.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., July 23, 1871.

We have in the city of Syracuse a Temperance Society known as the Union Temperance Society. It is composed of persons of all the religious denominations and of those of no religious denomination; and Rev. Mr. May was a member of it. A week ago last Sunday, memorial resolutions in relation to this departed brother were introduced to the Society, in one of which Mr. May was declared to be a Christian man. This resolution was opposed by two Methodist ministers in earnest speeches; and when the vote was taken, it was carried by a vote of twenty-four against fourteen. So in this city, where Mr. May has lived so long and where he has done so much for humanity, two ministers and twelve orthodox church-members voted that he was not a Christian.

Now I think these persons are entitled to credit for their honest and consistent expression of opinion. He was not a Christian, judged by the orthodox standard. These men in their speeches admitted that he was one of the best men they ever knew, and had done all a Christian could do for humanity; but that was not what constituted a Christian. He had not subscribed to their orthodox creed.

There were orthodox members present who voted for the resolution. This was creditable to their hearts, but was very inconsistent. For if Mr. May can get to heaven without believing in the orthodox "atonement," then the gate is open for all; and what is the use of that "plan of salvation?"

Our orthodox friends, to be consistent, must send all these noble souls to hell; and if there is any such place, that certainly is the place for them to go to. They never would be contented in an orthodox heaven, singing hallelujahs, while millions of the human family are suffering the "pains of the damned." No, in this world their greatest happiness consisted in visiting the prisoners and outcasts of earth, and I think in the next life they will be equally solicitous for fallen humanity. The time has been when it was considered very important that the Church should acknowledge all good men as Christians, but that time has passed. The better portion of the world care but little for the distinction. It has come to mean nothing that is valuable.

H. L. G.

[In publishing the resolutions passed by the Syracuse Radical Club on the death of Mr. May, we omitted, it appears, the first three, which were not in the paper forwarded to us, if our memory serves us rightly. We at least do not remember having seen them. They were drawn up by Mr. C. A. Hammond, and are here appended:—

Resolved, That in the death of our dearly beloved friend, Rev. Samuel J. May, we feel a sense of personal bereavement which the death of but very few out of the great multitude of men can bring to any of us.

Resolved, That he was pre-eminently a good man in the true sense of the word—good in thought, in spirit, and in life; and he has made himself immortal, or at least coeval with humanity's existence, by his sublime identification of himself with humanity.

Resolved, That although shallow, superficial and bigoted sectarians have sometimes denounced our departed brother on account of his supposed heretical faith, we look to his life for the index to his faith, and there find that it must have been in the main a correct one, as "he can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

Resolved, That to whatever destiny the creed of the popular church must, to be consistent, consign our deceased brother, upon his tomb we inscribe:—

"The poor man weeps,
Here good May sleeps;
Whom canting bigots blamed;
But with such as he,
Where'er he be,
May we be saved or damned!"

If, as we believe, the above resolutions were omitted by the daily papers which professed to publish the entire series, the reason for this omission it is very easy to guess.—ED.]

SUPERSTITION.

If it be truth, it is of no consequence where it leads, or what damage it does. If the world is round and not flat, we must receive it, if it upsets the cosmogony of the universe. Truth is consistent with itself and is good. If it caters to the superstitious element in man, that is no objection to it. We are, then, either not clear on truth or not clear on superstition. Truth never takes a back seat; we are only turned round. Like McGregor, where it sits, "there is the head of the table." Our friend Frothingham will not gainsay the foregoing, even if we differ as to truth. What is superstition? This is a hard question to answer. If we say with Mr. Frothingham, "it is that which conflicts with the rational order of the world we dwell in," we do not answer the question; for human thought is not a unit as to what is rational. We must, says Mr. Frothingham, "at all costs be rid of superstition." So say we all of us; but what is superstition? And what is rational or irrational?

I can readily see that Peter and Paul are more rational than Moses and Samuel, and that the Rev. J. D. Fulton and Elder Knapp are more rational than Peter and Paul. No, let me take that back, and substitute Bellows and Hepworth. They are more rational than Peter and Paul, and Theodore Parker and O. B. Frothingham are more so than Bellows and Hepworth. But all that clearness of vision does not define or separate the rational from the irrational or superstitious. Who shall say there is not a field beyond the latter as exponents of rationalism, which, when reached, will make us laugh at the rationalism of these? So while I would say, "all hail, rationalism! and begone, foul superstition!" I should be very modest in defining what I meant by either.

I think there is no body of people, in Christendom or out of it, so free from superstition as the modern "Spiritualists." I am aware they are a body covered over with blemishes; that in its ranks are all qualities; that they are justly liable to the criticism of the religious world as being goddess, infidel, and ribald. I would not dispute "Warrington" when he says that, in some of its aspects, "it is nasty." I will say in this connection, however, that there is much that is nasty the world over, in the best regulated religions as well as in the best regulated families; and it is a pity all round. We must learn to distinguish the weaknesses of human nature from its beliefs. But admitting what I do, who am a believer, I do think they have less superstition, and upon the whole are more rational than any other people in this Christian country. This may be an assertion, but it is made by one who is aware of its follies, from which I expect it will be purged and is now purifying. But suppose it is an assertion. I find generally on the subject of religion more assertions than reasons. I own that is no excuse for me; but I must be brief, even if I am ragged.

It is all well to say, "rid of superstition at all hazards;" and the Free Religious movement makes it its target. It is doing with pen and tongue good execution. But please not forget that that also is the watchword of Modern Spiritualism. The latter movement seems to be a sort of ground swell, an expression of force, as yet with no leading mind or special object; but yet, with no definite charge on superstition, it has done more in a score of years in smiting it hip and thigh and making it easy for disciplined, liberal thought to do its work, than anything since the reformation. I think this will be admitted. A man need not be a believer in Spiritualism to give credit to its accomplished work.

Charles Sumner says: "In the Providence of God there is no accident." Now as there is no more apparent intelligent direction in the movement of Modern Spiritualism than there is in a swarm of bees, and as the Sumnerian quotation is only a glittering generality, I must say that, if there were not, to some who have listened, a voice from the land of silence to prove that there is an intelligent force unrecognized as yet by science, bearing directly on our human affairs, the result so far of this movement (with no head and all tail, if you choose), coming uncalled, unless as a response to hungry souls and doing its work with no plan of campaign, would almost of itself give a rational basis for the claim made for it by its believers.

Its most accented expression is, that everything is natural and nothing supernatural. The moment a man is a believer, he can be superstitious only so far as he is inconsistent. A man may be credulous; he may be shallow; he may be ignorant; these are human attributes, and may appear in human beings who are Spiritualists. But the subject tends to correct all such weaknesses. When superstition is found in an individual who has a belief in this "ism," one is inclined to say to himself—what would he have been, if a church-member? Having myself been one, I wish from my heart others would pass out of their darkness into light through this door, feeling sure they would leave nine-tenths of their superstitions at the threshold.

But what is superstition? I keep reverting to the question, but I am not likely to answer it. One thing I feel safe in saying, and there I will agree with Mr. Frothingham, as I generally do, that it is the dry rot of the Christian Church. Eliminate from Christianity what is irrational, and the remainder is "free religion;" take superstition out of the world's faith, and we shall find made of one "blood," so to speak, all the religions of the earth. Let us flank, then, or try to, what we cannot storm with a definition, by being picturesque or scriptural.

"Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," says their law by Moses. Why? Because the witch pretends to have the power of dealing with dwellers of the other world. Moses did the same. To-day, rational men think he was only a strong pretender trying to squelch a weak one. It is neither rational nor scientific to say that Moses was divinely appointed and the witch a sham. We know there was as much delusion in Moses as in the witch, only one was orthodox and the other heretic. It will not satisfy a well-balanced mind to say that Moses had evidence, believed in his mission, was sent of God, and therefore was no pretender. The same logic is as good for the witch.

The world is full of cheats. Many or all such may be pretenders; but history, looking at the exponents of religion, will not permit them to say to the exponents of witchcraft, "Smut." If black is good for one, it is for the other also. The divine right of priests is no surer in pedigree than the divine right of witches. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Let us examine in detail.

Saul, the first king of Jewry, like the average man, as long as he could rely on his religious teacher as authority, was all right; he made and kept a tolerable defile connection. Under the religious guidance of Samuel, the Lord sent him to war on and slay the Amalekites. He did so; but in the end he showed some mercy—in modern language, his heart was better than his creed; he did not slay all, and for this disobedience the Lord through Samuel rejected him. In his distress he sought out one of the women who had a familiar spirit. This was long after the Lord had departed, and after Samuel had died. From this proscribed woman, who knew Saul by her familiar spirit in his disguise and, like a sister of charity, fed him who was her enemy, and then raised (so the story goes) the ghost of Samuel, he learned his future fate. It came to pass as foretold.

In this record, the religious world sees in Saul, in his dealings with the Lord through Samuel, nothing irrational. When he declines being as bad as he is divinely commanded to be, and the Lord left him, this is rational according to orthodoxy. He goes to the woman, gets a return of good for evil, gets a communication from a dead man which turns out as prophesied. That is superstition all the world over from the same standpoint. As a matter of course, this legend may be a fable; just as good, for all that, to point a moral or adorn a tale. If I had not had a similar experience, I should say fable. As it is, I receive it as a possibly authentic record. I differ from the church, because I consider the part acted by the Lord through Samuel as superstition, and the witch as the rational part of the story. Some day I must write this thought out; but I must be brief now.

I was a member of Dr. Sharp's Baptist Church once; and as long as I relied on authority or believed in the letter which killeth, I thought myself one of the elect and the outsiders doomed to destruction. I was Saul in his happy but ignorant condition. I could not slay, and would not, all the Amalekites (the unconverted); and the spirit of the Lord, as taught by that sect, departed from me, and I wandered forth. A decade later, I met a man who had a rational, if not a "familiar," spirit, in Theodore Parker. I got into rational and happy conditions by light shining from or through him; and I only wanted one link to be religiously happy. That was an intelligent hold on the life that follows this. Happy is the man who, like Theodore Parker, and John Weiss, and others, knows it by a sort of inward revelation. People generally have not that satisfaction—I am one. I have got it unmistakably through what Mr. Frothingham calls superstition, namely, modern Spiritualism. Thousands of others of atheistic tendency are also its debtors. With this later light, I am aware, is associated much that is frivolous and inconsistent—I will add also, irrational; but I can wade, and expect to, through slaughter to a throne, if the throne is sure. Oh what oceans of sack for a little bread! But what of that, if we only secure some bread?

"Better," says Mr. Frothingham, "that very sacred and dear beliefs should go than this enemy of all rational belief should remain." I cannot see the enmity. It seems to me the most rational thing possible that the loved and the lost should be lovingly near and active, and the most irrational thing for them to exist and never manifest the fact to us. "Better," says Mr. Frothingham, "to have no other world than to have one full of teasing, troublesome beings." Not so, Mr. Frothingham! The world we live in is full of trouble and troublesome beings; and who but an atheist would dispense with it, if it be but a portal? Let us believe in progress, and that things will be better by and by, both in this world and what we know of the other also. Perhaps we do not know the conditions of connection. That may refract the straight lines into crooked ones. I feel that the reliable cable will yet be laid. In the mean time, even if in doubtful company, will one man hold on to this occult intelligence because it says this, and as yet nothing more with certainty, namely, "I once dwelt on the earth. I am alive now, though my human body is under the sod."

I have not answered, I own, the question—what is superstition? But let me say, I think "Spiritualism," has come into this world to stay; and instead of being, will prove to be the antidote of, superstition.

JOHN WETHERBEE.

Boston, July, 1871.

When the Erie Canal was first started, the subject of investing in it was discussed in a Quaker business meeting of the men. It was opposed by an influential member—no other than Elias Hicks—on the ground of its being a speculation. Among other objections, he went on to say: "When God created the world, if he had wished canals, he would have made them." Upon this, a "weighty friend" (one of their terms) rose up and said slowly, in the intoning voice in which they always speak in meeting, "And Jacob digged a well," and sat down.—Independent.

We are authorized to assert that when our President, Vice-President, and Secretary of State signed the paper expressing their satisfaction with the proposed meeting of the Christian Alliance, they did not append to their simple names any official title. If this was the case, they did only what any other citizen has a right to do; but the paper as published purported to be signed by them in their official capacity. This statement would relieve them, but charges the officers of the London branch of the Alliance with forgery.—Independent. [Only a "pious fraud."—ED.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

RIFLES, SHOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS, Gun Material. Write for Price List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [83-108.]

WANTED—A SITUATION. The subscriber, who has had several years experience in teaching such studies as are generally pursued at Massachusetts High Schools, and also in giving piano-forte lessons, would accept a moderate compensation at a place where Bible-reading is not required in school, and where no attempt would be made to interfere with his religious convictions or with the management of his school. Address A. D. JACKSON, care of SAMUEL JACKSON, JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS. 78-83

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 73tf.

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other Prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($30 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88y1

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE,
BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,
Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.
D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (20 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.
Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.
"It Injures Our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?
Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.
These four for 10 cents.
Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
70tf 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Publisher & Bookseller,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

- The Origin of Species, By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
The Descent of Man, By DARWIN, 2 vols, each.... 2 00
Wallace on Natural Selection, (London)..... 2 00
Mivart on the Genesis of Species...... 1 00
Man's Place in Nature, By HUXLEY..... 1 25
Origin of Species, By HUXLEY..... 1 00
Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condition of Man, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
The Earthward Pilgrimage, By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
History of European Morals, from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols. 8vo..... 6 00
Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
Chips from a German Workshop, By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
The Old Roman World, By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
Short Studies on Great Subjects, By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE..... 1 50
Lecture on Calvinism, By the same..... 75
The Heavens, An Illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
Words and their Uses, By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
Steps of Belief, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
Nature and Life, By Rev. ROBERT COLLYER..... 1 50
Sartor Resartus, By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edition..... 90
The Choice of Books, Same..... 75
Essays of Elia, By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
Thoughts about Art, By PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON..... 2 00
Words of Weight on the Woman Question, (London)..... 2 25
The Friendships of Woman, By W. R. ALGER..... 2 00
A Day by the Fire, LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
Sanctum Sanctorum, THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
Carlyle's Essays, Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
Among My Books, By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 2 vols..... 5 00
Society and Solitude, By the same..... 2 00
Topics of the Times, By JAMES PARTON..... 2 00
Success and its Conditions, By E. P. WHIPPLE..... 1 50
Literature and Life, By same..... 1 50
Tablets, By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
Companions of My Solitude, By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
Organization in Daily Life, Same..... 1 50
Realism, By the same..... 1 50
War and Culture, By same..... 1 50
Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms, By same..... 1 25
Ten Great Religions, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
Light and Electricity, By TYNDALL..... 1 25
Our Girls, By DIO LEWIS..... 1 50
Studies in Literature, By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read,— NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
Principles of Psychology, By HERBERT SPENCER..... 2 50
American Religion, By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
Fragments Of Science For Unscientific People, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Light Science For Leisure Hours, By R. A. PROCTOR..... 3 00
Handbook Of Legendary And Mythological Art, By MRS. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 3 50
Hereditary Genius—Its Laws and Consequences, By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
The Races of The Old World, By CHAS. L. BRACE..... 2 00
Little Women, By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
Wallace's Review Of Darwin's Descent Of Man, PAPER..... 25
Heat as a Mode of Motion, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Buechner on Force and Matter, (London Print)..... 3 75
Essays, By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE..... 1 00
Aristotle's Ethics, (Bohn's Edition)..... 2 00
France before Europe, By MICHELET..... 1 00
Roman Imperialism and Other Essays, By J. R. SEELEY, Author of "Ecce Homo"..... 1 50
The Republic of Plato..... 1 25
The Book of Golden Thoughts, By HENRY ATWELL..... 1 25
Colton's Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words...... 1 25
Consolations of Travel, or The Last Days of a Philosopher, By SIR HUMPHREY DAVY..... 1 50
The Poetical Works of HOOD, WORDSWORTH, SHELLEY, KEATS, MOORE, SCOTT, BYRON, full gilt, and on tinted paper, each only..... 1 75

Address,
HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher and Bookseller.
Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.
N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

CLUB PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).
For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.
For Twenty-five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12).
For Ten Names, one of the following Books:

- Lecky's History of European Morals, 2 vols..... $6.00
Max Mueller's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols..... 5.00
Emerson's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
Weiss's Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, 2 volumes..... 6.00
For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870 (price $2.50). Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):
Darwin's Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by Matthew Arnold, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of Theodore Parker or Henry D. Thoreau, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, Auerbach..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names..... $50 in Greenbacks.
For 50 Names..... $25 in Greenbacks.
For 25 Names..... $15 in Greenbacks.
For 10 Names..... $5 in Greenbacks.
For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
LOCK BOX 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of FIVE CENTS.

- | | No. |
|---|-----|
| The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion..... | 1 |
| What is Free Religion?..... | 3 |
| Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones..... | 4 |
| Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit..... | 5 |
| The Practical Work of Free Religion..... | 6 |
| Unitarianism versus Freedom..... | 7 |
| Sunday Schools..... | 8 |
| Friendship..... | 9 |
| Grief and its Compensations..... | 11 |
| The Hebrew Prophets..... | 12 |
| Capital Punishment..... | 13 |
| Human Ideals..... | 14 |
| The Essence of Religion..... | 15 |
| The Management of Children..... | 16 |
| A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. R. S. D..... | 17 |
| Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune)..... | 17 |
| The Candle of the Lord..... | 18 |
| Public Opinion..... | 19 |
| Conscience..... | 20 |
| The Pedigree of Man..... | 21 |
| "Following Christ"..... | 22 |
| The Tongue..... | 23 |
| The Golden Age..... | 24 |
| What is Truth?..... | 25 |
| The Last Battle on the Creed Question..... | 26 |
| Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams..... | 27 |
| The Sunday Question..... | 28 |
| Motes and Beams..... | 29 |
| The Dove's Departure..... | 30 |
| The Bible in the Public Schools..... | 31 |
| Religious Freedom..... | 32 |
| A Plain Talk to Young Men..... | 33 |
| Noise..... | 34 |
| The Humility of Free Religion..... | 35 |
| Chaos and Cosmos..... | 36 |
| An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt..... | 37 |
| Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion..... | 38 |
| War and Free Religion..... | 39 |
| Religious Revivals..... | 40 |
| Mary and Martha..... | 41 |
| The Ministry of Free Religion..... | 42 |
| Success..... | 43 |
| "Repentance" and "Forgiveness"..... | 44 |
| Spiritual Beauty..... | 45 |
| The Book of Daniel..... | 46 |
| The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its development. W. J. Potter..... | 47 |
| The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition..... | 47 |
| Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Beemelin..... | 47 |
| The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin..... | 47 |
| Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise..... | 47 |
| Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers..... | 48 |
| Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham..... | 49 |
| Parties and Party Spirit..... | 50 |
| The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age..... | 51 |
| The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse..... | 52 |
| Transient and Permanent..... | 53 |

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 33.

TOLEDO, OHIO, AUGUST 19, 1871.

WHOLE No. 86.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

CRETE AND THE CRETANS.

[The following lecture, read in Dover, N. H., July 14, 1867, was written and delivered for the purpose of raising funds for the Cretan insurgents. Although the insurrection long since terminated in the renewed domination of the Turks, the effort was one that must always enlist the sympathies of all who love freedom; and the lecture is here published in the hope that it may at least interest some in a cause that is not lost, but only postponed.]

The island known in ancient times as Crete, and more recently as Candia, lies about eighty miles to the south-east of Greece, and about two hundred miles north of Africa. It marks the extreme southern point of Europe. Extending about one hundred and sixty miles in length, in a direction nearly east and west, and varying in breadth from six to forty-five miles, it contains an area of four thousand miles and over, or a little less than one-half the area of New Hampshire. The mountain chain that runs through the entire length of the island, sends off towards the south numerous spurs ending in steep bluffs, and presenting a very bleak and forbidding coast pierced by very few inlets or bays; the northern coast abounds with harbors. Many of the peaks of this mountain chain are loftier than Mount Washington, and are crowned with dazzling snow for three-fourths of the year. The climate is famous for its mildness; in winter there is only rain, and in summer, being cooled by the breezes that come from the snow-tipped mountains, Crete enjoys really a balmy spring. The hyacinth and the jasmine are in bloom as early as December; orange-blossoms load the air with fragrance during the entire year, and at all seasons alike the eye is charmed by the fresh verdure and constant perfume of the lemon, olive, cyprus, laurel, palm, pomegranate, myrtle, and oleander. Groves of immense olive trees, each twenty or twenty-five feet in diameter, everywhere adorned the landscape with their gray old trunks and the silvery lustre of their foliage, and formed a chief source of wealth to the inhabitants, until the barbarian Turk, in wanton and cruel waste, destroyed with torch and axe vast numbers of these veterans of a thousand years. The quince-tree, not uncommon in our own rougher climate, received its name from Cydonia, a district in Crete where it spontaneously grows. Flowers of brightest hues and sweetest perfume are found everywhere,—white, blue, and red thyme on the mountains and hill-sides, myrtle and laurel blossoms and countless roses in the valleys, and in the hollows of the rocks the aromatic, far-famed dictammon, which derives its name from Mt. Dicte, and is used in medicine as an opiate and drastic. From all sides is heard the hum of bees, busy in making the finest honey of the Old World; and above the music of the countless songsters rises the clear, beautiful note of the kajr-bulbul, so highly esteemed in Turkey for the sweetness of its melody and the splendor of its plumage as to command the price of a hundred dollars. The land is stocked with game, and the waters with fish; no wild beasts or noxious animals are found, though wild horses graze on the slopes of Mt. Ida that can only be caught with the lasso. The Cretan hounds are famous for their fleetness; and the Cretan agrimi, or wild goat, is supposed to be the original stock of all our domestic varieties of that animal. Vineyards abound, and Homer himself celebrates the fine flavor of the Pramnian wine. Nothing but liberty, and the enterprise which liberty engenders, are wanted to render Crete a perfect paradise among the islands; if well cultivated, it would produce in abundance corn, wine, silk, oil, honey, and wool. But the vast inundation of Turkish barbarism is fast sweeping away the vineyards, the olive-groves, the peaceful cities and happy homes of Crete, and converting the paradise into a desert.

The population of Crete at the outbreak of the insurrection on the 28th of August, 1866, was about 250,000, of which number about 200,000 were Christian, and the remaining 50,000 Mahometan. The lowlands are inhabited by a race more or less mixed in origin, but the Sphakiotes, the mountaineers of Crete, have never been subdued, and preserve to this day many of the customs, and even the dress, of the ancient Cretans from whom they are descended. They still dance the Pyrrhic, the famous war-dance held in such high honor among the ancient Greeks. Their language, according to Col. Leake, one of the best authorities on the subject, is genuine Hellenic, although corrupt; while the purity of their descent is still further attested, according to Sieber, a German traveller who published in 1823 a work of two volumes on the subject of Crete, by the great similarity of features throughout the tribe.

In remote antiquity it is very evident that Crete exercised a strong influence over the development of the Greek race. It was regarded by the Greeks themselves as the cradle of their religion, the birthplace of their supreme god; and many of the most beautiful legends of the Grecian mythology are connected with it. Next to the Phœnicians, the Cretans were the great sailors in the earliest period of classical history; and while they themselves thus received many ideas of the Oriental worship, they in turn imparted them, more or less modified, to the Greeks of the mainland. The Cretan idea of Zeus, or Jupiter, the king of the gods, was doubtless derived from Phœnicia, where he was called Moloch. The story handed down in the Greek mythology is this.

During the Golden Age of human innocence and happiness, the supreme ruler of heaven and earth was Kronos, the god of Time, who, fearing to be dethroned by his offspring, devoured them as fast as they were born. His wife, Rhea, naturally objected to this cannibal proclivity, and, on the birth of Zeus (or Jupiter, as the Romans called him), gave to Kronos a stone instead of the infant; and the royal father, whose digestion must have been of the best, gulped down the stone without perceiving the difference. The mother then sent the infant Zeus to Mt. Ida, the highest of the Cretan mountains, to be reared in a cave by nymphs, who fed him on honey and the milk of the goat Amalthea. When the baby god became fretful, as all babies will at times, however celestial in their origin, the Curetes or priests of Cybele clashed their cymbals to drown his cries, and this prevented the hungry Kronos from discovering and devouring his offspring. When grown up at last in safety, Zeus crossed over to Phœnicia, fell in love with Europa, the king's daughter, and taking the form of a white bull of great beauty and gentleness, induced the incautious princess to take a seat on his back. But no sooner was this done, than the bull entered the sea, and swam across to Crete with the royal maiden, who afterwards became the mother of Minos and Rhadamanthus. It was Europa who gave name to Europe. Minos, her son, became the king of Crete, and reigned so justly as after his death to be appointed one of the judges of the dead in Hades. He was the great hero of Cretan mythology. The pirates that infested the seas were destroyed by his victorious fleets; colonies were planted by him in Thrace and Asia Minor; and Athens herself was conquered and compelled to pay a yearly tribute of young men and maidens. These captives were destined to be the victims of the Minotaur, a monster half-man, half-bull; and the annual sacrifice of the flower of their youth filled the Athenians with grief. At last, Theseus, the hero of Athens, volunteered to go in person and fight the monster. He went, and by the help of Ariadne, the daughter of king Minos, succeeded in killing the Minotaur and freeing his country from the awful tribute. He then returned to Athens, bearing Ariadne with him; but stopping at the island of Naxos on the way, he most ungratefully abandoned there the poor princess who had done so much for him.

The myths about Dædalus, the constructor of the famous labyrinth and the inventor of wings with which he flew over the seas, appear to indicate that the early Cretans had made no little progress in mechanical invention. Many other myths point to the same conclusion, the most remarkable of which is the story of Talus, the brazen man who was made by Vulcan, the celestial blacksmith among the gods, and given by him to king Minos. This very peculiar person was made wholly of brass, and ran round the entire island three times every day, to prevent the landing of enemies on his majesty's dominions. If any dared to approach, Talus heated himself red-hot in a furnace, seized the invaders in his brazen arms, and hugged them to death in what might be well called a warm embrace. In the head of this metallic gentleman was an opening closed by a plug, to remove which would prove fatal to him. Medea contrived to pull it out, and his life speedily exhaled.

In the world of letters Crete can boast of no great names. Epimenides, however, to whom are attributed an immense number of works, was reckoned one of the seven wise men of Greece. Dictys Cretensis was said to have gone to the Trojan War with king Idomeneus, and to have kept a diary of its events which was buried with him, and forgotten till the time of Nero, when an earthquake rent the tomb and disclosed the book. This, of course, is all fable; yet the book that bears the name of Dictys has furnished a basis for a large part of the romantic legends of the Middle Ages.

In his epistle to Titus, Paul the apostle quotes from some Cretan author a remark not very complimentary to his countrymen;—"The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies [i. e. lazy gormandizers]." There is no doubt that the charge of lying was a very common one against the Cretans on the part of the Greeks. In sarcasm they coined the verb to Cretize in the sense of to lie, and the noun Cretism in the sense of lying. But the charge probably arose from the fact that the Cretans held certain beliefs concerning the gods which were offensive to the national vanity of the Greeks. They held that Zeus, the supreme god of the whole Hellenic race, who was admitted on all hands to have been born in Crete, was only a deified man, and had died there; they even pointed out his burial-place. They also held that Pallas Athene, the protecting goddess of the Athenians, was also a Cretan divinity, and not a native of the Attic skies, as the Athenians claimed. These heresies were quite sufficient to bring a stigma upon the Cretans. If the great writers of Athens had been born in Crete, it is quite likely that the verb to signify lying would have been the verb to Atticize, not the verb to Cretize. There is no reason whatever for believing that the Cretans were any more untruthful than the other Greeks.

Enough, however, of mythology and empty controversy. The striking analogy between the institutions established at Sparta by Lycurgus and those established in Crete by Minos (who, notwithstanding the myths that cluster about his name, was probably an historical person), has led us to an inquiry, still unanswered, as to which were borrowed from the other. Probably, as the Spartans and the Cretans both belonged to the Dorian race, kindred national characteristics produced independently similar national institutions. But, however this may be, Minos was renowned throughout Hellas as a just and wise legislator, and his system of legislation was everywhere held up to admiration. To the credit of Crete be it said, she established the earliest common school system on record. All the boys were obliged to attend public instruction in gymnastics, athletic games, and the simple learning of the times; all the girls were trained in house-keeping, and in whatever would fit them to become useful and healthy wives. Further, no young man was permitted to exercise the functions and enjoy the privileges of citizenship, until he had chosen a wife. Such, at least, are some of the civil regulations traditionally attributed to ancient Crete, and modern society may derive from them very useful hints.

From the death of Minos until their conquest by the Romans, the Cretans seem to have maintained their independence, under a government at first monarchical, and afterwards somewhat republican in form. In B. C. 67, Quintus Metellus, with great difficulty, and not until the Cretans had several times defeated the Romans, destroying two fleets and maintaining a fierce contest for more than two years, succeeded in reducing the island to the condition of a Roman province. The numerous ruins of cities sacked by Metellus and his legions still attest the former power and glory of Crete. On the division of the Roman Empire, at the end of the fourth century, into the Western and Eastern Empires, Crete fell under the sway of the latter, and remained so until A. D. 823, when it was conquered and held by the Saracens. In the tenth century it fell into the hands of the Genoese, from whose possession it passed by gift into that of Boniface, Marquis of Montferrat, who in the year 1204 sold it against the wishes of the inhabitants to the powerful republic of Venice.

For more than four hundred years, a period which may well be styled the golden age of Crete, agriculture and manufactures flourished under the fostering sway of the merchant princes of Venice, who here established a middle station for their commerce between Asia and Europe. Many Venetian merchants and noblemen made Crete their home, and caused her to share in the dazzling prosperity of the Queen of the Adriatic. But the pride of Venice provoked the hostility, and her wealth the cupidity, of rival States; and the League of Cambray destroyed her prestige and influence forever. At this time the Turks, who about two hundred years before had captured Constantinople, were flushed by a career of victory as yet unchecked by any overwhelming defeat. They had overrun the whole of unhappy Greece, except where held at bay by Venetian outposts; they had even thundered at the gates of Vienna, and carried dismay into the heart of Germany; the Crescent, that hated symbol of Mahometan cruelty and power, was borne on in triumph by the ferocious hordes of Asia, and threatened to wrest the empire of the civilized world from the Christian Cross. A small matter drew down on the devoted island of Crete the unbounded fury of this terrible Ottoman power.

A Turkish vessel, conveying to Mecca a Sultana and one of her sons, was captured by some Maltese galleys, that anchored with their prize off the coast of Crete. The prisoners were kept in bondage; the poor Sultana died of grief, while the young prince was made a Christian friar,—the worst insult that could be offered to the haughty heir of Mahomet. Then, in the year 1645, commenced a long and stubborn contest for the mastery of Crete. On one hand was the colossal Turkish power, with the boundless resources of men and money of forty satrapies in Europe, Asia, and Africa, all under the control of a single infuriated despot. On the other hand was Venice, still powerful by sea, and backed not only by the sympathy and prayers of Christendom, but by the more efficient aid of the Knights of Malta, the chivalrous nobility of Louis XIV, the German Emperor, the kings of Spain, Savoy, and Sicily, and by the whole active power of the Papacy. For twenty-four years the conflict raged with varying fortunes. Candia was captured by the Turks after a heroic fight of three months; Rhetimo, Suda, and other cities yielded one by one; and at last commenced the famous siege of Candia, the capital of the island, which lasted more than twenty years, and was signalized by most brilliant feats of arms. The Sultan was compelled to suspend all other enterprises, and concentrate the entire forces of his vast dominion, before the long siege was crowned with victory, and the Crescent waved in triumph from the battlements of the Cretan stronghold. Thirty thousand Christians had fallen in its defence; one hundred and twenty thousand Mussulmans found graves before its walls. On the 6th of September, 1669, the island of Crete surrendered to its barbarous foes, who from that day to this have trampled it under iron heels.

The nineteenth century has been in no respect more remarkable than for the development of a strong national consciousness among the various races of Europe. The Russians, the Hungarians, the Poles, the Germans, the Italians, the French, the Scandinavians, the Irish, the Greeks, have all in different ways manifested a profound yearning for the union under a single government of all those who have sprung from the same root, and speak the same language. This is the famous doctrine of Nationalities which is re-casting the map of Europe, and must yet produce many another terrific collision among its artificially based governments. It has been said that our own great civil contest is only another illustration of the working of the same principle; but I do not so interpret it. The deep love for the American Union and the deep resolve to preserve its absolute integrity which carried us so triumphantly through the Slaveholders' Rebellion, was no blind instinct of race and language, but a profound and intelligent loyalty to political principles,—to the institutions of democratic government based on the great ideas of equal rights and universal human brotherhood. Men of most diverse national origin,—English, French, German, Dutch, Italian, Irish, African, and even Indian,—stood side by side in the ranks of our victorious armies, and vied in devotion to the national flag. The European doctrine of Nationalities means only the brotherhood of single races; the American doctrine of Republicanism means the brotherhood of all men. The European idea is limited; the American idea is universal. But none the less is the European idea a vast advance on the wretched and selfish ideas which have hitherto controlled the destinies of Europe. Our best sympathy and aid are due to the effort to carry out the doctrine of Nationalities, for it is an onward step, a progressive movement, towards the ultimate embodiment of our own idea. The oppressed masses of Europe must learn to love the fellowship of country, before they can love the larger and sublimer fellowship of humanity. Hence by every peaceable means in our power we ought, as friends of mankind, to favor and assist the struggles of the various European races to achieve new political organization on the basis of common blood and common language.

Now there is not a single race in Europe which has shown a more wonderful tenacity of national consciousness, and made more heroic efforts to achieve national unity, than the Hellenic or Greek race in modern times. No matter what foreign races, as conquerors or emigrants, have poured into the various parts of Hellas, the Greeks have always remained Greeks still; they speak today almost the identical language of Plato and Demosthenes, and preserve all the best elements of the grand old Greek character. Under the dominion of haughty Rome, they ruled their rulers by the force of larger intellect and higher civilization; and so has it been under the accursed tyranny of the Moslem. According to Mr. Finlay, the eminent historian—"The Greeks are the only existing representatives of the ancient world. They have maintained possession of their country, their language, and their social organization, against physical and moral forces which have swept from the face of the earth all their early cotemporaries, friends and enemies."

After cruel oppression by the Turks for nearly four hundred years, in 1821 the Greeks arose in open rebellion, and cast the gauntlet of defiance at the foot of the Ottoman throne. For seven long years they fought, almost wholly without help, against the whole power of Turkey and Egypt. Their enemy exhibited every instinct of maddened beasts of prey. Year after year the country was ravaged, its resources exhausted, its towns and villages destroyed, the inhabitants either massacred in cold blood, or driven in terror to the mountains, to live in caves and feed on roots and leaves. But the Greeks were bold of heart and firm of will; they suffered without despairing and conquered by endurance. In the words of Dr. S. G. Howe, who fought as a volunteer in their ranks,—“They were united and resolute, without thought of surrender or even of compromise; there was not a copperhead among them.” Listen to the story of Scio, to understand the temper of the foe they had to deal with. Scio, an island of the Archipelago, was at that time inhabited by about 150,000 people, a prosperous and happy community. Some bands of patriots visited Scio, and, although the inhabitants themselves were neutral and quiet, offered some resistance to Turkish authority. The Sublime Porte at once let loose upon the island an army of fifteen or twenty thousand soldiers, and in one or two months, out of that population of 150,000, only 900 were alive upon the island! Only 40,000 women and children survived, and they had been sold into slavery; all the rest, more than 100,000 human beings, had been butchered in their own homes. Such was the foe that, like a thirsty tiger, fastened its fangs on the throat of Greece, and sucked out its very life-blood.

For seven years this horrible war continued, and Greece, though well-nigh exhausted, was unsubdued; but at last England, France, and Russia were compelled to interfere, and on October 29, 1827, fought the great sea-fight of Navarino, by which the combined Turkish and Egyptian fleet was utterly destroyed, and the Sultan forced to come to terms. The war ceased the following year. The Greeks, full of enthusiasm for popular liberty, established a republic, and elected the illustrious Capo d'Istria their President; but he was murdered in 1831, and the Allied Powers, hating republican institutions, forced Greece to accept a king. Fortunately, they chose a good one,—Otho, son of the king of Bavaria, who, in 1843, granted a constitution to his people. The population of Greece, which was then 650,000, has in thirty-six years nearly doubled, being now 1,250,000; its revenue, then about $1,000,000, is now $5,000,000; its exports, of which currants, olive-oil, and figs are the chief, have immensely increased. Its institutions are of the most liberal character. It has a free press, universal manhood suffrage, vote by ballot. Religion is perfectly free, and every government appointment is open to persons of all religions, Jews, Turks, or Christians. Recently a Turk was chosen “Demarch” of a village in Eubœa,—which would be equivalent to choosing a negro Mayor of Dover. The Grecian code is one of the best in Europe. All criminal trials are by jury; the courts are all excellent in theory and well conducted in fact. Frequent elections, universal suffrage, vote by ballot, are sufficient safeguards of public liberty. In every village there is a free school where the poor can send their children; there are also free colleges where persons in all conditions in life can educate their children without expense. There is no better system of public instruction in all Europe than that of Greece. When we add further, that, although a kingdom in name, Greece has no titled or privileged aristocracy, surely the heart of every true American must beat quick with sympathy for the complete deliverance of the Hellenic race.

I have been thus particular in describing the recent history and present condition of Greece, because it is the aim of the insurgent Cretans, or Candiotes, not to become an independent nation, but to become a part of the Greek kingdom. They aspire to re-unite themselves to the ancient parent-stock of Hellas, and throb once more with the pulses of a new national life. Let us, then, turn to see what part Crete bore in the revolution which brought to Greece a blood-bought liberty.

In 1669, as we have seen, Crete surrendered to the Turks. With her freedom, she lost her prosperity. Nearly all the wealthy inhabitants fled from the island to escape the exactions of Ottoman rapacity. From a thriving colony of Venice, it sank into an exhausted province of the Turkish Empire. Before its conquest, Crete contained a Christian population of 700,000 souls; a year ago this had already dwindled down to 250,000. What a comment on the tender mercies and fostering care of Turkey! What untold histories of extortion, cruelty, and anguish, lurk under those simple figures! The Mussulmans are simply a horde of Oriental locusts, that devour every green thing on the face of the country they pass over, and leave only a blackened waste behind.

Reduced, however, as they were, in number, the Cretans took an active part in the revolution of 1821, and bore their full share of its sufferings. They took and held one of the strongest fortifications, although they were compelled to abandon much of the open country and take refuge in the mountain-range in the interior, where the brave Sphakiotas still kept the flag of Greece flying in the breeze. The Cretans everywhere shared the dangers, privations, and struggles of the other Greeks, and were distinguished for good courage and patriotic devotion. They fairly earned their liberty.

But after their victory at Navarino, the Allied Powers undertook to arbitrate the destinies of Greece, and define its boundaries. The independence of Crete was involved in that of Greece, and was secured by the annihilation of the Turco-Egyptian fleet; but the Allied Powers deliberately hurled her back into the seven-times heated furnace of Turkish rage. Out of deference to that grim spectre of European politics, the so-called “balance of power,” and in fear lest Turkey should be so much enfeebled as not to be able to hold her own against Russian aggression, England and France turned poor Crete over to Egypt, by which in 1840 it was restored to the Ottoman Porte. Speaking of the Cretans, Dr. Howe says:—“I knew hundreds of them, good men and true. I had been in their beautiful island, and stood a siege with them in one of their beleaguered fortresses, and witnessed their courage. I knew that the independence of Crete was just as well assured by the result at Navarino as that of any part of Greece. Giving up the Cretans, therefore, to the Turks, seemed to me then as unrighteous and cruel, as seems now the proposal to give up the negroes who fought with us and for us to the dominion of their old masters, without even a ballot-box for defence. But Greece was forced to disarm; she was utterly at the mercy of the Allied Powers, and Crete was given over, bound hand and foot, to her enemies and her old oppressors.”

Thus it came to pass that Crete, which had shared the agony of the conflict, had no share in the final salvation. In 1833, in 1842, in 1858, she made futile attempts at armed insurrection. We know but little of the present struggle in its details. In April, 1866, unable to endure longer the exactions of the Turks, the inhabitants met in council, and drew up a petition to the Sultan for redress, couched in the most respectful terms, and showing that for two years the taxes they had been compelled to pay into the Turkish treasury exceeded the entire yearly income of the island. The Sultan's reply came three months later in the shape of an Ottoman army thirty thousand strong. During July and August there was no fighting; it was the lull before the storm. But towards the end of August, Mustapha Pasha arrived with orders to concede nothing to the petitioners. Then the lamp of hope went out in darkness; and in despair the Cretans raised the revolutionary Greek flag, drew their swords, and flung away the scabbards. From that time the contest has raged with relentless fury. The despatches received, at least those received through Turkish channels, have been unscrupulously tampered with, and no great confidence can be placed in their details; yet it seems clear that the struggle is still stoutly maintained by the insurgents, that the Porte has been compelled to invoke the aid of Egypt, and that Omar Pasha has achieved no decisive success. But the Cretans, ill-armed and worse provisioned, have been reduced to great distress; their country is devastated, their homes burned, their wives and children butchered in cold blood, or driven to starve among the mountains, or forced into exile to depend on the precarious charity of strangers. The men, meanwhile, are determined to die or conquer. In their General Assembly, September 2, 1866, after the Turks had commenced a war of extermination, sparing neither man, woman, nor child, but putting everything in human shape to the sword, the Cretans adopted this Declaration of Independence;—

“Faithful to the oath taken in 1821, and to the will of the whole people, who desire the union and independence of the entire Hellenic race, it is decreed:

I. The sovereignty of Turkey is forever abolished in the whole territory of Crete and the places appurtenant to it.

II. The indissoluble and eternal union of Crete and of all the places appurtenant to it, under the sceptre of his Majesty George I., is hereby proclaimed.

III. The execution of the present decree is confided to the valor of the generous people of Crete, to the patriotism of our brother Hellenes wherever residing, and to the liberality of all Philhellenes, as well as to the powerful mediation of the great nations protecting and guaranteeing it, and to the protection of Almighty God.”

Well have these descendants of ancient heroes backed their brave words with braver deeds. The annals of war record no more thrilling exploits than some of the feats achieved by these dauntless warriors, apparently well authenticated. If high-souled devotion to liberty, unflinching courage, and the sternest sacrifice of self in the common cause, entitle men to the admiration and applause of their fellows, then will the sons of Crete, every whit worthy of their Grecian sires, be forever honored. At Vryses less than 3,000 Cretans, armed only with the rusty guns once carried by their grandfathers, attacked 4,000 Egyptians in their entrenched camp, fought off 2,000 more who tried to rescue them, and compelled their invaders to surrender at the end of four days. At Candanos, they defeated the enemy and drove them into the town, where they held them in strict blockade; and it took 16,000 troops to raise the siege. At Keramia and at Vafe, although repulsed, the outnumbered Cretans fought as fought our own ancestors at Concord and Lexington, and by the loss they inflicted turned defeat into victory. At Sourba, where the wounded and sick were in hospital, less than 1,000 Cretans held at bay twenty times their number of Turkish troops, and having received small reinforcements, drove them out of the valley after two days' terrific fighting. The Turks made four distinct assaults, and the roar of their artillery was heard for miles; but the Cretans turned Sourba into a new Marathon, and won the battle at last. At the renowned Monastery of Arkadi, 540 Cretans had taken refuge, of whom only 197 were men, the rest being women and children. Mustapha Pasha, the Turkish commander, with a force of 12,000 soldiers, bombarded the Monastery for forty-eight hours, and at last breached the walls. With savage yells, the Turks poured in to massacre and pillage; but the venerable Gabriel, the head of the Monastery, with the consent of all applied a match to the magazine. A flash—an explosion—and high in air were hurled Christians and Turks together, to rest at last in a common grave. More than 2,000 Turks were destroyed, and many more wounded; and the few Christians who escaped were put to death by the maddened victors. The Mussulmans murder all, without discrimination of sex or age. On a single threshing-floor in the village of Kaysonos, the bodies of 150 children lay headless in one heap; in a single cave in Kephala, over 200 men, women, and children were suffocated by fire and smoke. No wonder the Cretan warriors send their families to the mainland for safety, and implore the charity of civilized nations for their dear ones, while they themselves stay to fight the stern fight of freedom to the bitter end. It is the same cry for mercy and pity that came from Greece forty years ago, and moved our fathers to send supplies with a lavish hand. Then as now, Dr. Howe went in person to distribute food and clothing.

"During that period," says he, "I saw thousands and thousands of women and children who had fled to the mountains, seeking shelter in the caverns, under the lee of rocks, under rude tents, sheltered anyhow, and living on roots, sorrel, snails, dogs, donkeys,—anything that could be found. I could then digest a donkey's leg better than I can now digest a chicken's wing. So I could stand it pretty well, and so could other young men; but the women and children suffered dreadfully from cold, exposure, and hunger, aggravated by fear and despair,—just as the women and children of the Cretans are now suffering."

"It became manifest, however, that even snails and sorrel and dogs and cats would soon be exhausted; and that if Greece was to be saved, it must be by help from abroad. Soon help was coming in from Europe, and a little from America, but not enough; so I came home and told the tale. The result was the raising of a very large sum of money, and the sending-out several cargoes of food and clothing. I went back in one of the ships, and attended to the distribution personally."

"Knowing the whole coast, I took lighters and boats to various points; and people flocked down by thousands from their hiding-places in the mountains to get their share; they came haggard and weak and foot-sore and half naked. They ate and drank, and put on the clothes, and wended their way back, carrying flour and corn in bags, and garments for their little ones in bundles, and joy and hope in their hearts. Their appearance was grotesque enough. They hardly knew how to put on the strange garments; and, besides, the tender hearts of our women had led them to make a score of children's petticoats and shirts to one garment for a grown person. So the Greek women would take three or four of these, and make for themselves one garment, without much regard to color or pattern."

[Let me here add to Dr. Howe's account what I heard in my own childhood from the lips of a Greek emigrant. It was formerly the fashion for ladies to wear what was called the "leg-of-mutton sleeve," very small at the wrist and very voluminous at the shoulder; and many of the dresses carried out by Dr. Howe were made in this style. The simple-minded Greeks were much astonished at these singular sleeves, and were heard to remark among themselves that the American ladies must have enormous arms.]

Dr. Howe goes on to say:—"The effect was marvelous; not only were thousands fed and clad, but the report thereof went abroad, and was magnified an hundred-fold; and men said, 'Courage! hold on to your arms! help is at hand. Far-off, republican America is coming to our aid!' And they held on. As, in the miracle of the loaves and the fishes, the godlike virtue of Him who brake the bread gave to it power to fill the multitude, so the love and good-will of the American people filled the hearts of the Greeks with courage and hope. They held out two years more: and I hesitate not to say—for I was there all the time to see, and had become as one of them—that the American supplies did more than any one thing to keep up the courage of the people, and lengthen out their struggle for independence."

These simple, earnest words of Dr. Howe cannot, I believe, fail to touch your hearts; they have touched mine to the core. What you may now give will pass through his hands, and reach the Cretans who most need it; not a dollar will be wasted or lost. Under the blue skies of Greece and Crete, the homeless wives, sisters and mothers, the little sons and daughters, of the Cretan heroes who are now wrestling in a death-grapple with the cut-throat hordes of Turkey and Egypt, strain their sad eyes with looking for succor towards the happy and prosperous America. Shall they look in vain? Or will you, as your own fathers and mothers did before you, spare a little from your own abundance to feed the hungry and clothe the naked?

POLICE COURT.

TRIAL OF CASE FOR CRUELTY TO ANIMALS—CONVICTION OF DEFENDANTS.

[From the Toledo Commercial, August 7.]

Our readers will doubtless remember reading the item in the Commercial of July 27, relating to an un-called-for and aggravating case of cruelty to animals, which took place the evening previous, on Market-space. They will also remember that the parties to the affair, Thomas Johnson and Augustus Van Orden, were promptly arrested and confined in the station house, and that, on being arraigned before the Police Court on the morning of the 28th, the case was continued until August 5th, they giving security for their appearance.

The matter was taken up by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and Messrs. Lee & Brown employed as attorneys for the prosecution; while the defendants retained Mr. C. F. France to act in their behalf. There being so little to extenuate the guilt of the parties to the cruel act, it was resolved to endeavor to make such an example of them as would deter others similarly inclined from pursuing a like course.

Saturday morning all the parties to the trial were promptly on hand, the defendants with their lawyer named above, while the distinguished counsel, Hon. John C. Lee, came forward in behalf of the Society. There being no other business before the Court, the crowd in the room was not large.

Dr. Nolen was called by the prosecution, and testified fully to having been standing within a few feet of the defendants, Johnson and Van Orden, at the time of the transaction, and saw them start their teams in opposite directions, after having first chained together the two hind axles of the wagons. One of the wagons had a load of wood. Both men urged their horses, and he thought Van Orden struck his with a whip, or lines. Johnson's team pulled the other back about a hundred and sixty feet, about sixty feet while one of the animals was down on the rough stones of the pavement. Harness gave way and horse was dragged by the neck mostly. Finally the other horse fell across the neck of the one already down. Saw bruises on the hip and shoulder of animal that fell first. Called to defendants to stop, but they paid no heed.

Several other witnesses were present, prepared to testify to the same as Dr. Nolen, but it was not deemed necessary to call them to the stand.

Mr. Wm. Chubner, owner of the team driven by Van Orden, testified as to the horse being lame and bruised, when it returned home. Never knew it to be lame before. Did not sanction the trial of strength of horses, as claimed by the defendants.

The defendants did not deny the fact of fastening the wagons together, or of the horses pulling, but said the horse that fell was not dragged more than fifteen feet. Did not intend any cruelty to the animals; merely wished to test their strength.

At the conclusion of the testimony on both sides, Gen. Lee made a brief and eloquent plea against the inhumanity of the defendants in thus needlessly torturing dumb animals, and against those persons at large who are so often guilty of this criminal charge. He presumed the men before the Judge did not claim to be barbarians, and they should have had better sense. The law bearing upon the case was cited, and the necessity of making a striking example of some persons in this class of offenders, urged upon the mind of the Judge.

Mr. France arose and took the position that the defendants did not intend cruelty to the animals, that they only wanted to test their strength. A man had as good a right to test the strength as he had the speed of an animal, and the latter test was being daily made without check or any hindrance of the law. He also called attention to the fact that his clients claimed they did not drag the horses as far as stated by the witnesses for the prosecution, and that the owner of the animals said they were not seriously injured.

Gen. Lee replied to the argument in favor of the right of the owners of animals to test their strength and speed, by saying that those who are guilty of cruelty to animals upon the race-course, by reason of compelling them to over-exertion, until they are tortured and pant for very life, are just as amenable to the rough hand of the law, as in this present case. The men did not stop with a simple test of strength, but dragged the animals some distance after it was known which ones were the strongest. Horses were given to us for our use and for our benefit, and not to be tortured or misused in any manner. "A merciful man is merciful to his beast."

Judge Cumming then summed up the evidence, read a portion of the statute bearing on the case, and spoke at some length of the importance of placing a check upon the perpetrators of this offence, the committing of which was becoming too common. In view of the fact that the defendants doubtless did not commit the deed for the express purpose of cruelty to the animals, and as said animals were not seriously injured, he would impose light fines—the extreme limit being $50—of $20 and costs in the case of Johnson, and $15 and costs upon Van Orden. Paying the amounts, the defendants were allowed to depart, thus ending the first case of prosecution by our new Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I some time ago subscribed for THE INDEX with a request for the back numbers of the present year. These I have received promptly, and have read or rather studied them with great interest and pleasure, for I find your views, principles, and statements to be an expression, better than I ever expected to find, of ideas which I have long cherished conscientiously, as the only true and consistent way of righteousness. I am with you heartily for free inquiry and veneration for truth; and let me assure you that there are more among the masses who are with you than you think. They only need, as I did, to become acquainted with the progress of these opinions, the character of the leaders, and the true nature of the conflict, to give evidence of this fact in a way that you would appreciate. I am twenty-five years of age, and a mechanic by occupation. The last fifteen years of my life has been passed among mechanics and artisans; and I am certain that there are thousands among the more intelligent of this class, whom you can count among your comrades. Of course there are various degrees of development, as there are various degrees of intelligence and education among these men. If it is asked—'how do they form these opinions in defiance of the common belief?'—I can only say that in the majority of cases I do not think it is the result of reading any of the so-called infidel publications; but that it is due generally to reflection, based on observation and the comprehension of the simple truths which every one is learning all his life-time, and of which all are possessed in some measure; from the boy who is puzzling over the rules of arithmetic, to the philosopher who is inquiring into the Origin and Destiny of Man. In my own case the book that has had the greatest influence in forming my opinions is 'Combe's Constitution of Man,' and the book that has had the most to do in confirming those opinions is 'Watts on the Improvement of the Mind,' although both these books accept the orthodox creed, inconsistently I should say, but evidently after the fashion that Dr. Watts explains when he says:—'For the most part men are born to their opinions, and they clothe their minds as they do their bodies, according to the fashion in vogue.' The reading of THE INDEX, and the agitation of my mind on this subject, have had one effect which I did not expect. I take a greater interest in preaching and attend church more regularly than ever before; but not as a worshipper, but as an observer. I find it the most effectual way of strengthening my position and finding peace in—disbelieving what they say. I find some odd theories presented. For instance, on one occasion, I remember the minister alluded to Jesus, disputing with the doctors in the temple, and said:—'It must not be supposed that Jesus went to the temple for the purpose of entering into a controversy with the doctors, but that he went there with an inquiring mind to learn wisdom; and in the course of the conversation he found that he knew more than the doctors, and in this the consciousness of his divinity dawned upon him.' Continue your fairness. Don't allow any scornful abuse of Christianity, for most Christians are such conscientiously. They are only suffering from a delusion of the intellect. Their emancipation should be undertaken in a kind spirit, out of respect to the universal element of morality which most of them possess. Don't become faint-hearted yourself because, in devoting the best years of your life to the service of others, your own financial prospects are seemingly darkened. Every good man has a right to look forward to an old age of honor, comfort, and the elegancies of abundant means. I have nothing to do but make a fortune. I will divide with you. Others will divide with you, and of all men the future is bright for you."

"I should like to see in some of the pages of THE INDEX your reason why Christians hate the Jews. I have asked a Syracuse orthodox minister; he answered, because the Jews have hated and crucified the Son of God. Only this is not radical enough for me. Please excuse my troubling you with such questions, only I am young and like to search for truth and reason." [We see no reason but the difference of religious opinion.—Ed.]

"I could not think of parting with THE INDEX; it has a charm for me which no other paper has. Friend McClintock's letter and your reply in No. 5, present volume, is worth the year's subscription."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be suspended during the months of July and August. Special notice will be given of any occasional meetings that may be held.

GROVE MEETING.—The Spiritualist Society and the Children's Progressive Lyceum of Toledo have made arrangements for holding a Grove Meeting and Basket Pic-nic on Sunday, Aug. 27. The steamer "Cora Locke" will leave the dock at 9 A. M., for the Grove. Tickets 50 cents. Children 25 cts.

Addresses are expected from Mrs. H. F. M. Brown, of Chicago, and other speakers. All persons interested are invited to attend.

DONATION.—THE INDEX ASSOCIATION acknowledge with thanks the receipt of $2.00 from Miss M. C. PERKINS, of Boston, as a donation.

Poetry,

MY PRAYER. [FOR THE INDEX.]

Not as a suppliant I come to Thee,
Nor before Thee my life's poor garments rend,
Mourning because they are so poor. To be Clad fit to come at all is joy, O Friend.

I hold my self-hood with the friends of earth
Too high to beg of them what I can win;
And human friendship is of little worth
That will not generous be to human sin.

Then firmly trusting in a birth divine,
And safely resting in Thy care for me,
This weak and selfish waywardness of mine,
O more than mother-love, I leave to Thee.

This only comes between us to conceal,
Cloud-like, the tenderness upon Thy face;
Dispersed by breath of love, it shall reveal
The same clear look. I feel the old embrace.

O how I love the coming home again—
I, prodigal, who wandered far from Thee!
I love the husks of conscience' stinging pain
Which send me home, to prove Thy love for me.

And now my prayer is not that I may go
No more astray, or that my life may be
Other than full of weakness, care and woe;
But that I grow in confidence toward Thee—

Hold out my hand as to my bosom friend,
Assured that with a kindly grasp Thou'lt say,
"Trust me, dear child, through all unto the end."
Trying to be to Thee a friend, I pray

That all my tryings may be prayers more true
Than supplications or repentant sighs;
Till, with these efforts and these failures through,
Triumphant will shall over all arise.

Let me come nearer Thee, Thou sovereign Will,
Who hold'st in check a universe with law,—
Come, reverently but bravely, nearer still
Than I could ever come in fear or awe.

MILWAUKEE.

W.

The Index.

AUGUST 19, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

For Special Notices see eighth page.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed: and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten	" 1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	" 1,000
GUIDO MARK,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	" 1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	" 1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	" 300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	" 300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	" 300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	" 300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	" 500
J. G. HOLZWARTH,	"	"	One	" 100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	" 100
C. AUCHARD,	"	"	"	" 100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	" 3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	" 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Two	" 300
GEOR. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	One	" 100
MISS A. HALL,	Deauce,	"	"	" 100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	" 100
J. SEDGEBER,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	" 100
CARL POST,	Painesville,	Oh.,	"	" 100
HENRY MILLER,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	" 300
L. R. SUNDEBLAND,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	" 500
J. L. WHITING,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	" 100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Boston,	"	"	" 100
J. E. SCUTTON,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	" 100
S. I. DURKEE,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	" 100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	" 100
S. L. HILL,	"	"	"	" 100
W. H. SPENCER,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	" 1,000
JON. F. BARRETT,	Haverhill,	"	Two	" 200
E. W. WEIR,	Boston,	"	"	" 200
FRANK PRATHER,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	" 200
E. F. DINSMORE,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
J. T. DICKINSON,	Wellsville,	Kan.,	One	" 100
W. J. POTTER,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	" 200
G. C. GLATTE,	Middlefield,	Oh.,	Fourteen,	" 1,400
MRS. S. EMERSON,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three,	" 300
MISS E. EMERSON,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	" 300
W. C. GANNETT,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	" 100
MISS M. C. PERKINS,	"	"	"	" 100
W. H. DOWNES,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	" 300
B. B. SMITH,	Birmingham,	Ct.,	"	" 100
R. B. SMITH,	Lansing,	Mich.,	"	" 100
W. C. RUSSEL,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	" 100
	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	" 100

$23,100

COFFEE AND COCKROACHES.

In the Illustrated Christian Weekly we find the following paragraph, apparently editorial:—

"In Toledo the 'Liberals' have organized a 'Liberal Association,' composed chiefly of German free-thinkers, the immediate object of which appears to be the election of William Kraus, on an anti-Sabbath ticket, with an ulterior aim to create political diversion in favor of liberal, i. e., infidel candidates and principles. If the Roman Catholics had organized a Catholic Association, or if the Evangelicals had organized an Evangelical Association, who would have been quicker to rebuke them than the Liberals? It is a dangerous precedent, gentlemen, and a strange precedent to be set by those who claim to be, above all others, the advocates of the separation of religious belief and political action."

From our remarks in THE INDEX, No. 81, the Christian Weekly has drawn unwarrantable inferences. The Toledo Liberal Alliance is not an aggressive but a defensive union. It was called into existence by the aggressions of the Young Men's Christian Association in bringing forward a Sabbath ticket, and thereby defeating the re-election (not first election) of Mayor Kraus. It was precisely because the "Evangelicals had organized an Evangelical Association," which secured the defeat of the regularly nominated Republican candidate for mayor in a city where a large majority of the voters were Republican, that the liberals were awakened to the necessity of combined action in defence of religious and political freedom. If, as we certainly believe, the editor of the Christian Weekly is above intentional misrepresentation, he will correct a statement of the matter which necessarily conveys wholly erroneous impressions of it.

But the closing sentence of the above paragraph opens up a question on which we are glad to find an opportunity to speak. All true liberals deprecate and condemn the introduction of religious [theological] opinions into politics, as disturbing elements. So long as a man forbears to force his religious opinions on others, and is content with his own liberty of thought, speech, and action, it is nobody's business but his own what these opinions may be; and it would be anything but "liberal" to object to such a candidate, otherwise well qualified, that in religion he believed thus or so. Interpreted in this way, every liberal worthy of the name must indeed advocate the "separation of religious belief and political action."

But suppose that a body of voters, comprising only a portion of the community, insist on compelling the entire community to sustain a religious institution based solely on the minority's (or even the majority's) religious belief. Suppose that this body of voters combine together to enforce by law the observance of a "holy day" which is holy in their own eyes alone, and thus propose to rule the State by a code which has no basis but the Church. This is the actual state of the case. In Toledo, as all over the country, the Young Men's Christian Association use their political influence very actively to sustain and enforce Sunday-Sabbath legislation. In Cincinnati, the Evangelical Ministerial Association lead the Sunday-Sabbath party, and have just held a great meeting in Pike's Hall to oppose the repeal of the Sunday-Sabbath laws. In New England an organization has just been formed under the name of the "New England Sabbath Association," and the "pastors of New England" are to secure signatures as numerously as possible to the following preamble and resolution:—

WHEREAS, The Evil Spirit of Sabbath Desecration is undermining both our civil and religious liberties; therefore

Resolved, That it is expedient for us as patriots and Christians to pledge our influence, example and co-operation to the great work of preserving the Sabbath of our Fathers."

Thus the Sabbatarian party are not content with the privilege of meeting for worship on Sunday unmolested and undisturbed (which is their undoubted right); but they insist that all the rest of the community shall suspend their common avocations, and pay public homage to the idol which they themselves worship. In other words, by the Sunday laws the orthodox fragment of the public imposes on the whole public the solemn maintenance of orthodox ideas. They have already carried their "religious belief" into "political action."

Now what shall the liberals do who believe in the separation of religious belief and political action? Shall they, in order to be true to their own principles, acquiesce in the existing union of the two? Or shall they, in order to secure the separation they desire, combine to reform the laws, not only by the abolition of all Sunday statutes, but also by the abolition of all similar abuses? The evil exists. Does consistency require those who oppose it to leave it untouched, or to take vigorous hold and abolish it?

There are some persons who dislike cockroaches in their coffee. They object to the union of cockroaches and coffee. They prefer the utter and absolute separation of cockroaches and coffee. But if they are so unfortunate as to find cockroaches in their coffee, they are apt to be so unreasonable as to fling out the cockroaches, even if they have to order fresh cups.

We give the orthodox public fair warning, that the liberals of America are rapidly making up their minds henceforth to have their coffee without cockroaches.

A FRIEND IN ENGLAND.

Our readers will remember the two very interesting discourses in THE INDEX, No. 79, upon the famous "Voysey Case" which created so much excitement a few months ago throughout England. It is with great pleasure that we acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the Rev. Charles Voysey, accompanied with a copy of a lecture recently delivered by him in Manchester and London. This lecture is so admirable a condensation of radical criticisms on the Bible—so clear in statement, so cogent in argument, and so temperate yet uncompromising in tone—that we shall print it entire in the next two numbers of THE INDEX. It is the best popular exposition we have ever read of the errors and immoralities which contrast so darkly with the finer portions of the Scriptures. No one can read this lecture without a profound respect for the writer and a belief that he has a very important work to do in the future.

It will not, we trust, be a violation of confidence to make the following extract from Mr. Voysey's very kind and interesting letter:—

"I have, therefore, only time to thank you briefly but warmly for sending them [some copies of THE INDEX], and to give you my promise to do my best to make THE INDEX known in this country. I shall be delighted hereafter to send you a contribution to your columns. What I have read I heartily concur in. I only seem to miss a reference to the Divine Being as the object of religious feeling. Humanity ought to be the object of our religious action. But I must not enter upon this discussion now. It is enough to assure you of my great sympathy and my earnest wishes for your success."

It is, of course, superfluous to add that we shall be highly pleased to receive Mr. Voysey's promised contribution, and that our readers will undoubtedly share this pleasure.

TYNDALL'S "LIGHT AND ELECTRICITY."

In a thin volume of less than two hundred pages, D. Appleton & Co. have given to the American public the admirable condensation by Prof. Tyndall of the leading facts and principles of "Light and Electricity," interspersed with historical notes of great interest to the general reader. The two divisions of the work are each thrown into the form of successively numbered paragraphs, arranged very conveniently under numerous heads, thus enabling the student to perceive at a glance the general arrangement of the matters treated of—a very great assistance in any study. For terseness and clearness of statement, and for thoroughness and comprehensiveness of exposition, the work is a model; and we know of no other handbook giving in so small a compass so complete, intelligible, and exact a survey of these sciences in their latest developments.

Prof. Tyndall understands the true theory of popularizing science, which is not to pour out a flood of baby-talk and rhetorical fustian about it, but rather to give accurate elementary instruction in it. This is what the people want; and we rejoice at the multiplication of such treatises as the present. They are silently but rapidly "flanking," in Lecky's phrase, the superstitions still preached in the pulpit, and preparing the way for a truer and healthier civilization.

There is an old story told of Cuvier, we forget where, that well illustrates the manner in which science emancipates the mind from the terrors of superstition. The Devil, it is said, alarmed at the discoveries of the great naturalist, and fearing to lose his sway over the people as their ignorance diminished, appeared to Cuvier by night as he sat in his study, and with terrible gestures threatened to "eat him alive," unless he would swear to discontinue his scientific pursuits. Cuvier coolly put on his spectacles, and surveyed his sulphureous majesty from head to foot. "Horns," he slowly said, "and hoofs. Graminivorous. You can't do it!" And he quietly resumed his studies, leaving his discomfited guest to chew the cud of mortification at his leisure.

We fancy that Prof. Tyndall would receive a similar visit with equal sang-froid. At any rate his volumes help to enable others to do so.

For sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

Mr. Pillsbury was at Ashfield, Mass., Aug. 13. He will be at Linesville, Pa., Aug. 20, and at Salem, O., Aug. 27. In September he will be in Battle Creek, Mich. We are sorry that his "Notes from the Field" arrived this week too late for publication. They will appear in our next issue.

THE RADICAL for September will contain "A Defence of the Paris Commune," by W. J. LINTON; "The New Protestantism," by W. J. POTTER; with other articles of interest to radical readers.

Price $3.00 a year. Single copy 30 cts. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

RELIGION AND ATHEISM.

Under this head, in the last number of THE INDEX, the relation of the Free Religious Association to the class of persons who are called "Atheists" was discussed. The ground taken was that the Association as a body would not probably undertake, in order to indicate its purpose of fellowship, to define the words "religion" and "religious" occurring in its constitution, but that it meant rather to provide an opportunity where all persons, of whatever phase of opinion, who are interested in the great problems of thought and life that are commonly included under the term "religion," might confer freely and equally together, to the end of reaching the solutions that are both most rational and most practical. The Association may be said to stand in the history of religion for this principle,—that the highest interests of mankind, individual and social, mental, moral, and spiritual, are to be promoted by the most complete freedom of thought and the largest possible practical fellowship on the basis of free thought. On such ground as this the man who believes and the man who denies theism may stand together as fellow-members of the Association. This point, it is believed, was made plain, and, it is hoped, satisfactory to all concerned in the former article.

There are one or two other points involved in the subject, but of a more general character, of which it may be well to speak while the matter is fresh. And this is the first point.

It is a singular fact that the so-called atheistic class manifest a good deal of interest in the problems of religion. They may not only doubt, but positively deny, the existence of a Supreme Being; they may declare, as many of them do, that religion is synonymous with superstition and is to be abolished; yet they do a good deal of thinking, and have a good deal to say, about religion. They are by no means indifferent to the subject, but as a class are apt to show a livelier interest in it, though speculatively on the negative side, than do very many who are classed as religious believers. Where sufficiently numerous, they hold Sunday meetings for the discussion of religious questions. And latterly in a number of places, they have joined with liberal believers in religion, especially with "Spiritualists," in the support of Sunday services where there is regular speaking, it may be by an ordained Christian minister, and where prayer is permitted. They help sustain Sunday Schools, and even teach in them. And their newspapers are discussing constantly the same problems that the newspapers called "religious" are discussing; and when it comes to practical problems, they usually take the same ground that is taken by the most liberal of the "religious" newspapers. It cannot be said, then, that this class of people are indifferent to religion.

Secondly,—there is a good deal to be learned by the believers in religion from the class who are called atheists. Their opinions are to be listened to with respect. Their record both in the matter of thinking and of practical life may be studied with profit. When a fair judgment shall have been obtained, it will be found that they have made a much needed protest, first, against a superstitious and degrading theology, and, secondly, against any power being permitted to usurp the place of the moral sentiment in human conduct. They have stood as special advocates of reason and conscience in the problems of life; and their merits for this service will surely be allowed in the ultimate judgments of history. And no fair-minded religious believer even now would say that their record in practical morality is not good. As a rule they are upright, honorable, benevolent; good neighbors and good citizens; and though they may not believe in using the word "religion," because in their view it has always been leagued with superstition and hypocrisy, yet they are usually strong believers in and good practisers of the substance of that which was defined as "pure religion" by the apostle James,—"the visiting of the widows and fatherless in their affliction and the keeping oneself unspotted from the world,"—that is, moral integrity and Charity. And believers may well take a lesson from their fidelity in these respects; may possibly, also, learn some higher conception of infinite Being and of universal Providence from their so-called "atheism," which has certainly many points of union with modern rationalistic theism.

On the other hand, the class called atheists may learn something of value from those who call themselves theists; and also from those who, whether theists or not, believe that the word "religion" stands for something in human nature which, however falsely developed it may have been, is not to be eradicated. They must admit the possibility that, in their office of protesting against the irrationality and immorality which have often gone hand in hand with religion, they have overlooked some important facts in the problem. That type of atheism, especially, which manifests itself in the popular mind in this country and in England, is based for the most part on a method of reasoning that was in vogue a century ago, but is now nearly obsolete among the greatest thinkers; and it had reference to the conditions of the religious world that were once prevalent, but are now to a considerable extent changed. The philosophy of religion is now treated by some of the profoundest believers in religion without any resort to the supernatural theory, and in a manner that should command the respect of all who profess to believe in Nature and in human reason. And those who count themselves atheists and deniers of religion may well study the new aspects of religious thought,—coming possibly by the study to see that the religious sentiment, which has such a mighty history in the human family, cannot be wholly false, but must cover some great reality in man's consciousness and life.

Now if these two classes of honest thinkers and of honest workers for human welfare can anywhere be brought together in fair and earnest conference, each class bringing its own thought and experience, great good must result to both. It would probably be found that the difference even in speculative opinion is not really so great as it had been supposed, and that in matters of practice the difference is very slight; that at least in a free interchange of views and feelings on the deepest and most central problems of human experience, the truth which all are seeking will be best reached and the higher conditions of life towards which all aspire will be soonest realized. And very likely it would also be learned that, as the religious sentiment needs to be rectified by reason and braced by a vigorous conscience to prevent it from sinking into mere superstition and ceremonious emotion, so to the intellectual and moral nature will be added a finer grace, a something more of warmth and earnestness and consecration to the noblest ends, if it shall be permeated with the essence of that feeling which mankind have always indicated by the term religious obligation. The marriage of reason to reverence, of conscience to aspiration, of human experience to human ideals,—this, surely, is “a consummation devoutly to be wished.” And towards effecting this union, religion and scepticism, theism and atheism, have each something to say which the other should hear.

W. J. P.

THE PRIEST AND THE PROPHET.

The priest and the prophet always stand opposed. They head an inevitable conflict, which, in one form or another, has always been the accompaniment, if not the condition and means, of the world's progress. Whether it be a law of Nature that the world shall always advance by strifes and violence is a different question. To me it seems not so. Rather, I believe, is the conflict to be ascribed to the “inventions” of men into which passions have led them astray. I confidently expect a time when the peace which seems Nature's ideal shall reign, and the profitable conflict of ideas shall be insured by the harmony of the passions and the discredit of force. But however that may be, it is certain that hitherto and now the strife still rages; and it is always the war between the priest and the prophet, under whatever other names it may at times be waged.

The priest stands as the exponent of whatever is; the prophet as the advocate of whatever ought to be. The priest gathers to himself the support of all the existing institutions of society, because he is the organ which proclaims the present system, establishes the interests of the governing class upon religious sanctions, and represents the extreme of immobility by virtue of the supernatural pretensions of the church. The prophet gathers to himself the lowly and obscure,—a fisherman or two and a tax-gatherer; but only a few of them, because the interests and fanaticism of the prince and master are no harder to combat than the ignorance and superstition of the vassal and serf. The priest is always the party in power, and it is one of his functions to persecute the prophet and put him down by violence.

This is a very trite lesson of history, and is very evident too in our own day. There is no longer power to burn and slay. But raging priests hurl about vile epithets; ecclesiastical odium cools friendship, limits sympathies, and inflicts social penalties. It is the necessity of a creed-bound church. Wherever there are supernatural pretensions enforcing a creed, we may rest assured that all peace is a most hollow sham. Such churches are persecuting bodies by an internal tendency which they cannot avoid. And not only are some others their enemies, but all others are their enemies. Each creed-church is, by constitution, a pirate, at war with all the rest of the world; and when peace is patched up between them, it is only an armed alliance that they may share the booty by despoiling a neighbor too strong for either separately. What can be more sweet and edifying than the present relations between evangelical churches, joined in alliance and what not? But they have simply agreed to postpone their several hatreds until they have put down a common foe.

There are many who can remember the time when the feud between the Congregationalists and Baptists was more bitter than their present joint dislike of the Liberals. It is not very long since the Episcopalians denounced Presbyterians and banished Puritans; then the Presbyterians defied the Episcopalians, and the Puritans hung the Quakers; then the Hicksite and Orthodox Quakers ostracised each other; then all sects of the Orthodox united in hating the Unitarians and Universalists; then Unitarians, Universalists and Orthodox joined to denounce Parker, and still make a motley union against a class of free spirits known as radicals; and finally, the Universalists, the much decried, the berated, the persecuted, the despised, have bestirred themselves mightily, disinherited some young scions who ventured to differ from their grandfathers, “scorn running with their heels” towards the fond advances of the Unitarians, and, led by the redoubtable priest of School Street, go about standing up for Jesus, against all the heretics and sinners with the like of whom Jesus rather loved to associate. It is as certain as daylight that all these sects would fall by the ears together straightway, if they had not the Rationalists to combine against. There is, also, the great Roman Church which is every year fortifying itself more firmly in our Republican land and which will inevitably use the power of the sword again if it ever becomes strong enough. And it will become strong enough, if republican virtues decline; for the amazing historical consistency of that Church will give it a victory, never so speedily coming as now, over all forms of Protestant Christianity, and whether or not we shall be able to take our stand with rationalism, depends upon the political and social virtues of the people.

Here we are, then, in a time which has by no means outgrown the conflict of the Priest and the Prophet. Nay, it is my interpretation of the signs of the times that the struggle yet to come upon our soil may be such as Europe never yet passed through. God grant it may be the last expiring throes of tyranny, while reason arises merciful but triumphant! But let us look to our common schools. These are the main anchors of hope. The next is simple rational religion, undefiled by any taint of pride,—either the pretensions of Christian supernaturalism on the one hand or the egotism of luxury on the other. It is full time to be very serious and very earnest. Call me a croaker if you will, but allow me to confess freely that I have little sympathy with that hurrahing, cheering, triumphing and mutually congratulating disposition which seems to be a prominent trait among our radicals, whether political or religious. “Whither are we drifting?”—I believe to be a question ignored now only by those who turn giddy upon the heights. It is true that we live in a great and glorious time. It makes my heart beat high to see how the lines of education have gone out over the earth; how freedom has arisen with healing in her wings; and how all humanity has become one organization, so that cruelty on the Archipelago makes a pulse in the vast frame flutter painfully in Washington. But to my mind there is a cloud in the West, no bigger than a man's hand comparatively, but most portentous and threatening. It is not that anything which has taken place or may take place is to be dreaded of itself, but that many signs agree in a certain tendency, like the footsteps all pointing to the lion's lair. High as the pulse of exultation plays, there are things in the present which all but stop its beat. They are obvious to all eyes,—in New York, in Washington, in luxurious churches and luxurious houses. It is well to “trust the people;” but it is well also to understand that the people are as summer wax in the hands of those invisible moral laws which marvelously execute themselves and average themselves. The priest will never disappear from religion till all men become prophets in morals.

J. V. B.

The Golden Age of Aug. 5 has the following very generous notice of the Index Association. Last year the New York Independent had not unfrequently a friendly word for THE INDEX (as indeed it has had this year also); and we perceive that, in leaving the Independent office, Mr. Tilton did not leave behind him the habit of saying kindly things. We should reciprocate his wishes for our “success,” if we did not see that, unless all signs fail, the Golden Age has already succeeded so well as to stand in no more need of wishes, in lieu of which we offer our congratulations. We cannot say that we endorse everything we read in his columns, as he would doubtless say also of THE INDEX. But a little alloy may be necessary for practical purposes, and the Golden Age is at least eighteen carats fine:—

“THE INDEX of Toledo, the organ of the Free Religionists, is attempting to re-organize itself on an enduring pecuniary basis, and we hope it will succeed. Its plan is to raise a capital of $100,000, in a thousand shares of $100 each. No subscription will be payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed, and then only 10 per cent. will be required annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond 10 per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Thus far, the subscriptions amount to $21,000. The list is headed by that very free religious clergyman, the Rev. Petroleum V. Nasby, with $2,000. Mr. Nasby, whenever he consents to appear in his true character as Mr. Locke, is a very radical, generous, and noble man. Eight other citizens of Toledo subscribe $1,000 each. S. L. Hill, of Florence, Mass., subscribes $1,000; J. T. Dickinson, of Middlefield, Conn., $1,400; and Asa K. Butts, of New York, 3,000. The other shareholders hold small quantities of stock—principally single shares. THE INDEX is ‘the voice of one crying in the wilderness,’ and we hope that its friends will feed it, if not with honey, at least with money.”

Correspondents will greatly oblige us by not sending articles for publication exceeding a column and a half in length, or two columns at the farthest. By so doing they will spare themselves the annoyance of having their communications declined, and will also spare us the painful duty of declining them. But we are always grateful for short and pithy articles. Our friends must remember how little space we have at our disposal.

An esteemed correspondent inquires whether “Franklin's Letter to Paine,” now going the rounds of the press, is genuine. If any one can bring forward decisive proofs either for or against its genuineness, we shall be happy to publish them, provided they are not too voluminous.

The Liberal Christian of July 22 can afford to copy from our own columns a criticism upon THE INDEX; but it cannot afford to copy our reply to it.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

A NOTE.

DETROIT, Mich., Aug. 7, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:

My friend,—While writing my word on O. B. Frothingham's article on "Spiritualism and Superstition," published in THE INDEX of July 29, I remembered he was in Europe, and for a moment it seemed hardly fit or fair to comment on the words of an absentee. But on second thought I concluded he would care little, and would very likely rest content without any reply, as I often do in such cases, satisfied with the statement of the matter from different stand-points, and leaving the readers to judge between the two. So "the spirit moved," and I wrote on.

Yours truly,

G. B. STEBBINS.

[Our little note to Mr. Stebbins's article was not at all designed to intimate any impropriety in the criticising of an absentee, but only to call attention to the fact that Mr. Frothingham had joined in inviting several representative Spiritualists (among whom we should not have omitted to mention Mr. Stebbins himself) to the platform of the Free Religious Association. This would not have been necessary on our part, if Mr. Frothingham had been at home. There was nothing improper or unfriendly in Mr. Stebbins's communication, but we felt unwilling that casual readers should draw false and of course unintended inferences concerning our friend's treatment of the Spiritualists.—Ed.]

THE TABLES TURNED.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—With this I send you an article from the N. Y. Tribune of July 28, on "Foul Hitting." It reminds me that the presumption with which orthodox people try to proscribe every man who does not pay his weekly devotion at the shrine of that stupendous anachronism called Christianity, received a fitting rebuke the other day from a stern old radical, Mr. —, a bookseller of New York. A mutual friend brought in and introduced Dr. A. of the orthodox fold, who, looking over the books, said:

"Mr. —, I see you have Emerson's works here."

"Yes, certainly!"

"Do you sell many of them?"

"Quite a large number," was the reply.

"Ah!" with a regretful sigh, "I suppose they are very dangerous works."

"How so?"

"Why, I'm told that he is no better than an infidel; that he never goes to church."

"What in the name of God should such a man as that go to church for?" exclaimed Mr. —, his flashing eye and deep gruff tones speaking surprise and indignation. "Why, that Emerson has furnished the orthodox ministry with brains for the last twenty years!"

B.

INTUITION—WHAT IT IS AND WHAT IT IS NOT.

ELDORA, IOWA, July 10, 1871.

FRIEND ABBOT:—You will probably think it a little strange that one who is neither a scientist nor a theologian should presume to criticize discussions on such delicate questions as divide the great schools of thinkers at the present day. Indeed, I have no other apology to offer, except that I am "deadly in earnest after truth," and cannot see the truth clearly in some statements made by THE INDEX and its writers.

Either there is a little mysticism about that word intuition, or else I am too dull of comprehension to perceive the sense intended by those who use it. The same may be said of some arguments on the subject of Deity and Immortality, which appear in THE INDEX from time to time.

While Mrs. Mills, in her communication to THE INDEX of July 1, expresses "surprise that science and intuition should ever be opposed to each other," I am equally surprised that science should ever occupy any other position than that of opposition to intuition.

Your assertion that "they need not be, if rightly understood," I would respectfully ask permission to criticize before accepting.

Now it may be that I do not rightly understand the term intuition. I admit that I have experienced the same difficulty in comprehending the term intuition, as distinct from naked perception, that I have in comprehending the term faith as distinct from belief.

Permit me to state what in my mind intuition is not, that we may more readily understand what it is:—

1. Conclusions arrived at by any reasoning process, however short, are not intuition.

2. Beliefs imbibed from others are not intuition.

3. Knowledge obtained by actual contact with the physical world is not intuitive knowledge.

4. Comparative reasonings are not intuitive, however quickly they may be made. By this I mean conclusions drawn from premises because of their resemblance to certain other premises requiring such conclusions.

5. I should not call that an intuitive judgment by which, after having heard all the evidence, one decides in the affirmative, while he acknowledges the weight of evidence to be on the negative—still being impelled to believe the affirmative right, without being able to discern any adequate reasons why.

This last embraces much of the so-called intuitive knowledge. But I think that in nearly or quite all such cases we shall find, upon a closer analysis of the question, that adequate reasons and intermediate ideas did exist. Such has been my experience, at least.

Now since I cannot conceive of an example which may not be classed under some one of the above heads (except in the case of infants, etc.), am I wrong in concluding that intuition is but another name for reasonings and beliefs the causes of which are at first sight non-apparent?

There are many cases where conclusions follow the presentation of premises so quickly that we can not discern the exact process of reasoning used.

When, in reading rapidly, we look at a printed word, we are not cognizant of having noticed or seen any one of the several letters of which it is composed; and yet philosophers tell us we do see them all, and it is our multiplied experience which enables us so quickly to associate the word with this particular combination of letters, and also the idea with the word. But I do not see the necessity of intuition here.

We have many beliefs which we have possessed from childhood, and we cannot tell how we obtained them; and if there is such a thing as dogmatism in this world, I believe we have reached it when we insist that these beliefs are made known to us through intuition.

I have spoken of the communication of Mrs. Mills. In all kindness I desire to follow her through some of her reasonings. And I do this because I think they are identical with those used by many members of the Free Religious Association, and I fear calculated to mislead the seeker after truth. I do not wish to be understood in any mood of fault-finding, but in the simple spirit of inquiry.

Mrs. Mills says:—"We must investigate the phenomena of intuition, and assign rational cause for its existence. My intuitional nature accepts this as a self-evident fact, while my reasoning nature demands it."

Let us see how much there is of intuition here. Her reasoning nature demands it because it is the very process by which she tests the truthfulness of all other propositions in Nature; and its agreement with the uniform principle which she has found to hold good in all cases where it could be tested makes it acceptable to her mind. The perception of this agreement or non-agreement with determined principles is really all there is of our judgment between right and wrong. It is the way we distinguish right from wrong. And this according to Webster is the act of reason itself. Am I in error if I fail to see the need of intuition in this action of the mind?

Neither can I find use for intuition in the mind's action in comprehending Professor Huxley's ideas of protoplasm, when clearly written out on paper; nor yet when I draw upon imagination to see the Professor while he describes it.

Again she says:—"What do we know of science without its basis of intuition, or self-evident truths?" But if these truths are really self-evident, why subject them to the above-named investigation, and accept or reject them on outside evidence?

Is it not because we suspect they are not self-evident, but that we may have obtained them by false reasoning, or may have been taught them by persons no wiser than ourselves?

That "twice two are four," no one will dispute; not because it is self-evident, but because it has been demonstrated by experience beyond the possibility of doubting.

She says:—"I seek for mind in the abstract. . . . I see it in the earliest dawns of the human race, before the reasoning powers are strong enough to give birth to science. All these elements (meaning their desires, purposes, inclinations, wills, etc.) are manifested in them through the action (if I may so call it) of the energies of pure intuition."

If she has reference to the early history of the world, I reply that I have no history running back beyond the realm of man's reason and a very limited science; and in discussing facts, I am not inclined to draw on imagination.

But if she refers to the apparently instinctive actions of children or infants (and the same would apply equally well to the lower animal), then I own that we cannot always know what reasons they may have for their apparently intelligent actions, since they cannot explain them to us, and since the science of instincts (if I may be allowed the expression) is but little known.

But this very fact forbids me to assign intuition as its cause.

Neither can I see intuition, nor yet mind, in the rootlet which is thrust out with such precision in the direction of moisture and nourishment, instead of pushing into a dry and innutritious soil. Admitting the fact of its growth, it can only grow when moisture and nutriment are supplied, and hence it must grow where it finds support, and cannot, if it would, run in the opposite direction beyond the point where these needful supplies are suspended. I do not deduce from all this any evidence of either mind or design. I simply see the impossibility of its being otherwise.

Because the tender bud of the helianthus follows the direction of the sun in its course from east to west, shall I assert that it possesses mind and hence purposes and wills to do so? Or shall I assert that the direct agency of an Almighty Mind is at work in it? Or yet that there is evidence of design, and hence intelligence, in the nice adaptation of means to ends in thus securing to the opening bud the greatest possible benefit of the sunshine? Why should I ignore the more reasonable supposition that the light and heat (and perhaps other unknown properties) of the sun, acting upon the plastic plant, compel it to turn as it does, and that it could not, if it would, turn its head from the sun?

Again:—"On and on I go . . . till I come to the minutest atom my mind can take cognizance of; and here, too, in its infinitesimal perfection, I see the embodiment of mind . . . yet I have not found anywhere mind distinct from matter, nor matter independent of mind."

Before me is an atom of iron. By what authority shall I assert that it is clothed with life and crowned with mind? I know it has the quality of definite form, of gravitation and cohesion, and is wrapt in electricity. But I also remember that life and mind in their lowest known forms are more than these. Beneath my feet is the great earth. It possesses a multitude of substances, is permeated by heat, and covered with a sheet of electricity. But there is not the organized arrangement of its substances nor the specific order of its electrical currents, which I find is the grand distinction between animate and inanimate bodies. How shall I proclaim the earth endowed with life and intelligence without uttering a mere fancy?

Look at that spreading plant in your garden. Sever it from its root and return in an hour, and what do you behold? Is that drooping form—are those withered leaves—but a change of form, and is death truly "swallowed up in life?"

When you stand by the bed-side of the dead, can you persuade yourself that you witness no death but only a "change of form?" There are the same perfect limbs, the same countenance, the same pleading look, it may be. Nothing is wanting but the action of its fluids and the restoration of that subtle something we call life.

The atoms entering into the composition of a once organic body may all be left; the galvanic forces and other agencies which made up that life may all be preserved in the great reservoir of Nature ready to be used in other forms of life. But by what fine-drawn thread of reason do I conclude that all this is life, or that it is anything else than what I see—the active forces of inanimate nature?

That one form of life goes to make room for another, and the elements of one body are immediately appropriated in another, is evident. But this only proves a rapid succession of life, and, I think, equally implies a rapid succession of death. So with the same breath that exclaims—"Death is swallowed up in life," I am compelled to own that life is swallowed up in death. I cannot understand Nature to "say 'there is no death.'"

I do not assert that Nature, as a whole, is not animate, nor that her various laws are not the eternal edicts of an Almighty God. But I own that I have but little evidence that such is the case. These propositions come to my mind as wild hypotheses; and though they are pleasant to look upon and agreeable to the heart, yet they are none the less hypothetical.

This article has already grown much beyond the limits intended for it; and though there are some thoughts I would like to add, yet I forbear, asking pardon for inflicting upon you so lengthily a communication.

S. F. BENSON.

[It was not in a theological but in a philosophical sense that we said intuition need not be antagonistic to science. This we could not explain without stating at length the outlines of an entirely new philosophy—which is manifestly impossible in THE INDEX. We have no more faith in theological intuition than our thoughtful correspondent, and use the term to signify certain kinds of perception only. With very much of the above article we wholly agree, though not with all.—Ed.]

It has been often affirmed that Roman Catholicism is fundamentally incompatible with republican government. Whether this postulate be true or false, few will deny that the incompatibility exists between the principles of this Republic, as set forth in the Declaration of Independence and in the Bills of Rights of many at least of the States, and such utterances as this from The Catholic World:

"While the State has rights, she has them only in virtue and by permission of the superior authority, and that authority can only be expressed by the Church—that is, through the organic law infallibly announced and unchangeably asserted, regardless of temporal consequences."

This is a flat contradiction of the American doctrine, that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. It is a virtual affirmation that the civil power is subordinate to the Church, and directly subject to its authority. The doctrine is alike anti-republican and anti-American, and, carried to its legitimate result, makes the Pope the master of the world.—N. Y. Tribune.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

RIFLES, SHOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS. Gun Material. Write for Price List to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [88-108.]

WANTED—A SITUATION. The subscriber, who has had several years experience in teaching such studies as are generally pursued at Massachusetts High Schools, and also in giving piano-forte lessons, would accept a moderate compensation at a place where Bible-reading is not required in school, and where no attempt would be made to interfere with his religious convictions or with the management of his school. Address A. D. JACKSON, care of SAMUEL JACKSON, JAMAICA PLAIN, MASS. 78-83

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 731f

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 731f.

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($30 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88yl

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE,
BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,
Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.
D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (20 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Tilton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,
The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.
Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.
"It Injures Our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?
Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.
These four for 10 cents.
Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
701f 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher & Bookseller,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

The Origin of Species, By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
The Descent of Man, By DARWIN, 2 vols, each.... 2 00
Wallace on Natural Selection, (London)..... 2 00
Mivart on the Genesis of Species...... 1 00
Man's Place in Nature, By HUXLEY..... 1 25
Origin of Species, By HUXLEY..... 1 00
Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condition of Man, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
The Earthward Pilgrimage, By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
History of European Morals, from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols, 8vo..... 6 00
Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
Chips from a German Workshop, By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
The Old Roman World, By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
Short Studies on Great Subjects, By JAMES ANTHONY PROUDE..... 1 50
Lecture on Calvinism, By the same..... 75
The Heavens, An illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
Words and their Uses, By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
Steps of Belief, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
Nature and Life, By Rev. ROBERT COLLYER..... 1 50
Sartor Resartus, By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edition..... 90
The Choice of Books, Same..... 75
Essays of Elia, By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
Thoughts about Art, By PHILLIP GILBERT HAMERTON..... 2 00
Words of Weight on the Woman Question, (London)..... 2 25
The Friendships of Woman, By W. R. ALGER... 2 00
A Day by the Fire, LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
Sanctum Sanctorum, THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
Carlyle's Essays, Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
Among My Books, By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 2 vols..... 5 00
Society and Solitude, By the same..... 2 00
Topics of the Times, By JAMES PARTON..... 2 00
Success and its Conditions, By E. P. WHIPPLE... 1 50
Literature and Life, By same..... 1 50
Tablets, By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
Companions of My Solitude, By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
Organization in Daily Life, Same..... 1 50
Realms, By the same..... 1 50
War and Culture, By same..... 1 50
Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms, By same... 1 25
Ten Great Religions, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
Light and Electricity, By TYNDALL..... 1 25
Our Girls, By DIO LEWIS..... 1 50
Studies in Literature, By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read,—NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
Principles of Psychology, By HERBERT SPENCER... 2 50
American Religion, By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
Fragments Of Science For Unscientific People, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Light Science For Leisure Hours, By R. A. PROCTOR... 3 00
Handbook Of Legendary And Mythological Art, By Mrs. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 3 50
Hereditary Genius—Its Laws and Consequences, By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
The Races of The Old World, By CHAS. L. BRACE..... 2 00
Little Women, By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
Wallace's Review Of Darwin's Descent Of Man, PAPER..... 25
Heat as a Mode of Motion, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Buechner on Force and Matter, (London Print)..... 3 75
Essays, By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE..... 1 00
Aristotle's Ethics, (Bohn's Edition)..... 2 00
France before Europe, By MICHELET..... 1 00
Roman Imperialism and Other Essays, By J. R. SEELEY. Author of "Ecce Homo"..... 1 50
The Republic of Plato..... 1 25
The Book of Golden Thoughts, By HENRY ATWELL... 1 25
Colton's Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words..... 1 25
Consolations of Travel, or The Last Days of a Philosopher, By SIR HUMPHREY DAVY..... 1 50
The Poetical Works of HOOD, WORDSWORTH, SHELLEY, KEATS, MOORE, SCOTT, BYRON, full gilt, and on tinted paper, each only..... 1 75
Address,
HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher and Bookseller.
Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio
TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.
N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.
Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names..... $50 in Greenbacks.
For 50 Names..... $25 in Greenbacks.
For 25 Names..... $15 in Greenbacks.
For 10 Names..... $5 in Greenbacks.
For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
LOCK BOX 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	No.
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones.....	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. E. S. D.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	47
Sunday—its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 34.

TOLEDO, OHIO, AUGUST 26, 1871.

WHOLE No. 87.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX 'accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

LECTURE ON THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, LATE VICAR OF HEALAUGH, ENGLAND.

PART I.

This evening I shall endeavor to fulfil the promise made in my Lecture on Rationalism, that I would verify, by illustrations drawn from the Bible itself, all that I have said against the doctrine of its infallibility.

I do not ask for your indulgence so much as for your pity, in having to perform a task which must deprive me more than ever of the esteem of many good men.

At the outset, I must confess that it is an odious and a thankless task to have to show up the faults of a venerable book which has been the fruitful source of blessing and happiness to countless millions of our race, and which is to me, this very day, both dear and precious. The very faults which I have to hold up for your censure are by no means exceptionally bad, when considered in the light of those times in which they occurred. Some of them are common human blemishes, which any of our best men in the 19th century might have fallen into, had they lived and written in those early times. Nay, I am not sure that in every period throughout those 2,000 or 3,000 years supposed to be covered by the Biblical writings, the Bible writers were not always in advance of their own times, and that their views of God and of duty were not at each successive point superior to those which prevailed in other nations around them. Thus what now appears to us as faults were, by comparison, originally great merits, whereby alone the books of the Bible obtained their supremacy over the literature of the world. To illustrate this, let me remind you of the story of Abraham offering up Isaac. We will criticise it from another point of view by and by. At this moment, I ask you to look at it in the light of those times in which Abraham lived. The narrative, at least, assures us that the Patriarch resisted the temptation to offer up his son as a burnt-offering; and in overcoming it, Abraham most surely made a protest against the horrible human sacrifices which prevailed around him, and which he so narrowly escaped imitating. Bad as things seem to be, and really are, in some of the Bible records, it is more than probable they were not nearly so bad as much that went on among the Gentile races which were co-eval with the personages in the Bible histories. Moreover, the Bible contains so much that is true and beautiful, so much that will never perish so long as men aspire to virtue and communion with God, that the whole world would be a loser if its pages were to be closed forever, and its precious words forgotten. In proper hands, and read in a reasonable common sense manner, by persons whose minds are absolutely free from superstitious reverence for it, the Bible may still be, and I hope will ever be, a source of delight and instruction—a text-book of praise and worship, and a treasury of examples of all that good men admire.

My opponents, then, will not accuse me of approaching this subject without due reverence for what is really reverend, or without a becoming tenderness for those pious feelings which have thrown a halo around this venerable book—feelings in which I myself share, and which I should be sorry to lose.

This present work is forced upon us by those who have placed the Bible before us in a false light, who have made claims of Divine origin and authority for the book which the book does not make for itself, and who have foolishly and suicidally affirmed that, if the Bible be not infallibly true from beginning to end, it is of no value at all.

Our opponents are not all agreed in their views of the Bible, but I shall endeavor to answer them all at once. Their leading positions are the following:—

Some Revelationists affirm that the Bible is all true from beginning to end, that "every letter, every word," and so on, has been written under the direct inspiration of God, and is, therefore, of one uniform Divine authority throughout.

This class I shall endeavor to answer by showing that there are absolute and irreconcilable contradictions between one part of the Bible and another part; and that in the Bible there are downright falsehoods. One such instance, of course, would be sufficient to overthrow the position taken by this class. Another class of Bibliolaters affirms that though there may be errors in science, history, chronology, and geography, in the Bible, yet on one point it is absolutely and invariably true, namely, in its religious and moral teaching.

This class will be answered by showing that the religious and moral teaching in the Bible is not uniform nor coherent, but in some places contradictory of itself, and that some of the religious teaching is degrading to God, and some of the so-called moral teaching is degrading to man.

Another class, driven from both of these positions, has finally taken refuge in that part of the Bible which relates the history of Jesus Christ, and they affirm that, although the Bible is full of errors, scientific, historical, etc., and even religious and moral, yet the teachings and life of Jesus were absolutely perfect, without the slightest blemish or defect. This class will be answered by my illustrating, from the Gospels, certain moral blemishes in the character and life of Jesus, and even in parts of his teaching, as reported in the Gospels themselves.

But I beg you to observe, and especially desire any opponents who may be present to observe, that the whole and sole aim of this Lecture is to refute the ideas that the Bible is infallible and that Jesus was no less than the Almighty God. I stand here to-night with this single purpose; I do not come here to make men love the truths of the Bible less than they did before, or to regard with diminished homage the noble life and beautiful teaching of Jesus himself. I attack only the extravagant notions that the Bible is all true, that its moral and religious teachings are infallible, and that Jesus was more than man and free from every human blemish.

My arguments will be addressed to your reason, your consciences, and your hearts. "I speak as unto wise men; judge ye what I say."

First of all, I would warn all the spectators in this contest against the tactics of orthodoxy. They will be told that all these objections to the Bible are old, and have been answered over and over again. To this my reply is, that I have searched in vain for any satisfactory answers to them, and have never found them; my reputation and my future prospects as a teacher of religion are at stake in this evening's work. I offer these as a pledge that I am going to speak honestly of the Bible, and not wilfully to misrepresent any part of it; and also that I am not going to make myself a laughing-stock by bringing forward objections which have really been already satisfactorily answered. Another of the orthodox manoeuvres is not to allow us to take the words of the Bible as they stand, but they insist on altering an ugly passage by the change or withdrawal of a word or two so as to get rid of a difficulty that cannot otherwise be overcome. The school represented by the Rev. F. D. Maurice is eminently skilful in this manipulation of texts. In my opinion, if this be permissible, then any text may be made to give any meaning, and the greatest possible comfort may be drawn from an Athanasian Creed. The attempt to alter and modify passages in the Bible should at once be recognized as an admission that those passages are not God's word, which of course it would be impious to tamper with or attempt to improve.

I may be called very narrow and arbitrary, but I insist upon keeping close to the plain sense of the words in our authorized Bible, which the ministers of religion of all denominations put, without any warning, into the hands of every one who can be got to read it. Revision of translation is no doubt necessary, and, if conducted fairly, would in many instances be unfavorable to orthodoxy. But until we have a new authorized version, we must use the old one.

I will give you the book, the chapter, and the verse for every quotation which I shall make. I cannot render myself "infallible" for the occasion, or else I surely would; but I may safely say, that if a wiser head or a keener eye than my own should discover a blunder or two in my remarks, those few possible blunders will not detract more than a grain from the weight of the crushing evidence which will still remain.

If all my quotations but one could be explained and harmonized satisfactorily, and that one irreconcilable contradiction or moral blemish remained, it would be enough to accomplish my task of refuting the infallibility of the Bible. My work divides itself into the following sections, though here and there they may unavoidably overlap one another:—

- (1.) I shall adduce a few illustrations of contradiction pure and simple.
- (2.) I shall cite passages of Scripture which attribute to God feelings or conduct unworthy of Deity.
- (3.) Passages which directly or indirectly inculcate wrong-doing or bad motives in man.
- (4.) Passages from the Gospels illustrating the human error and infirmity of Jesus, inconsistent with the idea of His being God.

(1.) CONTRADICTIONS, PURE AND SIMPLE.

The first instance which I will notice is the contradiction between the two versions of the Ten Commandments as given in Deuteronomy v. and Exodus xx.

The Fourth Commandment, as given in Deuter. v. 12, 13, 14, runs thus:—

"Keep the Sabbath day to sanctify it, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee. Six days thou shalt labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; thy cattle may rest as well as thou. And remember that wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched-out arm: therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day" (please to notice the reason here given for the observance of the Sabbath day).

Now at the end of the ten commandments here given in Deuteronomy v. (see verse 22) we read:—"These words the Lord spake unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice; and he added no more." And he wrote them in two tables of stone, and delivered them unto me."

Compare this with Exodus xx. In the 1st verse we read:—"God spake all these words, saying." Then follow the Ten Commandments as we read them in Church, and the Fourth Commandment (ver. 8—11) runs thus: "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; Wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it."

Here we find two glaring contradictions—first, a different reason for the ordinance of the Sabbath is given in Exodus to that given in Deuteronomy, and if "God added no more" than those words given in Deuteronomy, he could not have added the reason assigned for the Sabbath as given in Exodus.

Another instance of contradiction is where one and the same act is ascribed in one place to God, in another place to the Devil. In 2 Samuel xxiv. 1, we read, "And again the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go, number Israel and Judah." Ver. 10, "And David said unto the Lord, I have sinned greatly in that I have done."

In Chronicles xxi, 1—7, the same event is thus described, "And Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel . . . And God was displeased with this thing; therefore he smote Israel."

In Genesis xxii. 1, it is written, "God did tempt Abraham." In James i. 13, it is written, "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man."

This is a case in which shuffling is resorted to. Opponents will say the word "tempt" does not mean to tempt, but to "try one's faith;" to which I reply for the present by asking on what authority do you give a totally different sense to the same word in a book written by one and the same Divine Being? If this is God's word, what right have you to say that He does not exactly mean what he has written? We shall come to the temptation of Abraham presently.

1 Samuel, xv. 10, 11. "The Word of the Lord came unto Samuel, saying, It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king." Verse 29 says, "And also the Strength of Israel (God?) will not lie nor repent; for he is not a man, that he should repent."

Exodus xx. 5 (2nd Commandment). "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children." Compare this with Jer. xxxi. 29, 30, "In those days they shall say no more, The fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge. But every one shall die for his own iniquity; every man that eateth the sour grape, his teeth shall be set on edge." And this from Ezekiel xviii. 20, "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son."

Deuteronomy xxiv. 16. "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin."

This was quoted and acted upon. 2 Kings xiv. 6, "The children of the murderers he slew not: according unto that which is written in the book of the law of Moses."

It is the boast of Bible-worshippers that we should have no ground for belief in immortality, were it not for the Bible. I beg to remind them of the following passages, which distinctly teach that there is no life after death:—

Psalms vi. 5. "For in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?" This occurs in a prayer offered up in sickness that the speaker's life may be spared.

Isaiah xxxviii. 18. "The grave cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee: they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth."

Job xiv. 10, 12 and 14. "Man dieth, and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? So man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep. If a man die, shall he live again?"

Eccles. ix. 5, 6. "The dead know not anything, neither have they any more reward. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy is now perished; neither have they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun."

Verse 10. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest."

Eccles. iii. 19. "That which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast."

The inspired Solomon certainly had no faith in immortality. And his words are contradicted both in the Old and New Testaments repeatedly.

The contradictions in the New Testament, where they are not merely verbal, can only be proved by quoting very long passages. But they include the following:—

Luke accounts for the whole time of Jesus' infancy in this way. After his birth in Bethlehem (Luke ii. 22) his parents took him to Jerusalem to perform some religious ceremony in the temple, when he was 40 days old, and then at once departed (Luke ii. 39) into Galilee to their own city, Nazareth, and from there they went every year up to Jerusalem at the feast of the passover (41).

The youth of Jesus was thus accounted for till he was 12 years old.

Now Matthew ii. says that immediately after the birth of Jesus his parents carried him down into Egypt. Moreover, in the three first Gospels it is affirmed that Jesus did not openly and publicly claim to be the Messiah, and that when Peter acknowledged him to be the Messiah (Matt. xvi. 16—20) Jesus "charged his disciples that they should tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ." Whereas the fourth Gospel (John i. 41, John iv. 25, 26) describes Jesus as openly claiming the title of Christ, or Messiah, from the very beginning of his ministry, not only among the Jews, but also among the Samaritans.

It is impossible to get over a contradiction like this. Take again the intentional omission by Matthew, from the genealogy of David's descendants, of no less than four persons, only to make his assertion appear to be true that there were three periods of fourteen generations each.

Moreover, both the genealogies in Matthew and Luke say they trace to Joseph—not to Mary—and yet both the books say that Joseph was not the real father of Jesus; how then could Jesus be descended from David through a man who was not his progenitor at all? The names purposely omitted by Matthew are Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah in one place, and Pedajah in another place. See 1 Chron. iii. 11, 12, and 18.

In the first three Gospels Jesus is represented as going to the wilderness immediately after his baptism, and being there 40 days. In the fourth Gospel he is said to be on the third day at a marriage in Cana of Galilee, and not a word is said about the wilderness or the temptation. If he was not in two places at once, one of the varying accounts must be false.

Again the first three Gospels fix the day of the last supper on the night of the Passover; the fourth Gospel makes it the night before that. To prevent mistake, in John xiii. 29 we find that after the supper Jesus says something to Judas understood to be an order to buy what was necessary for the morrow's celebration. According to this Jesus was crucified on a Thursday, and not on a Friday.

The inscription on the cross, though copied down by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, is different in the different inspired books.

Matthew xxvii. 37. "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews."

Mark xv. 26. "The King of the Jews."

Luke xxiii. 38. "This is the King of the Jews."

John xix. 19. "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews."

1 Cor. xv. 5. Paul says Christ was seen of the 12 apostles after his resurrection, whereas there were only 11, if Judas had hanged himself; and the 12th apostle, Matthias, was not elected until after the ascension.

Human beings might easily fall into such discrepancies in their reports; but God certainly could not have done so.

Then there are all the endless contradictions between Kings and Chronicles, and between the first three and the fourth Gospels; between the several narratives of the Resurrection; between the Acts of the Apostles and Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. It is impossible to enumerate them. In place of this, I beg to refer you to the following admirable books, which deal with these subjects at length.

"The Hebrew Monarchy," by PROFESSOR FRANCIS W. NEWMAN.

"The Creed of Christendom," by W. R. GREG; and a new and very complete work entitled

"The Bible, is it the Word of God?" by T. LUMSDEN STRANGE.

"The Finding of the Book," by JOHN ROBERTSON, of Coupar Angus.

"John or the Apocalypse," by REV. PHILIP DESPREZ, Vicar of Alvediston.

"The English Life of Jesus," published by THOMAS SCOTT, Esq., of Ramsgate.

"The Fourth Gospel," by the REV. J. J. TAYLOR.

PART II.

I come now to the consideration of those passages which attribute to God feelings or conduct unworthy of Deity. It must be observed that very many of these passages will apply equally to the third branch of our subject, namely, to instances in which wrongdoing, or bad motives, are directly or indirectly imputed upon men.

As the chief aim of this inquiry is to correct popular impressions as to the moral character of God, I pass over those passages in which God is described as walking upon earth, talking face to face with men, and even eating and drinking with them—all of which are totally at variance with our modern conceptions of the Divine Being.

In Genesis vi. 5—7, we read, "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man and beast and creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them."

Here is a degrading picture of the Almighty and All-wise God. He is represented as having made a grievous mistake, and being sorry for it. "It grieved him at his heart." He has created a race of men incurably wicked, and there is nothing for it but to destroy them. Not content, however, with destroying the wicked men and women, he must needs destroy the innocent beasts, and creeping things, and the fowls of the air, as though he could not destroy man without destroying all creation as well.

In Gen. viii. 21, after Noah's sacrifice of one of every sort of clean animals, "The Lord smelled a sweet savor; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake." Why? One would expect it was because they were now going to be good—not at all. God goes on to say, "For the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; neither will I smite again any more every thing living, as I have done." The same reason is given for God's sparing men, as was given before for his destroying them; as much as to imply that God had acted on an impulse of savage and indiscriminate rage, which had also proved to be futile, and when he had had time for reflection, or after being appeased by a burnt-offering, he resolved never to do so again.

In Gen. xii. 11—20, we have an account of a deliberate lie told by Abraham, in order—not to protect the honor of his wife—but to save himself from being murdered on her account. I will not read the whole passage, but ver. 17 tells us that God punished—not Abraham for his falsehood—but poor Pharaoh for his being deceived. "The Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sarai, Abram's wife." Pharaoh had taken her on Abram's own statement that Sarai was his sister, and being purely innocent he was yet punished as guilty, while the cowardly and guilty Abram goes free.

In chap. xx., a similar scene is recorded between Abraham and Abimelech, King of Gerar, Sarai being dangerously beautiful at 90 odd years of age (Gen. xvii. 17). In ver. 9, Abimelech asks Abraham in reference to his falsehood, "What have I offended thee, that thou hast brought on me and my kingdom a great sin? Thou hast done deeds unto me that ought not to be done." And yet in ver. 7, God is represented as saying to Abimelech, "Abraham is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee and thou shalt live." And in ver. 17, "So Abraham prayed unto God, and God healed Abimelech, and his wife, and his maid servants."

Any child in a Sunday-school would learn from this passage that God was monstrously unjust, because Abimelech had not even laid his hand upon Sarai, whereas all the wrong done, or intended, was the direct result of Abraham's lie. For the benefit of those who do not know their Bible, it is striking to observe that a similar affair is related also of Isaac and Rebekah, and Abimelech, King of Gerar, in chap. xxvi. of the same book.

We come now to the story of Abraham's sacrifice of his son Isaac (Gen. xxii.). To state it briefly, it was either wrong or right for Abraham to kill and burn his son on an altar as a sacrifice to God. If it was right, why did God stop him from doing it? It was wrong, and God knew it. Then since it was wrong to do this, it was unworthy of God to tempt Abraham to do it; to command him to do it; to keep that wicked purpose harbored in his heart all those three days of silent agony. It was horrible in a Divine Being to suggest so odious a thought as that of child-murder, and that, to satisfy his own craving for human sacrifice. The whole story may be easily and satisfactorily explained by reference to the customs of the time, except that part of it which describes God as tempting Abraham, and commanding him to do a wicked deed.

We pass now to the Book of Exodus. In the Second Commandment (Exodus xx. 5), the reason urged by God against idolatry is that he is a "jealous God," i. e., jealous of the false Gods. This is not a noble trait in any human character, even though it be very natural to man; how much more, then, is it unworthy of God!

If you ask a child who has been trained in a Sunday-school, who are God's favorites among the Bible heroes, he will be sure to mention Abraham and Isaac, ready to sacrifice the virtue of their wives for their own safety; Jacob, the fraudulent and accomplished liar; Lot, a drunkard and worse; David, addicted to bloodshed and lust; and Solomon, a notorious and wholesale profligate. This comes of your indiscriminate Bible teaching.

Exodus iii. 8, the Lord said, "I am come down to deliver them (i. e. the Israelites), out of the hand of the Egyptians (ver. 17), and to bring them into the land of the Canaanites," etc. Ver. 18 says that God ordered Moses to say unto the King of Egypt, "Let us go, we beseech thee, three days' journey into the wilderness, that we may sacrifice unto the Lord our God."

What is this but to teach that the God of all truth did not hesitate to order his prophets to deceive the king in order to secure his purposes?

Verses 21 and 22 of this chapter give God's orders to the Israelitish women to borrow jewels of gold and silver and raiment of the Egyptian women, "And ye shall spoil the Egyptians." This order is repeated in the 11th chapter, verses 2 and 3, where the men are included in the order. Thus God is represented as making them rogues as well as liars. Many times in the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 14th chapters of Exodus, God is described as telling Moses that he would harden Pharaoh's heart and the heart of his servants, so that he should not let the people go. And then it is stated on each occasion but one, "The Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart." The Bible worshippers shall not get out of these obnoxious passages by saying that it was a judicial hardening caused by the sinner himself, for this interpretation is not only flatly contradictory of the words in Exodus, but the Apostle Paul himself cuts off that retreat by adducing this very case of God hardening Pharaoh's heart as an illustration of the doctrines of election and predestination. Rom. ix. 17, 18, "Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up that I might show my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth;" therefore, adds St. Paul, "therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth."

We might well ask the Apostle what sort of a name hath this vile representation of God declared throughout the earth? A name of infamous untrustworthiness and malignity; the name of one who, instead of helping to turn a humble sinner from the error of his ways at the moment of his softening, deliberately stepped in to quench the rising flame of good intention, and to harden his relenting spirit into fresh evil—and all to show his power!

That is not the name of "the Lord God merciful and gracious, abundant in goodness and truth, who will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax."

These early books abound in such misrepresentations of God, but I must press on and miss a great deal, or else we shall never have done.

In the 32nd chapter of Exodus, verses 9—14, God is represented as being on the point of consuming all the people in His fury, but was kept from doing so by an appeal to His vanity.

"And the Lord said unto Moses, I have seen this people, and behold it is a stiff-necked people. Now therefore let me alone, that my wrath may work hot against them, and that I may consume them. And Moses besought the Lord and said, Lord, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt with great power and with a mighty hand? Wherefore should the Egyptians speak and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth? Turn from thy fierce wrath and repent of this evil against thy people. And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people."

In Numbers xiv., verses 11—20, a similar scene occurs in which (ver. 15, 16) Moses says to God, "Now if thou shalt kill all these people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying, Because the Lord was not able to bring this people into the land which he swore unto them, therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness. Pardon them, I beseech thee. . . . And the Lord said, I have pardoned according to thy word." But now just consider what this pardon amounted to. God goes on to say, ver. 21, "But as truly as I live all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." And how was this "glory" to be shown? Verses 22, 23 tell us, "All those men which have seen my glory and my miracles which I did in Egypt and in the wilderness," etc., etc., "surely they shall not see the land which I swore unto their fathers; neither shall any of them that provoked me see it. But my servant Caleb, because he had another spirit with him and hath followed me fully, him will I bring into the land, and his seed shall possess it." So, after all, the children of Israel who came out of Egypt, deluded by promises of the land of Canaan, all perished in the wilderness except two, Caleb and Joshua. God was either unable or unwilling to keep his oath which he swore unto them.

On another occasion, the revolt of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, Moses and Aaron again prevent the destruction of the people, but this time by an appeal to God's sense of justice. Numbers xvi. 20—23, "The Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, separate yourselves from among the congregation, that I may consume them in a moment. And they fell upon their faces and said, O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall one man sin and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?" In spite of this plea 14,700 persons died of a plague, besides the 250 insurrectionists who were swallowed up by an earthquake. The plague would have gone on till the last man was dead, if it had not been for Aaron rushing in with a censer full of incense, which made an atonement for the people, and the plague (ver. 47) was stayed. Can any picture of God be more degrading than these?

In Numbers xxi. ver. 4—6, God is represented as having sent fiery serpents among the people only because they complained that they had neither bread nor water, and they did not enjoy the manna. Then in utter forgetfulness of the 2nd commandment already written by God's finger on tables of stone, God, instead of removing the biting serpents, orders Moses to make a fiery serpent of brass, and set it on a pole that any one who was bitten might look on it and recover.

In Numbers xxii. verses 20, 21, 22, "And God came to Balaam by night, and said unto him, If the men come to call thee, rise up and go with them. And Balaam rose up in the morning and saddled his ass and went with the princes of Moab. And God's anger was kindled because he went." Verses 34, 35, after Balaam's conversation with his ass, he sees the angel of the Lord and says, "Now, therefore, if it displease thee, I will get me back again," and yet the angel of the Lord says unto Balaam in reply to this, "Go thou with the men." A thousand asses speaking with a thousand human voices is not so incredible as this monstrous fickleness and injustice here attributed to God.

At your leisure read the 32nd chapter of Deuteronomy, which abounds in degrading pictures of the Divine character.

In 2 Samuel xxi. 1, we read, "There was a famine in the days of David three years, year after year, and David inquired of the Lord. And the Lord answered, It is for Saul and for his bloody house because he slew the Gibeonites." After seven of Saul's sons had been hung up before the Lord in Gibeah, we read in verse 14, "After that, God was entreated for the land."

2 Sam. xxiv. 1. "The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go, number Israel and Judah." Ver. 15, "So the Lord sent a pestilence which carried off 70,000 men." Ver. 17. David is distressed. He says to God, "Lo, I have sinned and done wickedly; but these sheep, what have they done? let thine hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house."

Here is the creature fairly accusing the Creator of an atrocious act of injustice. As usual, after some burnt-offerings had been made, "the Lord was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed," ver. 25.

1 Sam. vi. 19. The Lord smote 50,070 persons in the little village of Beth-shemesh for peeping into the ark. Those who were left are recorded as saying—possibly in bitter irony—"Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?"

2 Sam. vi. 6, 7. Uzzah ventured to put forth his hand to keep the ark from falling over; but was killed on the spot in reward for his reverent service.

1 Kings xxii. 19—23. Micaiah, the only true prophet out of 401 who persecuted Ahab to go up to Ramoth-gilead, says the following: "I saw the Lord sitting upon his throne, and all the host of heaven (heaven only, mark you) standing on his right hand and on his left. And the Lord said, Who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead? And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner. And there came forth a spirit, and stood before the Lord, and said, I will persuade him. And the Lord said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouths of all his prophets. And he (i. e., God) said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also; go forth, and do so. Now therefore," adds Micaiah, "behold, the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets."

Ezekiel, probably referring to this, says, chap. xiv. 9. "If a prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet, and"—can you believe that I am not reading falsely?—"I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him."

The Apostle Paul, too, says (2 Thess. ii. 11, 12), "For this cause God shall send them strong delusions, that they shall believe a lie: that they all might be damned who believe not the truth." (Father Hyacinthe, in a letter from Rome, dated 22nd June, writes: "God never requires falsehood, but falsehood often has need of God; and it is never so effective as when it presents itself to us in His name."—London Times, 29th June).

My friends, is it not incredible that such teachings as this should be believed to be the very Word of God—the inspired revelation of his mind and will? Surely Atheism is better than this. With what pretence of justice were Ananias and Sapphira slain for lying unto God, when God is represented as lying unto men? I defy the bibliolaters to get over such difficulties as these extracts present. No explanation will avail them but that only which carries the inevitable conclusion that God is represented in parts of the Bible as an immoral being, and not "righteous in all his ways," or "holy in all his works;" that He does not "love truth and equity," and that He is neither just, nor true nor trustworthy. I will only say, further, on this point, that I have had to miss many and many an illustration because it is impossible to give them all.

[To be concluded next week.]

PROGRESS OF SCIENCE.

[By W. P. T., in the National Standard.]

Among the prominent associations in the interest of science, whose proceedings are looked forward to by the thoughtful and cultured of both hemispheres with increased interest, may justly be mentioned the British Association for the Advancement of Science. At its recent annual meeting at Edinburgh, for the very interesting detailed account of which we are indebted to the pen of Mr. Smalley, of the N. Y. Tribune, the proceedings were of a varied and exceedingly interesting character. At the opening of its deliberations, Prof. Huxley, long the honored President of the Association, resigned the chair to Sir William Thomson, paying, in a brief address, a graceful tribute to his successor as an important contributor to many departments of science, and worthy in every way of the confidence reposed in him by the Association.

The President elect then took the chair, and proceeded to deliver the inaugural address, in which he ably reviewed the work done by the Association in past years; and dwelt upon the achievements of its prominent members,—of Adams's great labor, "A recalculation of the harmonic analysis for the altered state of terrestrial magnetism;" of the self-sacrificing toil of Sir Edward and Lady Sabine engaged in perfecting their "magnetic chart of the world, to be, when completed, the key which must powerfully conduce to the ultimate opening up of one of the most refractory enigmas of cosmical physics, the cause of terrestrial magnetism;" of the fundamental electric discoveries of Faraday, etc. Passing to the subject of spontaneous generation, Sir William said that "careful scrutiny has, in every case up to the present day, discovered life as antecedent to life. Dead matter cannot become living without coming under the influence of matter previously alive. This seems as sure a teaching of science as the law of gravitation. I am ready to adopt, as an article of scientific faith, true through all space and through all time, that life proceeds from life and nothing but life." The address, which was listened to with the closest attention, closed with the acknowledgment of the overpoweringly strong proofs of the intelligent and benevolent design of the universe, and the dependence of all "living beings on one ever-acting Creator and Ruler."

At this annual meeting of the Association there were present, in addition to those named, Herbert Spencer and the most illustrious men of letters and philosophic thought in the United Kingdom, each adding, by some individual labor or research of the year, to the solid stock of scientific attainment.

As these details come to us, in our own country an association of a similar character is assembling at Indianapolis, at which nearly all of our most eminent men of science will be in attendance. Younger by so many years than its trans-Atlantic compeer, the brief period of association in the interest of American science must plead apology for any unfavorable comparison; though, with the activity in every circle of thought, we doubt not that the day is not far distant when upon European lips, the members of the British and kindred Associations, the reports and achievements of American scientific societies will be as thoroughly respected as though emanating from their own halls, and be as warmly welcomed to the general fund of knowledge.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"We have read your INDEX from the start, and wish it were possible to express in words our admiration for its boldness and fidelity in taking a step so unpopular. Personally, I think the paper more nearly expresses my present thoughts than any publication in the country, not excepting the Radical, which I have read for years with great profit. I desire to express great satisfaction in reading your discourses setting forth the warmth of Free Religion. They will meet a need long felt among free thinkers, a need that it seemed hard to satisfy, one I could not fully answer for myself. They were loaned to a lady friend who, with so many, had been wanting, longing, suffering for something warm to grasp in the new faith before they relinquished their hold of the ancient. Could you see those copies, chafed and worn to rags through wide-spread circulation and reading, you might know their work in this locality. Many persons, you know, will secretly read that which they could not be persuaded to tolerate publicly. Still I think you will have additions to your subscription list from that quarter. I regard Mr. Frothingham as among the finest, purest thinkers of our time. Have loaned his "Farewells of Jesus" to an orthodox young lady, one who thinks but who has always been surrounded by ecclesiastical influences.

The good work must go on. This idol worship, of Jesus as well as others, must be broken up. Ten years ago I became disgusted,—yes, that's what I mean!—with the everlasting talk, adoration, worship, &c., &c., of Jesus Christ. You place him in humanity just where I conceive he belongs. A noble, glorious life he lived. He wrought out his own salvation. He helps us by example. All this is true and beautiful; but we say something is due to other men who have lived equally good and noble lives, many of whom were tried longer and under circumstances unknown in the life of Jesus. I sometimes question how he would have proved under prosperity. Some men are splendid in adversity who could not stand before success."

—"In renewing my subscription to THE INDEX, it is only to aid with my mite the effort to spread a more liberal and enlightened religious thought. I have more reading matter than my time allows a perusal of; but that the able minds controlling THE INDEX may feel that the thinking people are with them, I hope all such will do what they can to encourage them. The world's history abounds in human wrong, but no species of wrong is more monstrous and disgusting than that perpetrated in the name of God and religion."

—"You are hereby authorized to subscribe in my name for one share of the capital stock of The Index Association upon the same terms and conditions as the original signers. I regret that I do not feel able at present to take more, but this acknowledgement at least is due towards the support of a paper which speaks so forcibly to the best sympathies of the heart and the highest intuitions of the reason and understanding. Hoping that you may have abundant success in this new phase of your enterprise, I remain, &c."

—"THE INDEX for last week did not come to hand. It may be the next number will explain; but I thought it would do no harm to advise you of my loss. You may 'stop my grog,' but don't stop my INDEX!"

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be suspended during the months of July and August. Special notice will be given of any occasional meetings that may be held.

RECEIVED.

PROCEEDINGS AT THE FOURTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, held in Boston, July 1 and 2, 1871. Boston: Press of JOHN WILSON AND SON. 1871. pp. 88.

POLYGAMY: ITS SOLUTION IN UTAH—A QUESTION OF THE HOUR. An Address delivered in Liberal Institute, Sunday, July 30, 1871, by WILLIAM S. GODBE. Printed at the Office of the SALT LAKE TRIBUNE. 1871. pp. 16.

THE ANTI-DRAMSHOP PARTY. [A Letter by GERBET SMITH.]

THE TRUE FOUNDATION. A Lecture given at the Chapel on the Hill, Malden, Sept. 18, 1870, by J. WESLEY DODGE. Boston: Published by the Author, and for sale by WILLIAM WHITE AND COMPANY, 158 Washington St. Price 10 cents. pp. 24.

SPIRITUALISM A TEST OF CHRISTIANITY, or, The True Believer and his Work. A Lecture by D. W. HULL, delivered in Huntsman Hall, Laporte, Ind., June 25, 1871. Baltimore: Published by the Cosmopolitan Publishing Co., 106 West Baltimore St. 1871. pp. 29.

SPEECH OF VICTORIA C. WOODHULL on the Great Political Issue of Constitutional Equality, delivered in Lincoln Hall, Washington, etc., together with her Secession Speech, delivered in Apollo Hall, May 12, 1871. New York: WOODHULL, CLAF-LIN & Co., 44 Broad St. 1871. pp. 33.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD for September, 1871. New York: THE CATHOLIC PUBLICATION HOUSE, 9 Warren St.

Poetry,

THE DIFFERENCE.

[For THE INDEX.]

They call upon Thee, Infinite!
They name Thee "Three in One,"
And deem by Pagan mystery
Salvation shall be won;
How poor in human charity,
Is Christian duty done!

They worship on the bended knee
Before the Great White Throne,
And give to hungering souls in need,
For life-bread, but a stone;
Oh when shall human Idols be
By Truth's might overthrown?

They call upon Thee, Infinite,
The Only God of Love,—
Enfranchised souls that claim the light,
The Truth-rays from above;
On Freedom's mandate earthward speeds
The olive-bearing dove.

No blood of sacrifice demands
The Father of the soul,
Nor that as price of human joy
A funeral bell should toll;
Religion "pure and undefiled"
Is God's benign control.

CAMDEN, Maine, Aug. 10, 1871. CORA WILBURN.

The Index.

AUGUST 26, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

For Special Notices see eighth page.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed; and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten	" 1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	" 1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	" 1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	" 1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	" 300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	" 300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	" 300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	" 300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	" 500
J. G. HOLZWARTH,	"	"	One	" 100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	" 100
C. AUCARD,	"	"	"	" 100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	" 3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	" 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Three	" 300
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	One	" 100
"	Defiance,	"	"	" 100
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	" 100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	" 100
J. SEDGEBER,	Painesville,	O.,	"	" 100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	" 300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	" 500
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	" 100
J. L. WHITING,	Boston,	"	"	" 100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	" 100
J. E. SUTTON,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	" 100
S. I. DURKEE,	"	"	"	" 100
S. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	" 100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	" 1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	" 200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	" 200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	" 200
"	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
FRANK PRATHER,	Wellsville,	Kan.,	One	" 100
E. F. DINSMORE,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	" 200
J. T. DICKINSON,	Middlefield,	Ct.,	Fourteen,	" 1,400
W. J. POTTER,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three,	" 300
G. C. GLATTE,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	" 300
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	" 100
MISS E. EMERSON,	"	"	"	" 100
W. C. GANNETT,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	" 300
MISS M. C. PERKINS,	"	"	One	" 100
W. H. DOWNES,	Birmingham,	Ct.,	"	" 100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing,	Mich.,	"	" 100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	" 100
W. C. RUSSEL,	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	" 100
WM. CLARKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Three	" 300
C. L. SMITH,	"	"	One	" 100
				$23,500

"Believing ignorance is much better than rash and presumptuous knowledge." So taught an old Scotch Presbyterian minister. So teaches the church today. As if knowledge could be rash and presumptuous, or as if ignorance could believe anything but dangerous folly!

STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING.

According to legally advertised notice, a meeting of the stockholders of the Index Association was held at 90 St. Clair St., Toledo, on Thursday evening, Aug. 17. The meeting was organized by the election of Mr. Guido Marx as Chairman, and Mr. P. H. Bateson as Secretary, a majority of the shares taken being represented. The following gentlemen were elected Directors—A. K. Butts, S. L. Hill, J. T. Dickinson, T. W. Higginson, F. E. Abbot, P. H. Bateson, A. E. Macomber, C. Cone, E. Bissell. A meeting of the Directors was appointed for Tuesday, Aug. 29, at 4 P. M. Adjourned.

THE REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

There is a wide-spread and just antipathy to Mutual Admiration Societies. Nothing can be more offensive than for people to club together for the purpose of crooning flatteries into each other's ears,—one burning incense under another's nose in hope of sniffing in return the same delicious fragrance a little intensified. Such displays deservedly excite derision among persons of good sense; and the apprehension of falling into folly of this sort may well operate to make men weigh carefully their words of praise in the case of personal friends.

But we must run the risk of suspicion of "mutual admirationism" in speaking of this Report. The brain and character implied by such addresses as these may well make any one proud of such associates. The time will assuredly come when thoughts like these will be appreciated at their true value. This we say without intending to "endorse" them, for in each address we have found something to dissent from. But the hard, strong, patient thinking, the wide and rich culture, the intellectual honesty and moral courage, that have arrested our attention as we read, we cannot regard as projected upon the pages by any subjective illusions of personal sympathy. These qualities are there, to be recognized by all who have eyes to see.

The paper by Mr. Weiss on "Religion and Science" (advance sheets of which were kindly forwarded to us by the author) is the ablest he has ever published, so far as our knowledge extends. It takes up the "controversy that now prevails between the two parties of Natural Evolution of Forces and Natural Development of Divine Ideas," and handles it in the largest and fairest spirit. The antithesis suggested is not perhaps here couched in the happiest terms, for we, at least, believe both in the "Natural Evolution of Forces" and the "Natural Development of Divine Ideas"—the latter in and through the former; and we are thus at a loss to discover to which "party" we belong. Nor is our perplexity wholly removed as we follow Mr. Weiss's cogent and subtle thought. We see no alternative but to accept to the full the results of physical science so far as they are affirmative, and we only enter our protest when physicists more rash than philosophical venture on negations which outrun their own premises. This also is the spirit of Mr. Weiss himself; and there could not be a franker or fuller confidence than his in the determinate conclusions of physical science. His essay is especially valuable for the strong emphasis it lays on what physical science can never disprove and should not be expected to prove, while his speculations on "latent mind" are very ingenious and interesting, and show a surprising reach of what, in imitation of Prof. Tyndall, we might call the "philosophic imagination."

Mr. Potter's essay on the "Natural Genesis of Christianity and its Relation to Preceding Religions" strikes us as, on the whole, the best and most comprehensive treatment of the subject within our knowledge. The only point of importance on which we should be disposed to supplement his sketch would be that of the relation of the Christ-idea to the various elements absorbed from other religions. Not merely, in our opinion, is this idea "one of the most central principles" of Christianity, but, as we should say, it is its one central principle. To the philosophic student of Christianity there can be, we think, no richer field of thought than the wonderful organic power manifested by this idea of sucking up all other religious ideas into itself, and of making them contribute to its own growth. Mr. Potter by no means overlooks this; but he lays a little less stress upon it than we think it demands, and regards what we have called the "universal element" of Christianity as less dependent for its historical efficiency upon its "special element" than we do. This, however, is mainly a question of proportion in treating the general subject; and we cannot express too strongly our appreciation of the wide mental survey and deep insight exhibited in this address. Mr. Potter is never heated or harsh. His tone is always contemplative, judicial, and measured. Never was character more faithfully mirrored in style. Never will he, like the most of us, have to regret a phrase too highly colored or a sarcasm too keenly edged.

Mr. Frothingham's address on "Superstition and Dogmatism" is less speculative than practical. It points out real dangers with a sincerity and directness all the more noticeable because of its finish and elegance. It does not shoot at random, but takes deliberate aim, and hits every time. No wonder there is winning. Will our Spiritualist friends take a word of advice from one who is in no degree unfriendly to them? It is this. Instead of feeling sore or sensitive at what we must in candor say we believe to be very homely truths, we counsel them to guard themselves against the great peril of superstition here pointed out, and, if they expect the sympathy of clear-eyed men and women, to beware of defending what is absolutely indefensible. A vast crop of most pernicious superstitions is springing up about the simple doctrine of spirit-intercourse, which, if it be the wheat of truth, runs great risk of being choked by the weeds of error. No one can accuse THE INDEX of being unfair to Spiritualism; some very good friends even suspect it unjustly of seeking to propitiate Spiritualists by a politic forbearance. But we are only willing that every tub should stand on its own bottom; and while we cordially sympathize with all liberals, thousands of whom are to be found among Spiritualists, we want it understood that we have not a particle of sympathy with sectarian Spiritualists, of whom there are also thousands, or with any Spiritualists who would shield frauds or follies from merited condemnation. It would be bigotry to deny what is beyond our knowledge, and we therefore do not deny the doctrine of spirit-intercourse; but we mean to share whatever odium is visited upon Mr. Frothingham for honestly denouncing the numerous superstitions which have sprung up about it. Every liberal and rational Spiritualist should be anxious to get rid of these, and feel no sort of offence because Mr. Frothingham has faithfully pointed them out. Such brave, blunt dealing hurts no truth; it is error only that is vulnerable.

We have no room left to speak of the other addresses in this Report. But we have been thrilled with many a bold, true word in them, and feel now an increased regret that we could not have been present to hear. Especially do we feel sorry that the letters of Isaac M. Wise, Gerrit Smith, and William Lloyd Garrison, referred to on page fifty of the pamphlet, were not printed in an Appendix. These are men whose words every liberal ought to hear. Perhaps the letters may yet in some appropriate way be given to the public—if in no better way, in THE INDEX.

Will not the friends of the best and most earnest religious thought of the times send their thirty-five cents to Mr. Potter for the Report and thus help the Free Religious Association in its noble work? Surely it is not much to give; and the day will come when these early Reports will command a far higher price—if money is indeed the “price” of ideas.

Mr. Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit, who has been widely known for years as a popular lecturer on various subjects throughout the West, informs us that he shall re-enter the lecture field in September, devoting his “main efforts against superstition, or rather to bring people up above the possibility of superstition or bigotry into the realm of the discovery and application of truth for truth’s sake, and the wise-conduct of life in the light of freedom, progress, love, and wisdom.” Among his subjects will be the following:—

“The Old and the New Religion.”

“The Primal Gospel, or the Truths of the Soul.”

“Nature’s Gospel of Reform and Progress.”

“The Immortal Life.”

“Spiritual Realities and Experiences.”

“Scientific Education in Schools and Colleges.”

“Woman’s Era.”

“Diversified Industry and Civilization.”

Mr. Stebbins is authorized to receive subscriptions for THE INDEX in all places he may visit; and he desires us to say that he “can be addressed at Detroit, Mich., by Liberal Societies, by Spiritualists, and Lyceums.”

In the leading article of the Catholic World for August occurs the following significant sentence:—“With sceptics we wish to have nothing to do, for they are not entitled to be treated as rational beings.” We would inform the editor of the Catholic World that he will have much to do with sceptics, before he succeeds in making the “Secular Not Supreme.”

If an enemy threatens to do you an injury, appeal to his “inner man.” If a mastiff threatens to bite you, appeal to his “inner dog.”

The thoroughly free man equally detests ruling and being ruled. It is the slave who makes the worst tyrant.

A GREAT POINT GAINED.

It will be a great point gained, when theologians generally shall discard the use of reason and shall admit that their views must be sustained by some other means. Rev. Dr. Bodwell, of Hartford Theological Seminary, is clear-sighted enough to accept this position, in a recent address before a college theological society, reported in the N. Y. Times. He proceeds as follows (the italics not being his):—

“It is generally considered that to answer rationalistic arguments requires great dialectic power and long training. This is not so; though infidels have been philosophers, infidelity has ever been unphilosophical. The arguments of its greatest thinkers are superficial. Indeed, it is better not to attempt to answer them logically, not that this cannot be done successfully, but that it is not expedient. Reason in theology is most unreasonable; it starts with a lie—that reason is supreme in higher matters as in lower, and the inevitable result is, that Christianity is determined to be false. Faith should be supreme, and guide reason, which, left to itself, leads to darkness, because blinded by sin.”

This is of a piece with the instructions of a Boston clergyman to his Sunday-school teachers, as reported in the Boston Journal, to the effect that they were not expected to investigate theological questions for themselves, but must take them upon trust. True, there is not a superstition on the face of the earth which could not be defended by just such arguments. But it certainly simplifies matters, and saves a deal of trouble. It renders it unnecessary for anybody but the clergy to think at all; and when that is once settled, the clergy can stop thinking also. This process has already been pretty thoroughly carried out in the Roman Catholic Church, and with the steadily lowering standard of education in our Protestant clergy—and the efficient aid of Dr. Bodwell—there will soon be little to choose between the two.

The fatal defect of this kind of reasoning has been often pointed out. The final argument against an infallible book is precisely the same as that against an infallible Church. It is that the stream cannot rise higher than the source. The building cannot be securer than its foundations. You cannot set up an authority to supersede conscience and reason, for it is only by conscience and reason that you can select, recognize, or interpret your authority. No Jesuit ever reasoned in a circle more thoroughly than Dr. Bodwell, or laid down a doctrine more sure to drive from him the strongest and noblest young men.

It is not strange that under such teachings, by admission of all, the established religion is losing its hold upon thinking minds. Henry Ward Beecher says:—

“The educated men of Europe are almost all of them going through science into unbelief. I think it may be said that the general tendency of the educated brain of Europe is not towards religion—not even natural religion; nor towards the instinct or sentiment of worship—not even natural worship, vague as that is; but that it is towards material thought and material science.”

The Westminster Review notices the same tendency.

“Already,” it says, “character and influence and sympathy with mankind mark those who stand aloof from Christianity. The best heads and the best hearts are gone. The ablest and the sincerest feel their faith giving way. The newspaper, the review, the tale by every fireside are written almost exclusively by men who have long since ceased to believe; so also is the school book, the text book, the manuals for the study of youth and manhood, and the whole mental aliment of the day. The mother’s words fall coldly on the ear of the son; the prayers of the wife are unmeaning to the husband; and the gray hairs of the preacher scarcely save him from contempt.”

Only the error made by both these witnesses is in calling that “unbelief” which is simply a profound belief in the laws of the universe and a contempt for the superstition which treats those laws as something common or unclean. It is a great point gained when reason and superstition are clearly set apart from each other, and a theological professor admits that his creed has no chance except where reason is dethroned. If Dr. Bodwell can once make it clear to his classes that “Christianity is determined to be false” so soon as reason is made the test, he will soon discover that there are other paths to “unbelief” beside the path of science.

T. W. H.

THE DEFINITION OF RELIGION.

No definition of religion has probably ever been given that would satisfy everybody. The etymologists have not even agreed upon the derivation of the word. Yet leaving aside the differences that separate from each other the specific systems of religion, and leaving aside also the theological differences that separate the sects of the same religion, though these differences may be held to be, and may really be, of great importance, we may find, perhaps, that there is general agreement on this one essential central point of religion,—namely, that it is a recognition of the relation between human conduct and some law beyond human creation that has a right to govern human conduct. There may be great variety of belief as to the exact nature and details of this relation, great variety of speculative opinion with regard to the source of the law, and great variety of idea concerning the practical methods of expressing the sense of obligation to it: and there may mingle both with the speculative beliefs and the practical methods very much that is untrue, crude, superstitious, gross, hypocritical even. But when we get through all these wrappings, true or false or artificial, to the vital kernel of religion itself, we shall find that every attempt either to define the word or to practise the thing must, to be successful, somehow cover the point where the human will confesses allegiance to a law which is beyond and above itself; which some would call divine law, while others might prefer to call it the law of nature,—both parties meaning, however, essentially the same thing; that is, a law superior to the human will with recognized right to direct it.

So, too, though the etymologists have not agreed as to the primitive derivation and meaning of the word religion, it seems probable that their differences may be reconciled at last in substantially the same root-conception, if not in the same root-syllable. Take the two derivations that are usually given,—that of Cicero from the Latin relegere, to re-collect, to bring together again, to go over a second time, to re-read; and that of Lactantius from the Latin religare, to bind back, to fasten firmly together, to hold by something fixed. Though at first sight these seem very different, yet they suggest, on reflection, a similar root-idea, and an idea which in some shape is the vital germ of all religious experience; the idea, namely, that there comes to man a time in the natural development of his life when he discovers that he does not exist of and for himself; when he becomes conscious of an obligation to serve another law and purpose than the blind physical instinct or unreasoning inclination that may thus far have controlled him; when he awakes to a sense of duty, and perceives that his thoughts and acts have relations to the whole universe, and are so bound to a certain universal, immutable standard of truth and right that he must of necessity continually compare what he feels and thinks and does with his idea of what, according to this standard, he ought to feel and think and do. We might, indeed, very well define religion as man's second thought concerning himself; or as the re-reading of his own nature. It is the voluntary collecting of his faculties and powers, which have been at work aimlessly, perhaps wastefully, and the putting of them to work with forethought of their proper use and destiny. It is the awakening of human nature to perceive the normal law of its own action. It is natural impulse regulated and governed; natural affection purified from all corrupting limitations of merely selfish gratification to serve some chaste universal purpose; natural desire and aspiration made subservient to intelligence, to reason, to right, to love, to human welfare. It is human nature become conscious of its obligations to a law which has its source beyond and back of itself, and voluntarily giving its allegiance, binding itself back, to that primeval, immutable, eternal law of all intelligent existence.

Whichever derivation, therefore, we may choose, we seem to come substantially to the same root-idea,—that religion is the awakening of human nature to a new reading of its capacities, to a new adjustment of its functions in accordance with the high purposes and possibilities which this new reading has brought to light. We spend our earliest years as instinct or childish inclination or circumstances may dictate, with little or no thought of any obligation upon us to perform any act to which we are not prompted by some momentary impulse of self-gratification. And this is the natural and perfectly legitimate condition of infancy and early youth. But just as naturally there comes a day—when we have to reflect whence and wherefore these faculties and powers were given us. We see that they are not our own, to do with them whatever the whim or fancy of the hour may suggest, but that we possess them for some purpose that reaches far beyond ourselves, and that they are all to be brought under the control of the law that is involved in this higher intelligence concerning them. We see that we ourselves are but ministers and agents of this universal law, and we discover that our noblest satisfactions henceforth are in following the commands which it lays upon us rather than in any gratifications which begin and end in self alone. Our faculties are transfigured to us by the light of this new revelation of their meaning. Within and above the blind force of instinct which has hitherto impelled them to their uses, we now recognize an intelligent aim which rightfully imposes the law and method of their service. And the recognition of this power within us, and of its claim to direct our lives, is the dawning of the religious consciousness in man. Usually it is referred back for its origin to the will of a Supreme Being. But whether there be belief in the existence of such a Being or not, every person of mental and moral sanity recognizes allegiance to a higher law than that which inheres in the human will; to a law of truth and right, of which reason and conscience are the human representatives. And is not this recognition of a higher law, springing from some source beyond ourselves, the one central fact that goes with all theological beliefs and is common to all religions?

W. J. P.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The universal eulogy on the late Mr. May of Syracuse leads almost to the fear that he may suffer at the hand of one Scripture warning, namely: "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you." No one in life was more just, humane, and faithful, in every calling, in every duty in every direction. And yet he disarmed all enmity, all censure, all criticism. Above all reproach in his lifetime, no wonder that at his departure everybody everywhere offer incense to his memory.

I can relate a little story of his generous liberality towards the apostles of new truth, which may not be without interest to the readers of THE INDEX.

When Theodore Parker preached his memorable sermon at the ordination of Mr. Shackford at South Boston, which waked the thunders of almost the whole Unitarian pulpit against him, and was the beginning of the end of his connection with the denomination, Mr. May was the settled minister of Scituate, Mass. The sermon was printed, and with a copy of it in my valise I called, in my regular round of anti-slavery lecturing, on Mr. May. He and Mrs. May had other company, but insisted on my remaining during the afternoon and till lecture time. In course of conversation, the new heresy and its author came up, and I asked if any one present had seen the sermon. None had, and so I produced it. Mr. May proposed that I read it. He and others declining, I did so. I had read it as I drove along in my carriage, and had marked some passages as of peculiar significance, and so endeavored to give them what emphasis I could in this second but wholly unexpected reading, and to audience so worthy. The company heard me in silence to the last word.

After a pause, Mr. May said—"O, is not that a beautiful sermon?" To which all assented in general terms; but some present took exception to some passages. Mr. May, however, defended the discourse in the main, praised the ability and extolled the heroism of its author, at the same time murmuring the fear that, as a recognized Unitarian minister, he had sealed his doom.

To Mr. May and to others of us present, the discourse was prophetic, and to whom has it not since so proved? And how many Unitarian ministers are there now, young or old, who would not feel proud to have been its author?

Mr. May's conduct towards Mr. Parker ever after, while he preached in Boston and while he lived, proved how sincere, earnest, manly, and brotherly, not to say Christian, was his regard for him and his work. The "Free Religionists" may equal Mr. May in generous magnanimity and liberality towards others of different modes of belief, or unbelief, but cannot, need not, surpass him.

My last Sundays were spent in Lowell, Mass., and Malden. The days were intensely hot and all who could had scampered down to the sea-side for breath and being. Still I had creditable audiences in both places, both day and evening.

In Malden, a generous and religiously liberal man, Mr. J. Wesley Dodge, had at his own expense erected a convenient hall, literally "founded on a rock," and on a hill, too, where it "cannot be hid," and dedicated it to freedom of thought, speech, and discussion. It is named "the Chapel on the Hill."

Mr. Dodge delivered the dedication discourse himself, a copy of which I will send to THE INDEX.

In Lowell, freedom of thought and speech is drowned in the endless din of loom and spindle, and (more fatal still) every mortal thing seems belted up to the great Corporation Wheel. The union of Church and the Cottonocracy seems complete. And every exertion appears to have been made to render expulsion from church or factory alike fatal to the future of the victim.

P. P.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

TO THE READERS OF THE INDEX.

I herewith appeal to the generous hearts of the friends of free thought, having been allowed the privilege by the kindness of my friend, Mr. F. E. Abbot. A middle-aged woman, in feeble health, and without one kindred tie in this world, I am compelled by the urgent force of circumstances to make this public appeal to your sympathies. Dependent upon my pen for a livelihood, my failing health has unfitted me for making such efforts as would obtain for me what I now ask at your hands,—the needed pecuniary help, that shall obtain for me the shelter of a home.

I belong to the Progressive Jewish faith, and am therefore in heartfelt sympathy with those who labor for the Truth and the overthrow of superstition. My conscience will not permit me to deny that which I believe; consequently I am outside of the pale of Christian sympathies, and must apply to those who think and feel as I do.

My co-religionists of the Reform Temple Emanuel, in New York City, have most generously contributed the sum of Two Hundred and Forty dollars towards the purpose of buying me a home. For Two Hundred and Fifty more I can obtain a cosy, comfortable cottage, a shelter for my declining years. I respectfully refer you to Mr. Emanuel Arnold, No. 1942, Mervine street, Philadelphia, who with his family has known me for twenty years, and to Mr. M. Ellinger, Editor of the Jewish Times, No. 7 Murray street, New York, that you may be assured you are not called upon to assist one morally unworthy. In the strong hope that I shall have a response from the benevolent hearts who "feel for another's woe," I will state, not in self-laudation, but with the simple earnestness of truth, that I have suffered poverty, humiliation, sorrow and loneliness, rather than become a recreant to the truths I believe in.

Will you who are blest with abundance, who rest in the peace and security of home, whose robust health and strength render life doubly beautiful, reach out to me the timely, helping hand? Will you help to a resting-place the weary feet and aching heart of one for many years a wanderer, a woman reared in affluence, who asks you for relief from the galling chains of poverty, the wretchedness of a homeless life?

Hoping soon to have your generous response, I am yours for Truth and righteous Freedom.

MISS CORA WILBURN,
Address P. O. Box 215, CAMDEN, MAINE. (Please write the name of the State in full.)

[Although not personally acquainted with Miss Wilburn, we have every reason to believe that the above appeal is entitled to the kindest consideration of all those who have the means of beneficence at command. In justice to her, we ought to state that Miss Wilburn has shown a most honorable reluctance to make her case known in this public manner, and has only done so in compliance with our repeated request, as we had no other way of helping one whom we believe most worthy to be helped. A number of small contributions will be just as useful as a few large ones; and we hope that many such will gladden the heart of this modest petitioner. In accordance with her wish, they will be acknowledged through THE INDEX. A poem by Miss Wilburn will be found on our fourth page.—ED.]

CHRISTIAN DEMONOLOGY.

MADISON, GA., July 29, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—In the different articles which have appeared in THE INDEX from your pen, occasionally alluding to the existence of God, and intimating that probably Science may ultimately verify his existence, I don't recollect that you have said what will be the fate of the Devil. If I understand their position, the Christians have as lively a faith in the existence of the Devil as they have in the reality of God. They have simply incorporated into their system the doctrine of Zoroaster, that God and the Devil rule the world. Could the Christian system continue if Science should fail to sustain the probable existence of the Devil?

While upon this subject, allow me to ask you, where does the truth lie in reference to the words God, or Deity and Devil, in their radical sense being nearly synonymous terms?

Mr. D. W. Hull, in the last Crucible, says:—"The words Dæmon, Devil, Deity, Divine, &c., all find their grand root in the word De."

Robert Taylor, in his Lectures, of whose scholarship you have doubts, contends that the terms for God and Devil are much more nearly allied than Christians are willing to admit.

My experience is that Christians have no more sympathy for a man who doubts the existence of the Devil than for an Atheist. I am a physician, and have had people tell me they would not take medicine from me because I did not believe in a Devil. So I should like to know what we may expect from Science in establishing his black Majesty?

Yours, &c.,

A. A. B.

[Theodore Parker used to call the Devil the "Fourth Person in the Trinity"—a sarcasm not undeserved by the Calvinistic theology, which delivers over to perdition the vast majority of the human race. Whether Science will ever prove God or not, is a question on which men differ; but it takes Nescience to prove the Devil.

The word dæmon is probably derived from the Greek verb daio, signifying "to divide or distribute destinies."

The word devil is from the Greek verb diaballo, signifying "to slander, deceive, impose upon."

The words deity and divine are derived from the Latin deus, "a god." But this and the kindred Greek word theos are both derived from the Sanskrit deva, meaning "bright"; and deva is itself derived from dyaus, the Sanskrit word for "sky." In the Hindu Vedas, the gods are called devas. But in the Persian Zend-Avesta the Vedic gods are degraded in order to make room for the Zoroastrian divinities, and their name deva becomes daeva, "evil spirit." Thus the Hindu's god became the Persian's devil.

The word God has no etymological connection with the preceding. According to Bosworth, the words God and good are identical in Anglo-Saxon; but Grimm holds that the two are of independent origin.—Ed.]

OPINIONS OF SOME NOTED FREE-THINKERS.

[In reply to a question among "Voices from the People," in THE INDEX, No. 83.]

While at Salem, Mass., in the winter of his twenty-sixth year and just before going to West Roxbury to settle as preacher, Theodore Parker wrote (Life and Correspondence, p. 95):—

"Jesus, there is no dearer name than thine,
Which Time has blazoned on his mighty scroll;
No wreaths or garlands ever did entwine
So fair a temple of so vast a soul.
There every virtue sets his triumph seal;
Wisdom conjoined with strength and radiant grace,
In a sweet copy Heaven to reveal,
And stamp perfection on a mortal face;
Once on the earth wert Thou before men's eyes,
That did not half thy beauteous brightness see;
E'en as the emmet does not read the skies,
Nor our weak orbs look through immensity."

Later he added this closing couplet:—

"Once on the earth wert thou a living Shrine Wherein conjoining dwelt the Good, the Lovely, the Divine."

He was very modest in regard to his poetical efforts; and hence, when one was thrown into the body of a discourse or lecture, he quotes himself. He says to Miss Margaret Fuller, when he was thirty-one years of age:—

"Herewith I send you a couple of little bits of verse, which I confess to you, sub rosa rosiissima, are mine. Now I don't think myself made for a poet. . . . So if you throw the lines under the grate in your critical wisdom, I shall not be grieved, vexed or ruffled."

But in regard to the sentiment, which is of more importance than the poetical merit, I would say that Mr. Parker always thought Jesus of Nazareth "a Man of the highest type."

"Blessed be God," he says, "that so much manliness has been lived out and stands there yet, a lasting monument to mark how high the tides of divine life have risen in the world."

Here was the greatest soul of all the sons of men; a man of genius for religion; one before whom the majestic mind of Grecian sages and Hebrew seers must veil its face. But eighteen centuries have passed since the tide of humanity rose so high in Jesus; what man, what sect, what church has mastered his noblest thought—comprehended his method and fully applied it to life? Let the world answer in its cry of anguish. Discourse of Religion, pp. 286-287.

It may be well to compare his view with those of other great thinkers.

First Benjamin Franklin:—"As to Jesus of Nazareth, my opinion of whom you particularly desire, I think the system of morals and his religion as he left them to us the best the world ever saw or is like to see." (Letter to Ezra Stiles, Pres. Yale College.)

Thomas Jefferson:—"His character and doctrines have received still greater injury from those who pretend to be his spiritual disciples and who have disfigured and sophisticated his actions and precepts from views of personal interest, so as to induce the unthinking part of mankind to throw off the whole system in disgust, and to pass sentence as an impostor on the most innocent, the most benevolent, the most eloquent and sublime character that has ever been exhibited to man." (Letter to Dr. Priestley.)

Thomas Paine:—"Nothing here said can apply even with the most distant disrespect to the real character of Jesus Christ. He was a virtuous and amiable man. The morality that he preached and practised was of the most benevolent kind; and though similar systems of morality had been preached by Confucius and some of the Greek philosophers many years before, by the Quakers since, and by many good men in all ages, it has not been exceeded by any. . . . He preached most excellent morality and the equality of man. Between the Jews and the Romans this virtuous reformer and revolutionist lost his life." (Age of Reason.)

Elias Hicks:—"The death of Jesus Christ was no more to us than the death of any other good man; he merely performed his part on earth as a faithful son." (Fragment of Disc.)

All those men had parallel views of Jesus. Franklin and Hicks perhaps thought less of him than the other three. Mr. Paine, considering the fact that he was never given to panegyric, perhaps thought as highly of him as Theodore Parker. They all considered him a man of the highest type, yet all thought him imperfect. Jefferson hits atheists and "infidels" a tremendous rap in the phrase "unthinking part of mankind."

These five Americans were all deists, and neither Christians nor infidels. Thomas Paine himself spurns the name "infidel." Listen to him:—"Infidelity does not consist in believing or in disbelieving; it consists in professing to believe what he does not believe." (Age of Reason, p. 2.)

Yours truly,

FACT.

A PITHY RESOLUTION.

SALEM, O., August 13, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Enclosed please find fifty cents, for which I desire to get a few copies of O. B. Frothingham's discourse (printed in the last INDEX, Aug. 12) in tract form, as you state there are some to be struck off.

I can't help thinking that, if the orthodox Christians could be induced to read this discourse carefully, and ponder over it, the effect would be decidedly healthy, and cause them to fear God a great deal less and love him more.

After reading "H. L. G.'s" communication in the last INDEX concerning those resolutions passed by the Union Temperance Society at Syracuse on the death of Rev. Samuel J. May, and considering the fact that those two ministers and twelve church members who voted no to them had admitted that Mr. May had always been a genuine, good man, and had lived a very useful life, I was struck with the thought that, if those fourteen persons had voted unanimously to adopt the following resolution, they would have been entirely consistent:—

Resolved, That the Rev. Samuel J. May was a good man, and has done a great deal for suffering humanity, and was therefore a Christian for humanity's sake; but in consequence of certain opinions he had concerning the orthodox faith, we could not for a moment admit that he was a fool for Christ's sake.

Yours truly,

CHARLES BONSALE.

THE NEW DISPENSATION.

BY S. B. M'CRACKEN.

Having in a former article spoken of the probability of armed collision growing out of the conflict of opposing moral forces that are now active, the present purpose is to analyze those forces somewhat, in order to a clearer understanding of the situation. In so doing the writer advances his own religious belief as contributing an important element in one of the principal opposing forces, and this article is therefore written somewhat from the Spiritualistic standpoint.

There is prominent at this day a numerous class of manifestations in the moral world which we will characterize as phenomenal. Of these, Free Religion and Spiritualism are the only phases which are struggling for organic recognition as religious forces. Both are rationalistic. While it should not be denied that Spiritualism has received a dingy coloring from a too ready credulity on the part of many of its votaries, and from the incoherent, stupid and insane babbling of ignorant, weak and ill-balanced persons, it is true that the higher Spiritualism, equally with all other forms of rationalism, accepts nothing without proof and demonstration. The aims of Free Religion are perhaps set forth with sufficient clearness; but as it has no defined tenets, and perhaps cannot have so long as it is consistent with its name, we must look to the views of its leading exponents to discover its tendency, or the preponderance of concurring opinion that goes to form its vital life.

There are two kinds of religion—a religion that looks to the present, and a religion that looks to the future as well as the present. Free Religion looks more immediately to the present. Although through philosophy and through the law of compensations it would infer a future, its critical rationalism has never yet found a future scientifically demonstrated. Hence to make a religion for the future would be a useless labor; it would be to make a commodity for which there was no market—to build castles and palaces for an imaginary tenantry. It would quite likely claim that a religion of the present forms the necessary substratum for a religion for the future, if there be a future, and hence meets the requirements both of the actual present and possible future,—its later relation, however, being purely incidental.

It has been said that the higher Spiritualism accepts nothing without demonstration; and if this be true, it logically follows that, equally with Free Religion, it admits the fullest right of individual judgment in all things. Equally with Free Religion, also, it recognizes the necessity of a religion adapted to the needs of man and the present life. It claims, however, through rational processes, to have demonstrated certain things to the individual judgment of a great many persons, although it does not hold that, because one or more facts have been so fully demonstrated as to produce conviction on one or more minds, other minds should accept the same conclusions, but that every mind should be convinced, if at all, of and for itself, by evidence adduced to and acting upon it.

Spiritualism claims to have ascertained these facts: First—The occurrence of many phenomena clearly importing a supermundane force in their production; Second—A supermundane intelligence controlling and directing this force; Third—The identity of this intelligence with known persons who have lived and died, in cases which are so numerous as to establish by demonstration the fact of what is called immortality. Hence it claims to have established the basis of a religion for the future—that is, a religion which shall be a preparation for the future—as well as a religion for the present. Hence it may claim to comprehend all that Free Religion comprehends, and a vital fact in addition. But there is no conflict between them. If the three postulates be true, Free Religion will discover their truth, and will advance to the ground which Spiritualism occupies. If they be not true, it is equally the interest of all to discover their falsity, which being discovered, Spiritualism will gladly entrench itself upon Free Religious ground.

We have endeavored to draw the comparison clearly; and if we have made any mistake, it is a mistake of judgment and not of intention. We have an object in thus drawing out and placing side by side these two bases for a religion, because every State should have a religion, and we are writing of a "New Dispensation" which contemplates an improved social state as well as a new religious development.

We have in the second paragraph spoken of certain phenomenal manifestations now prominent in the moral world. We group them together imperfectly, as they occur to us: Infidelity; Atheism; Materialism; Positivism; Female Suffrage, and the recognition of women in professional life; more humane views regarding idiots, lunatics, the imbecile and the criminal; the principle of co-operative industry and the association of the trades for mutual protection; anti-slavery, and the recognition of equal civil rights for all men; the more frequent interruption of marital relations, and the more liberal policy of our statutes and courts in granting divorces.

We remark specially upon the latter point, only to protest against the gross interpretation that will be given to it. It belongs to the family of Rationalism, and hence is not in any sense an "irrationalism." Modern opinion and practice on the subject has simply recorded its negative against the abomination which has endowed man with a desperate authority, with a complete and unchallenged absolutism in domestic life, and has commenced simultaneously therewith to recognize an individualism in woman. The rights of persons, in their relations to each other and to society, are regulated and defined by law. They are and should be so regulated and defined in marriage, as in other things. The modern demand is that they shall be rationally regulated and defined, and not arbitrarily, according to the doctrine of the past. The presumption is that this age is quite as good a judge of its own wants as was the age of Moses, of Solomon, of Herod, or of Constantine. This age takes issue with the claim that the book of divine revelation was closed with the death of certain historic personages whose lives, according to the record furnished by their own partisans, were lives of cruelty, of injustice and debauchery. On the subject under remark the position of Rev. O. B. Frothingham is liberal and rational.

[To be concluded next week.]

A FABLE.—A young man once picked up a sovereign lying in the road. Ever afterward, as he walked along, he kept his eye steadily fixed on the ground, in the hope of finding another. And, in the course of a long life, he did pick up, at different times, a good amount of gold and silver. But all these days, as he was looking for them, he saw not that heaven was bright above him and nature was beautiful around. He never once allowed his eyes to look up from the mud and filth in which he sought the treasure, and when he died, a rich old man, he only knew this fair earth of ours as a dirty road in which to pick up money as you walk along.—Theodore Parker.

It is to be hoped that no Medical Society in Great Britain will venture to ask Rev. M. D. Conway to preach a sermon upon any anniversary occasion, for there is reason to believe that he has already selected the following text in anticipation of such an imprudent request: "In his disease Asa sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians. And Asa slept with his fathers."—Christian Register.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

RIFLES, SHOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS, Gun Material. Write for Price List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [83-108.]

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 78tf

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 78tf

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 78-98.

WANTED—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88yl

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE, BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,
Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.
D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.

The advertiser, having been permanently cured of that dread disease, Consumption, by a simple remedy, is anxious to make known to his fellow sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge) with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure Cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.
Parties wishing the prescription will please address
EDWARD WILSON,
264 South Third Street, Williamsburgh, N. Y. 87-99

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (20 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,
The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.
Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.
"It Injures Our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?
Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.
These four for 10 cents.
Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
70tf 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher & Bookseller,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

The Origin of Species, By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
The Descent of Man, By DARWIN, 2 vols, each.... 2 00
Wallace on Natural Selection, (London)..... 2 00
Mivart on the Genesis of Species...... 1 00
Man's Place in Nature, By HUXLEY..... 1 25
Origin of Species, By HUXLEY..... 1 00
Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condition of Man, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
The Earthward Pilgrimage, By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
History of European Morals, from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols. 8vo..... 6 00
Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
Chips from a German Workshop, By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
The Old Roman World, By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
Short Studies on Great Subjects, By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE..... 1 50
Lecture on Calvinism, By the same..... 75
The Heavens, An illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
Words and their Uses, By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
Steps of Belief, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
Nature and Life, By Rev. ROBERT COLLIER..... 1 50
Sartor Resartus, By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edition..... 90
The Choice of Books, Same..... 75
Essays of Elia, By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
Thoughts about Art, By PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON..... 2 00
Words of Weight on the Woman Question, (London)..... 2 25
The Friendships of Woman, By W. R. ALGER... 2 00
A Day by the Fire, LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
Sanctum Sanctorum, THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
Carlyle's Essays, Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
Among My Books, By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 2 vols..... 5 00
Society and Solitude, By the same..... 2 00
Topics of the Times, By JAMES PARTON..... 2 00
Success and its Conditions, By E. P. WHIPPLE... 1 50
Literature and Life, By same..... 1 50
Tablets, By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
Companions of My Solitude, By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
Organization in Daily Life, Same..... 1 50
Realism, By the same..... 1 50
War and Culture, By same..... 1 50
Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms, By same... 1 25
Ten Great Religions, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
Light and Electricity, By TYNDALL..... 1 25
Our Girls, By DIO LEWIS..... 1 50
Studies in Literature, By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read,—NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
Principles of Psychology, By HERBERT SPENCER... 2 50
American Religion, By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
Fragments Of Science For Unscientific People, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Light Science For Leisure Hours, By R. A. PROCTOR... 3 00
Handbook Of Legendary And Mythological Art, By Mrs. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 3 50
Hereditary Genius—Its Laws and Consequences, By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
The Races of The Old World, By CHAS. L. BRACE... 2 00
Little Women, By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
Wallace's Review Of Darwin's Descent Of Man, PAPEL..... 25
Heat as a Mode of Motion, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
Buechner on Force and Matter, (London Print).... 3 75
Essays, By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE..... 1 00
Aristotle's Ethics, (Bohn's Edition)..... 2 00
France before Europe, By MICHELET..... 1 00
Roman Imperialism and Other Essays, By J. R. SEELEY. Author of "Ecce Homo"..... 1 50
The Republic of Plato..... 1 25
The Book of Golden Thoughts, By HENRY ATWELL... 1 25
Colton's Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words..... 1 25
Consolations of Travel, or The Last Days of a Philosopher, By SIR HUMPHREY DAVY..... 1 50
The Poetical Works of HOOD, WORDSWORTH, SHELLEY, KEATS, MOORE, SCOTT, BYRON, full gilt, and on tinted paper, each only..... 1 75
Address,
HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher and Bookseller,
Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio
TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is TWO DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.
For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.
For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.
For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.
For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	No.
What is Free Religion?.....	1
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....	4
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	5
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	6
Sunday Schools.....	7
Friendship.....	8
Grief and its Compensations.....	9
The Hebrew Prophets.....	11
Capital Punishment.....	12
Human Ideals.....	13
The Essence of Religion.....	14
The Management of Children.....	15
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian.....	16
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	48
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 35.

TOLEDO, OHIO, SEPTEMBER 2, 1871.

WHOLE No. 88.

The Index.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

LECTURE ON THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, LATE VICAR OF HEALAUGH, ENGLAND.

[Concluded.]

PART III.

I now come to the third part of our subject, and will cite passages from the Bible which directly or indirectly inculcate what is wrong.

The first group of such passages will consist of those which describe vile and wicked conduct, either without a word of censure or with positive approval.

There is a passage in Gen. xix. 30—38, which I have too much delicacy to read, and in which a gross case of incest is recorded, without a word of censure. The offspring of this crime, Moab and Ammon, are especially protected by God, as you will find on reference to Deut. ii. 9 and 19.

In the story of Rebekah's and Jacob's lying (Gen. xxvii.), which is so familiar to all Bible readers, you will not find one word of censure upon them for their wickedness. Jacob himself is always included in the sacred three, when God calls himself the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. This no one will object to, were it not that the meaning is that these three men were special favorites of Jehovah. And to show that this is not my own arbitrary interpretation, I refer you to the prophet Malachi i. 2, 3, "Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord; yet I loved Jacob, and I hated Esau;" and to Paul the Apostle, who quotes these words approvingly, "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated." (Rom. ix. 13).

Jacob was an utterly mean, cowardly, and fraudulent deceiver, and made so by his own mother. Gen. xxv. 29—34 says, "And Jacob sold pottage; and Esau came from the field, and he was faint; and Esau said to Jacob, Feed me, I pray thee with that same red pottage; for I am faint. And Jacob said, Sell me this day thy birthright. And Esau said, Behold I am at the point to die; and what profit shall this birthright do to me? And Jacob said, Swear to me this day; and he sware unto him: and he sold his birthright unto Jacob. Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentiles."

Gen. xxx. 28—43 gives us an account of how this chosen servant of God cheated his uncle Laban and secured for himself by dishonest means all the best of the flocks and herds. In xxxi. 42, Jacob says to Laban his uncle, "Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac, had been with me, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty."

Wherein he claims that God had not only sanctioned but helped him in his fraudulent dealings.

Esau, on the contrary, who is never praised in the whole Bible, was a fine, noble, generous character, his only recorded fault being the desire to take revenge on Jacob when he had discovered his villainy; but his truly magnanimous forgiveness of Jacob afterwards made ample amends for that natural fit of anger.

Jacob's faults pass uncondemned, while Esau is said to be hated by God.

I pass now to the history of David, to notice one instance of outrageous villainy which never receives a word of censure in the Bible.

1 Sam. xxvii. records how David and six hundred men were sheltered and hospitably entertained by Achish, King of Gath (verses 2—6), "He and his men, every man with his household, even David with his two wives, and planted them in a town called Ziklag." Now day by day David and his men made marauding expeditions against the aborigines of the land by whom he was sheltered. Verses 9—11 tell us that David smote the land, i. e., the Philistine district, and left neither man nor woman alive, and took away all the spoil and came to Achish, (Ver. 10—12.) "And Achish said, Whither have ye made a road today? And David (falsely) answered, Against the south of Judah, and against the south of the Kenites. . . . And David saved neither man nor woman alive, to bring tidings to Gath, lest they should tell on us. And Achish believed David."

This instance of treachery reminds me of one that must not be left out of this black list. I mean the treachery of Jael (Judges iv.). Like other stories which are so well known, I will not waste time in reciting it all. I only call attention, first, to the extreme sacredness in which Orientalists regard the pledge given and received in acts of hospitality. If food was given and received, it was tantamount to a solemn oath that no harm should be done by one to the other. There is a story told of a robber who entered a house, intending to murder the owner for the sake of his wealth, but who in creeping along with his hand touched the walls. He put his hand to his mouth and tasted salt, whereupon he withdrew from the house, gave up his coveted spoils, and afterwards confessed to the owner how his life had been preserved.

I mention this to show how sacred was the implied pledge in hospitality given and received. But what aggravated the conduct of Jael was, that (ver. 17) there was peace between Sisera's king and her husband, Heber the Kenite. As her husband's friend, Jael thus receives Sisera (ver. 18), and says, "Turn in, my lord, turn in; fear not." After being refreshed with a draught of milk from Jael's hand, the weary warrior lies down in perfect security and sleeps. The awful tragedy you know, and one could only extenuate or make excuses for the crime on the possibility of a panic of terror coming over Jael's mind for the safety of her husband, who was thus compromised by sheltering the enemy of the victorious Israelites. But no human heart now-a-days could look upon her act as anything but a crime, and a crime of the deepest dye.

Turn to Judges v., and what do we read? (ver. 24.)—"Blessed above women shall Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, be; blessed shall she be above women in the tent." (ver. 31) "So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord." These are the words of Deborah, a prophetess—an inspired woman—and this is a part of that Book which even today is asserted to be the infallible Word of God, written under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost!

The books of the Kings and Chronicles abound in instances of vile conduct uncensured, or actually commended. I will give you but one—King Jehu. 2 Kings x. 30, informs us that "The Lord said unto Jehu, Because thou hast done well in executing that which is right in mine eyes, and hast done unto the house of Ahab according to all that was in mine heart, thy children of the fourth generation shall sit on the throne of Israel." In the 9th chap., verses 6 and 7, we find the command of God to Jehu to "smite the house of Ahab."

Now let us briefly enumerate the acts of Jehu, which were done in obedience to God's command, and which were rewarded by God's approval.

He first shot King Joram, and then ordered the assassination of King Ahaziah (chap. ix. 24, 27); then, by a subtle and explicit message to the Samaritan elders, he obtained the heads of seventy of Ahab's children (chap. x., 5—10), which were packed in baskets and sent him to Jezreel. The next morning he addresses the people in most hypocritical language—"I conspired against my master and slew him; but who slew all these?" thus pretending to have had nothing to do with that massacre. This he followed up by slaying all the rest of Ahab's relations (ver. 11) and friends, and great men and priests, until he left him none remaining (chap. x. 11). But, with the usual elasticity of Scripture, after they were all slain, there were a great many left, namely, forty-two brethren of Ahaziah (Ahab's son-in-law) and a whole temple full of priests. The former he slays without a word of warning; the latter he ensnares into his hands by hard lying (chap. x. 18—28). It is plain enough to us to see that Jehu only acted like an unscrupulous usurper, who finds the safety of his throne dependent upon the extermination of the late dynasty, while his slaughter of the worshippers of Baal was partly done as a sop to the priests of Jehovah, who had been instrumental in urging his pretensions, and partly to crush all lingering sympathy with the house of Ahab in the minds of the people. He was a consummate dissembler, hypocrite, and murderer; and yet the Bible tells us that he did according to all that was in God's heart, all that was right in God's eyes, and received for so doing God's approval and reward.

Of direct commands which are immoral and degrading there is, alas! a too plentiful supply in the Bible. It is impossible to give more than a few illustrations.

1st. As to the usages of war. God is said to have commanded the slaughter of women and children, even infants and sucklings. Joshua x. 40 sums up an account which must be terribly familiar to the ears of all church-goers:—"So Joshua smote all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs, and all their kings; he left none remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed, as the Lord God of Israel commanded."

In Numbers xxxi. 17, 18, Moses gives a command to slay every male and every married woman; but the virgins were to be reserved for their own enjoyment. Lest it should be said this was only Moses speaking, refer to the 25th and the following verses—"The Lord spake unto Moses, saying, . . . Divide the prey, . . . so and so—32,000 persons, women, who were virgins (I have altered the Bible expression out of decency.) Ver. 40 says, "And the persons were 16,000, of whom the Lord's tribute was thirty and two persons." We do not wonder at savage men doing these things; we only ask, in the name of the Holy God, how you Bible-worshippers dare to tell us that these were God's commands?

Turn now to Numbers v. 11—34, beginning "The Lord spake unto Moses, saying." It is the ordeal for jealousy—no, I cannot read it. It is too disgusting; and if I read it here or in church, I should earn the character of that notorious Protestant lecturer, who is blamed for going about the country exposing the alleged obscenities of the Catholic Confessional.

The law of divorce (Deuter. xxiv. 1—3), is another instance of immoral commandment; and we have the authority of Jesus for saying so. He upsets the Divine authority for the law, by ascribing it to Moses.

Again, the law of retaliation (Deuter. xix. 21), "Thine eye shall not pity; but life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot," is eminently immoral, also reversed by Jesus.

Hosea is commanded (chap. i. 1), to break the Seventh Commandment. (See also chap. iii. 1).

Levit. xxvii. 29, involves human sacrifices, "None devoted shall be redeemed; they shall surely be put to death." "Every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord." Jephthah, no doubt, acted upon some law like this.

Exod. xxii. 18, enacts a law which has caused thousands and tens of thousands of defenceless women to be murdered—"Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." What are we to think of a God who knew so little about the men and women he had made as to believe in witchcraft himself? Slavery is also inculcated in Leviticus xxv. 44—46, "Thy bondmen and thy bondmaids shalt thou buy of the heathen that are round about you, and of the strangers that do sojourn among you, and ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you; they shall be your bondmen forever." (I have condensed this passage for the sake of brevity.)

Although the Hebrews might not marry any foreign women, yet they might have as many concubines as they pleased of the captives taken in war, or by purchase. Hence Solomon figures with his 700 wives and 300 concubines—1,000 women in all.

Lastly, the Bible itself endorses all that I have said, in these words from Ezekiel xx. 25, "Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live."

I must not omit from this catalogue those blemishes on the beautiful Psalms, in which Oriental hatred and revenge find such fierce expression. Psalms cix., cxxxvii., are enough to quote in establishment of my argument, while I can assure you that there are very few Psalms in the whole book that are not more or less disfigured by prayers for revenge and curses against foes.

It has been urged by some that the moral teaching of the New Testament is also at fault. No doubt it is imperfect, but it does not deserve to be placed in the same black catalogue as that from which I have drawn the foregoing illustrations. One book of the New Testament, however, has earned our just execration. My sense of justice rose up in rebellion against it when I was but a boy, and I detest the book more than ever now. It is the last in the Bible—the Book of Revelation. In chap. xxii. 18, 19, the writer fiercely but vainly tries to guard his production from being corrupted by transcribers, and this he does by a malediction worthy of the spirit which has ever animated the diabolical side of the Christian church. "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book: and if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life." I only wish the writer of that book could hear me say to him, "Your mouth is full of cursing and bitterness, and your feet are swift to shed blood."

False pretences generally defeat their own end. Let Bibliolaters beware of making threats against those who question the Divine origin and infallibility of this book. Those threats will make more rebels than they ever made slaves.

PART IV.

I now come to the last branch of my inquiry—that which relates to Jesus Christ. I will show from the New Testament itself that, however splendid and noble he was as a man, he could not have been the Almighty God, creator and preserver of the universe. Nothing that I can say will detract from his great human excellence. His nobleness, and purity, and lofty self-sacrifice for the truth, have never been surpassed. But, for all that, he was a man like ourselves; and even in a narrative purposely designed to represent him as faultless, he discloses certain sure signs of human error and infirmity which can never be reconciled to the idea that he was the Almighty God on earth.

(1). His knowledge was defective. In Luke ii. 52, we read that "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." The wisdom of God must be absolute and complete, and therefore not capable of increasing at all. If Jesus increased in wisdom, then he must at one time have been deficient in wisdom, and could not have been God himself. But it is further stated that he increased in favor with God. What can be more absurd than to say that God increased in his own favor? This text is perfectly consistent with the idea that Jesus was only a man, but utterly inconsistent with the idea that he was a God.

Then he believed that blindness and dumbness were the result of being possessed of a devil (Matt. xii. 22–28). "Then was brought unto him one possessed with a devil, blind, and dumb, and he healed him, inasmuch that the blind and dumb both spake and saw. . . . When the Pharisees heard it, they said, This fellow doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of devils." And Jesus answered, "If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your children cast them out? . . . But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come to you."

Another proof of his belief that devils were the immediate cause of disease is found in Matt. xvii. 14–21. A poor lunatic lad, subject to epilepsy, falling oftentimes into the fire and into the water, could not be healed by the disciples of Jesus, who thereupon reproaches them for their want of faith, and says, "Bring him hither to me. And Jesus rebuked the devil, and he departed out of him." He adds, in the 21st verse, "Howbeit this kind (of devil) goeth not out but by prayer and fasting."

His knowledge of Jewish history was at fault when he accused his countrymen of having murdered Zacharias, the son of Barachias (Matt. xxiii. 35). It was Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, who was slain, as described, between the temple and the altar. You will find this recorded in 2 Chron. xxiv. 20–22. Zachariah, the son of Berechiah, was one of the prophetic writers of the Old Testament, and lived 320 years later. A very trifling mistake truly, but one which makes all the difference to the claims made for Jesus that he was a god.

With respect to his future return to earth, he himself admits (Matt. xxiv. 36) that "of that day and hour knoweth no man: no, not the angels in heaven, but my Father only." Mark xiii. 32 says that Jesus said still more explicitly, "No man, no, not the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." That he spoke the truth when he confessed this ignorance is too well established by those passages in which he predicted his return "before that generation should pass away" (Matt. xxiv. 29–35. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. . . . Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." If words have any meaning at all, these words show that Jesus was mistaken in his prediction. I know a common method of trying to get out of this tiresome fact is to say that the "generation" spoken of did not mean generation, but the present epoch or age of the world between Christ's ascension and his return to earth. But this involves the error of the apostles and the early Church, who all firmly believed that Christ would come again in the lifetime of some of them, and who accepted his words literally. (See 1 Thess. iv. 15–17.) I think myself that the immediate followers of Jesus were more likely to have known what he meant than we are. The later epistles show signs of the disappointment of this expectation (see 2 Peter iii. 4, and 2 Thess. ii. 2, 3. The genuineness of these two epistles is doubted by some critics). And it is worthy of notice that the Fourth gospel, which many critics believe to have been written A. D. 160–180, carefully excludes all these predictions of Christ's second coming, and has a most suspicious passage in chap. xxi. 20–23: "Then Peter, turning about, seeth (John), . . . and saith to Jesus, Lord, and what shall this man do? Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? . . . Then went this saying abroad among the brethren that that disciple should not die. Yet Jesus said not unto him, He shall not die, but, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?"

When this book was written there can be little doubt that every one of the apostles and cotemporaries of Jesus was dead and buried, and John, who perhaps survived them all, had been dead half-a-century.

That saying of Jesus concerning Judas Iscariot always seemed to me inconsistent with the idea that Jesus was his Creator. "Woe to the man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! Good were it for that man if he had never been born!" (Mark xiv. 21). The Creator is surely responsible for the existence of all his creatures, and such a speech is unbecoming to the lips of the Creator.

Had Jesus been the Almighty God, neither could he have uttered those words on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" As a cry of anguish and disappointment it was natural enough on the lips of a frail man; but if Jesus were God himself, those words would have no meaning or be but a solemn mockery.

In the Fourth gospel we have presented to us a character in Jesus Christ in striking and painful contrast to the Jesus of the first three gospels. In the Synoptics, he is at least simple and plain, willing to teach, and to reply to inquirers, and free from narrowness in his religious views. But in the Fourth gospel we find him represented as often striving to perplex and confound his questioners. He is in a state of chronic antagonism with the men around him who are not his own followers, and begins his ministry by condemnation of all who do not believe on Him. Chap. iii. 18, "He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God."

He teaches the doctrine of Election notwithstanding, chap. vi. 44. He says, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." Chap. ix. 39, "For judgment am I come into this world, that they which see not might see, and that they which see might be made blind."

Is this God loving the world impartially, or is it not? In chap. xvii. 9, speaking of those who believe on him, he says, "I pray for them; I pray not for the world." In chap. xi. 41, 42, he is represented at the grave of Lazarus, as saying, "Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me," and as saying this only for effect, "but because of the people which stand by I said it." God would surely have known his motives in saying "I thank thee that thou hast heard me," without Jesus telling him so; and to announce the motive to the bystanders was to give an air of insincerity and artifice to his own conduct. I cannot believe this of Jesus. This alone stamps the narrative as incredible and fictitious.

According to this untrustworthy gospel he taught not the doctrine of the Trinity, but rank Tritheism. Chap. xvi. 7, "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." Chap. xiv. 26, "The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost whom the Father will send in my name." According to this, one God is said to be unwilling or unable to be where another God is, but will take his place when he departs. These passages do not teach any doctrine of a Trinity, but only of Three Gods in the most unconquerable plainness. Moreover they directly contradict the statement that "Jesus [himself was] full of the Holy Ghost" (Luke iv. 1), and that John the Baptist and his mother Elizabeth (Luke i.) and his father Zacharias, and the aged Simeon were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and the Holy Ghost (Matt. iii.) visibly descended upon Jesus at his baptism.

I see traces of human weakness in the language which Jesus is reported to have used against the chief priests and scribes and pharisees of his time. I know what it is to be tempted to abuse and denounce fiercely the men whom in our day we believe to be hindering the work of God, and keeping back from the people the light of truth. But what holds me from giving free utterance to my angry thoughts? Why, instead of abusing the men themselves, do I force myself into attacking only their erroneous or mischievous opinions? It is my conscience. My moral sense tells me that I must not call ill-names, nor let my righteous indignation against falsehood and blasphemy get the better of me, and lead me into malediction.

My reason also tells me that men are scarcely ever responsible for their beliefs or misbeliefs; that they deserve pity if they are in error, and do not deserve curses. Hence I could not, without a guilty conscience, take up the language of Jesus against the bigots of our own day. I could not say to any men, "Ye are of your father the devil" (John viii. 44), nor this, "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" (Matt. xxiii. 33.) I cannot be sure that he ever used such improper language as this to his fellow-men, but I am very sure that the Gospels say that he did, and therefore the Gospels represent him as giving way to bad temper, and doing that which all decent people now-a-days agree in condemning as not only wrong, but futile; for abuse is not argument.

The last point in the recorded character of Jesus which I shall criticize is that which I shall deliberately call his disregard of family ties.

Luke ii. 43, tells us that "the child Jesus [being twelve years old,] tarried behind in Jerusalem; and Joseph and his mother knew not of it." After three days they found him in the temple, and his mother said, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing." Ver. 49. And he said unto them, "How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business? And they understood not the saying which he spake unto them." (Notwithstanding all that is written about the miraculous birth.) "And he went down with them and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them." Ver. 51. (Notwithstanding his Father's business, which he at once gave up.)

Now what chills my heart in this story is not that a little boy of twelve years old should be so thoughtlessly cruel as to get away unknown to his parents; but that when he was told of their sorrow in losing him, he made no sort of apology—never uttered a word of tender regret, but only began to vindicate himself on the ground of a higher obligation; as, though God in heaven ever did or ever would desire a child to inflict such a wound as that on its parents' hearts.

I know what it is to lose a child for a few hours. I have helped more than one poor mother to find her lost little one in the dense streets of London, and I have felt and witnessed the agony of parental anguish, worse while it lasts than the wrench of death. And yet this youth of twelve, said also to be God Almighty, could inflict such a wound as this and not know it: and when tenderly reminded of it, neither felt nor expressed the least sorrow. This disregard of natural ties is again exhibited (Matt. xii. 46–40): "While yet he talked to the people, behold, his mother and his brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him." Then a bystander tells him, "Behold thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee." But instead of regarding the fifth commandment, which says, Honor thy father and thy mother, he answered and said unto him that told him, "Who is my mother, and who are my brethren? And he stretched forth his hand towards his disciples, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren!"

I can hardly read such passages with patience. They exhibit Jesus as completely destitute of natural affection, cruel and disrespectful towards his mother, and carried away by egotistical vanity. Mark iii. 31–35, tells the same tale, and Luke viii. 20, 21, likewise, with this variation, "My mother and my brethren are those which hear the Word of God, and keep it." What about the fifth commandment being the Word of God?

The fourth Gospel has furnished two instances in which Jesus is described—and in my opinion, falsely described—as guilty of a coldness towards his mother, which is unpardonable and unworthy of a man. Chapter ii. gives an account of the marriage at Cana in Galilee. Verse 3, "When they wanted wine, the mother of Jesus said unto him, They have no wine." Instead of saying tenderly, Leave it to me, dear mother, he says, "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come."

Those who are ignorant of Greek must not suppose there was anything disrespectful in the term "Woman;" it was equivalent to Lady or Madam. But the cutting coldness of this reply betrays the absence of natural affection, which, as a son and a father, I here openly denounce as a frightful blemish in the life and character of Jesus Christ.

Worse than all, when that neglected mother, who had followed him about with so much maternal pride, treasuring up every word of his in her loving heart, comes and stands by the Cross, to be at hand in his last hour, to render a kindly service, or to get a loving farewell from those lips which she had idolized more than they deserved to be, what is his greeting? He points to a disciple standing near, and says (John xix. 25, 26), "Woman, behold thy son;" and to the disciple, "Behold thy mother." Even supposing him to have been thus providing for her future support, yet anything more heartless than this you cannot conceive—it betrays a soul in which all natural affection is dead, or in which it never even had birth. There was not a word of love in it, not a word of tenderness. The sword that was to go through that poor mother's soul pierced her to her agony. (Luke ii. 35.) I for one would say, if this anguish of heart could not have been avoided because Jesus was God, then it was a thousand pities that he became incarnate at all. No benefit to mankind could compensate for the mischief of such a cruel example—for this persistent and heartless trampling on the purest affections of humanity.

If you, my Bibliolater, insist upon this being a proof that Jesus was Divine, and therefore superior to all family and local ties, then in God's name, I say yours is a God whom I will not follow nor believe in; whose every word I will disobey, and whose every guidance I will distrust.

I will now place you on the horns of a dilemma. If Jesus treated his mother and his brethren as described in the Gospels, he was not the God who commands us to honor our father and our mother, and to love each other as brethren. If Jesus did not do so, then your Gospels speak falsely, and are no longer to be trusted, when they tell you that Jesus lived before Abraham, or was born without a human father.

My painful task is done. Had I known beforehand what a mass of evidence there was to choose from, I would not have attempted to treat this great subject in one Lecture. As it is, I have left an enormous quantity of illustrations for future use. When the popular superstition is destroyed, it will then be my privilege and happiness to speak of the truths and beauties of the Bible and of the character of Jesus, with the genuine enthusiasm which I feel.

I believe I am not saying more than the literal truth when I affirm that I have to-night completely proved that the Bible contains errors, and immoral teaching, and views degrading to God, and that the very records of the life of Jesus furnish their own testimony that he was only a man, and was not free from some human imperfections and infirmities.

It would be well for all those who clamor for the infallibility of the Bible, or for the Godhead of Jesus Christ, to be careful not to omit one very important preliminary before they venture upon arguing out their views—the advice I give gratis and with hearty welcome—

“READ YOUR BIBLES.”

THE CRUSADE AGAINST CHRISTIANITY.

[The following significant article, foreshadowing the formation of a political “Christian” party, was copied in the Toledo Commercial of July 27, which says:—“Elsewhere will be found a timely and able editorial article from the Chicago Times, on the present crusade against Christianity, which will richly repay perusal. The indications of a direct issue on that question seem to be increasing, and it becomes the duty of every citizen to be prepared for it.”]

Following the example of the “free-thinking” Germans in Chicago, the German-speaking inhabitants in many parts of the United States are organizing for a new departure on the Sunday question. All these movements partake more or less of a partisan political character. In all their pronouncements, the nomination and support of only such candidates for political offices as are “right on the Sunday question” are set forth as matters of the first importance. It is, indeed, only by political action, that the persons engaged in this crusade against the political recognition of anything in the name or nature of religion can hope to attain their object.

One of the resolves adopted at a recent meeting of twenty-one different German societies in Cincinnati, condenses the general scope of the political argument against the Sunday laws into the succinct allegation that such laws are “in conflict both with the constitution of the State and the United States, and can not properly be enforced anyway.”

Upon this ground a distinct issue may as well be made. The idea which our German “free thinkers” advance, and which not a few other persons seem to entertain, that the prohibition upon Congress to make any law “respecting an establishment of religion” is a fundamental declaration against all religion, or against all laws to foster and encourage religion, is a very great error. Equally erroneous is it to suppose that the prohibition was intended to place all religions—Mohammedanism, Judaism, Confucianism, Buddhism, as well as the different churches of Christianity—upon the same basis, or that the object or the effect of that provision of the Federal Constitution was to interfere in any way with the original, inherent and just rights of the several States to make such laws respecting religion as to them might seem proper. The proposition has indeed been advanced, and supported with considerable ability, that this is not a Christian country; and this, obviously, is the corner stone upon which it is intended to erect the platform of the no-Sunday party. Nevertheless, all the facts in the history as well as in the institutions and laws of the United States prove the contrary. Every American colony was originally settled by a Christian people. The settlers of Virginia did not more certainly bring with them the common law of England, the settlers of Louisiana did not more certainly bring with them the institutes of the civil law, than did both bring to the new continent the common institutes of Christianity. It was in virtue of their Christianity that they assumed the right to possess the land, and to expel the unregenerate heathen whom they found in possession. And it is upon this basis that rests to-day all the rights of ownership that the people of the United States have, as against the aboriginal owners. Moreover, it is a fact well known to every intelligent American school boy that every American colony, from its foundation down to the Revolution (with the single and doubtful exception of Rhode Island), did openly, by the whole concourse of its laws and institutions, support and sustain in some form the Christian religion. And this has continued to be the case in some of the States down to the present time, without the slightest suspicion that it was against the principles of public law or Republican liberty; or that it was inimical to the letter or spirit of the Federal Constitution. The right to make laws to foster and encourage religion was one of the original inherent rights of every State, which no State has surrendered; which every State therefore still possesses, and which certainly most of them do now exercise, as witness the Sunday laws.

So far from intending to prevent the enactment of laws to encourage Christianity, the express object of the constitutional provision in question was to more certainly affirm to the several States their sovereign right to do that very thing. Concerning this prohibition upon Congress, Mr. Justice Story says:

“The real object of the amendment was not to countenance, much less to advance Mahomedanism, Judaism, or infidelity, by prostrating Christianity; but to exclude all rivalry among Christian sects, and to prevent any national ecclesiastical establishment which should give to a hierarchy the exclusive patronage of the national government.”

It is seen from these historical facts that the legal institution and government recognition of Sunday rests upon a very different basis from that which the Cincinnati Germans, in common with all others of the no-Sunday party, assign, namely, that out of the seven days of the week there ought to be one day devoted to rest and recreation. As regards rest and recreation, every inhabitant of the United States is at liberty to devote all days to those objects. Government has nothing to do with the regulation of any man's personal affairs; it can neither prescribe his hours of labor nor his hours of rest. It is his own business, which government leaves every man to regulate for himself, providing only that he shall respect the individual rights of others and the common interests of society. In every civilized country, and even in semi-barbarous countries, religion is regarded and treated as one of those common interests of the social body. In every civilized country religion of some kind is recognized and fostered, if not sustained by law. In this country, it is the Christian religion which receives such public and legal recognition and encouragement. It is for this reason that the laws in every State and in every city command at least the semblance of respect for that day which is, and for eighteen centuries has been, regarded by Christians everywhere as essentially a Christian institution.

Such governmental recognition of the Christian Sabbath, carries with it, however, no atom of compulsion upon any man's religious or irreligious notions. It compels no man to be a Christian. If he prefers being a pagan, the law indulges him in that preference. It only says to him that he must not be a pagan iconoclast and go about demolishing Christian idols. He may worship his own idol as devoutly as he will; but he must not undertake to substitute his idolatry for the Christianity which this country recognizes, and which its public policy is to encourage and respect.

The question, so far as government is concerned, is thus entirely one of public policy. The whole question is comprehended in a single inquiry: whether it is better policy for the State to repudiate Christianity or to recognize and encourage it? It cannot be doubted on which side of the question the intelligent, educated, and patriotic citizen will be found.

Henry Ward Beecher, in the Christian Union this week, says: “The Orange societies should parade next year without a banner less, and with no inscription rubbed out. They should not do it as an implied promise that, if protected for once, they will then do it no more. They ought to move through the streets of New York until nobody thinks of molesting them. When that time arrives, it will be a matter of no public importance whether the annual procession is kept up or not; but so long as a dog wags his tongue against the Orangemen's procession, or a bewildered magistrate forgets his duty towards them, the public good requires their continuance. If the Orangemen of New York fail next year to march through the streets of the city, they will betray a sacred duty. By accident they have become the representatives of a principle which lies at the foundation of modern civilization. They do not just now represent a spent fact in history, but a living principle; it is not the battle of the Boyne in Ireland, but a question of liberty in New York.” And he's right.—Seaside Oracle.

BIBLE FORTUNE-TELLING.—On the evening of the closing year a German minister's widow sat with her children drawing scriptural lots for themselves for the new year. When they had finished drawing for themselves, a daughter of nineteen said: “Let us now draw for the new Emperor.” They opened the volume, and the lot fell upon Haggai (ii. 9): “The glory of the latter house shall be greater than the former, saith the Lord of hosts; and in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts.” They sent a letter describing this incident to the King, then at Versailles; and Bismarck acknowledged the compliment by sending a special messenger to Stuttgart to hunt up the family and assure them of the Emperor's gratification.—Hearth & Home.

The Chicago Post, on the receipt of Mayor Hall's proclamation refusing to allow the Orangemen to parade, said that the next thing expected is that, if Mayor Hall hears that a gang of burglars are about to “go through” a certain house, he will address the proprietor as follows:—

“My Dear Sir: Some eccentric gentlemen have spotted your residence for this evening. They are wrong, but we cannot have a riot. You had better move out.”
A. OAKLEY HALL.”

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—“Enclosed find one dollar and send THE INDEX six months. I will add, I am much pleased with your paper, and hope to get a small club. I stand nearly alone in my religious views, in a village where nearly all consider attending the close communion Baptist Church the end of all religion; and whoever does not attend, of course, has no correct understanding of religion. I have been considered an infidel here for twenty years; and after a considerable discussion there is a tacit understanding to ignore me entirely, as it is better for their influence to have me keep still, as the young will listen to such discussions with considerable interest. I find there is a great change in opinion in this village since I have lived here. There are men who privately entertain very liberal views, and are glad to borrow THE INDEX, but want me to keep the matter private. There is much said about Doctor McCosh's lectures, and I notice some criticisms in THE INDEX, and nothing would please me better than to see more of them, and I am confident you are able to answer him at any time. I expect to read his lectures in a short time, and if I had a review of his lectures in THE INDEX, I should show them around among his admirers with great pleasure. His friends claim his arguments are unanswerable by the opponents of orthodoxy. I most earnestly hope to see some attention paid to his lectures in THE INDEX.” [Mr. Ripley, in the N. Y. Tribune, has sufficiently criticised Dr. McCosh.—ED.]

—“I think your course promotes liberal views and is doing good, although you do not strike as hard as you might at the vital point of the Christian Superstition, the Bible. I have sent you two subscribers, and I think I can get more. This is a strong Universalist town. The members of the Universalist Society are mostly free thinkers, supporting it as an opposition line to Evangelicalism.”

—“I have taken THE INDEX from its commencement, and therefore need not say that I like it; for were it otherwise, it could be stopped at any moment. ‘Free Religion’ is the lever that must affect the whole lump. The spirit of inquiry is not confined to any locality, but is to be found throughout the length and breadth of the land. THE INDEX points out the way of truth which leads to righteousness. Though of slow progress, the final result is certain.”

—“Enclosed find one dollar, for which please send me THE INDEX the ensuing six months. I would pay for the year, but I travel during the winter and should not receive it regularly. I have read several numbers, and feel much in sympathy with the principles you so boldly enunciate.”

—“Being short of funds at present for a year's subscription to your beautiful paper, I enclose fifty cents for the bread of life for three months.”

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be resumed next Sunday evening, Sept. 3, and will be held for the present in GERMAN HALL, St. Clair St., beginning punctually at 7½ o'clock P. M. The public are cordially invited to attend.

THE WILBURN FUND.—The following responses to Miss WILBURN's appeal in THE INDEX No. 87, have been thankfully received:—

	Cincinnati,	O.,	$2.00
WILLIAM KRAUS.	Toledo,	O.,	5.00

RECEIVED.

LIGHT SCIENCE FOR LEISURE HOURS. A Series of Familiar Essays on Scientific Subjects, Natural Phenomena, etc. By RICHARD A. PROCTOR, B. A. Camb., F. R. A. S. Author of “The Sun,” “Other Worlds Than Ours,” “Saturn,” etc. New York: D. APPLETON AND COMPANY, 549 & 551 Broadway. 12mo. pp. 343.

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF LINCOLN INSTITUTE. By Prof. R. B. FOSTER. And Speech of Col. DAVID BRANSON, upon the Dedication of the New Building, July 4th, 1871. STATE TIMES PRINT, Jefferson City, Mo. pp. 15.

THE GOLDEN AGE TRACTS. No. 1. The Rights of Women: a Letter to Horace Greeley. By THEODORE TYLTON. Published at the Office of THE GOLDEN AGE, 9 Spruce St., New York. 1871. pp. 11.

THE RADICAL. Published Monthly. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Bromfield St. September, 1871. $3.00 a Year. Single Numbers 30 Cents.

THE HERALD OF HEALTH AND JOURNAL OF PHYSICAL CULTURE. Advocates a Higher Type of Manhood—Physical, Intellectual, and Moral. New York: WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers, 13 & 15 Laight St. September, 1871. $2.00 a Year. Single Copy 20 Cents.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL. Published by JOHN E. MILLER, Chicago, Ill. September, 1871. $1.50 a Year. Single Copies 30 Cents.

PETERS' MUSICAL MONTHLY. J. L. PETERS, Publisher, 599 Broadway, New York. September, 1871. $3.00 a Year. Single Copies 30 Cents.

Poetry,

MY HOPE.

[For THE INDEX.]

Not surer am I of this present life,
Than of the hope that I shall never die.
There is no grief, no joy, which takes not hold
On immortality; no passionate, pure
Desire to know what here we never may Find out, to be what here we never can,
To see and know the venerable dead,
Who live for us not only in the words
Of gentle wisdom they have left, but in Diviner words we hope to hear them speak,
In looks of recognition and of love,
Fulfilling all and more than all our dream.
There is no friendship, no deep human love,
Which takes not hold on immortality,
On the divine To Be.

I know not whence
I am, nor why, nor whence this hope that I Shall never die. I only know 'tis part
Of my most inner life, and am content.

M. R. W.

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

For Special Notices see eighth page.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed; and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONN,	"	"	Ten	" 1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	" 1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. H. ABBOT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. H. BATES,	"	"	"	" 1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	" 1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	" 300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	" 300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	" 300
V. KERN,	"	"	"	" 300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	" 500
J. G. HOLZWARTH,	"	"	One	" 100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	" 100
C. AUCHARD,	"	"	"	" 100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	" 3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	" 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Three	" 300
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	One	" 100
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	" 100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	" 100
J. SHIDEBERGER,	Painesville,	O.,	"	" 100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	" 300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	" 500
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	" 100
J. L. WHITING,	Boston,	"	"	" 100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	" 100
J. E. SUTTON,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	" 100
S. I. DURKEE,	"	"	"	" 100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	" 100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	" 1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	" 200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	" 200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	" 200
FRANK PRATHER,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
E. F. DINSMORE,	Wellsville,	Kan.,	One	" 100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	" 200
W. J. POTTER,	Middlefield,	Ct.,	Fourteen,	" 1,400
G. C. GLATTE,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three,	" 300
W. C. GANNETT,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	" 300
MISS M. C. PERSKINS,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	" 300
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	One	" 100
MISS E. EMERSON,	"	"	"	" 100
W. H. DOWNES,	Birmingham,	Ala.,	"	" 100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing,	Mich.,	"	" 100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	" 100
W. C. RUSSELL,	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	" 100
WM. CLARKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Three	" 300
C. L. SMITH,	"	"	One	" 100
J. N. LYMAN,	Cincinnati,	"	Twenty	" 2,000
L. G. FEICH,	Monroe Centre,	"	One	" 100

$25,700

In Mommsen's "History of Rome," Vol. I, p. 282, we find the following:—"The Romans, notwithstanding their zeal for religion, adhered with unbending strictness to the principle that the priest ought to remain completely powerless in the state, and, excluded from all command, ought like any other burgess to render obedience to the humblest magistrates." Shall America be less wise than Rome? Let her narrowly watch the efforts making to incorporate a Christian Amendment in the Constitution.

THE SYSTEM OF FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The New York Independent had the following paragraphs some time ago, in criticism of an article of ours in THE INDEX, No. 72:—

Mr Abbot, in THE INDEX, has our best wishes for the success of his endeavor to bring to a better understanding of their obligations two misguided Christians whom he has taken in hand. The one is a man who has paid his subscription to the missionary society of his church by "withholding payment of a wood-bill and several smaller bills," on the principle, as he expresses it in his letter, of making the cause of Christ first. The other is the corresponding secretary of the missionary society, who publishes the letter of the subscriber with the following comment:

"There need be no fear but that the brother will be amply able to pay his wood-bill, and any other debts he may have. The spirit and example here exhibited commend themselves everywhere as worthy of imitation, if we heed the principle of the Gospel."

That a man is really "making the cause of Christ first" by giving to the missionary society money that should cancel debts that are due, is a strange infatuation, indeed; and we agree heartily with Mr. Abbot in severely rebuking such immoral religiousness. These words of his are strong and true: "If we have any debts to God, they are these very debts to man. Nothing can be a debt to God which involves contempt or postponement of any debt to man."

Having made a good point against these erring brethren, it was unfortunate that Mr. Abbot did not rest his case, instead of punishing people who are not guilty, as he tries to do, in the following paragraph:

"When we are told that it takes three dollars to send one to the heathen—in other words, that seventy-five per cent. of all moneys contributed for foreign missions goes to pay salaries and keep the ecclesiastical machinery in running order—we see how easily secretaries and other officials may be led to look on all such donations as the 'brothers' as meritorious."

If Mr. Abbot has been told anything of this sort, he has been told what is not true. The American Board uses less than one-tenth of its receipts for running expenses; and, while the other missionary societies may not be able to show so good a record in this respect, none of them have ever expended for the purposes mentioned anything like the proportion Mr. Abbot charges them with using. This is a stale slander; and, if Mr. Abbot had taken pains to investigate the matter, he would have found it so. When he takes it up, and endorses it in this manner, he is guilty of something nearly if not quite as bad as putting into the missionary-box money owed for wood-bills.

The reason for our delay in noticing the last of the above paragraphs was a hope that we should see some statement in our exchanges that would give us reliable statistical information. The nearest approach to such information that has caught our eye is contained in the following item:—

According to Dr. Mullen, long a laborer in India, and one of the best missionary authorities probably in the world, the following are the totals of foreign missionary statistics: Missionaries, 5,033; societies, 50; and the whole amount expended in carrying on these missions last year, $5,164,670. In Great Britain, there are 21 societies, who employ 970 missionaries, at an expense the last year, ascertained, of $2,793,145. In Germany and other continental countries there are 13 leading societies, supporting 425 missionaries at an expense of $573,775. In the United States, eight leading societies or boards, having 542 missionaries and an expenditure of $1,530,710. Besides these societies, there are in all these countries more or less of societies operating for the Jews, and having, in all, 96 Jewish missionaries.

We have no desire whatever to misrepresent the missionary societies; but we shall remain convinced of the substantial truth of our first impressions until they are corrected by indubitable testimony. According to Dr. Mullen, over five millions of dollars are annually expended in sustaining foreign missions. What is the annual total of "conversions" effected? And what proportion of this vast sum is expended directly on the "heathen?" We believe that fully "seventy-five per cent." of these five millions is absorbed in salaries and running expenses of various kinds, and that a sum falling far short of the residual twenty-five per cent. remains to benefit those for whom the whole is ostensibly raised. We commend to the attention of our not unkindly critic a very significant passage in "The Wheel of the Law; Buddhism Illustrated from Burmese Sources. By Henry Alabaster, Esq. London: Truebner & Co. 1871." On page xxiii. of the Preface of this very recent work, will be found the following statements by the author, a gentleman who has lived many years in Siam, (the italics being ours):—

"The missionaries again and again feel hopeful that the day of conversion is at hand, yet are ever doomed to disappointment. I cannot but think that the money and energy expended on their work is in a great measure lost, and that the labor of many of them would be better employed in their own country. It is a pity to see good men, who might be of use in their own country, doomed to a life of disappointment in an unhealthy and enervating climate. It is a pity to see good Buddhists turned into bad Christians; and I am afraid that the Protestant missionaries could not produce one good Siamese Christian for each ten thousand pounds that has been devoted to their work. They may have a few sincere and intelligent Chinese and Burmese converts, but Siamese converts, if any, are very rare."

If such representations as these of Mr. Alabaster are true (and they are not unsupported), what becomes of the five millions of dollars annually spent on foreign missions? Who gets the benefit of them? It will take something more than the "Reports" of interested parties to convince us that the greater portion of this golden stream does not sink into the sand of ecclesiastical organizations. The whole system of foreign missions, judged by its actual results, is a stupendous fraud upon credulous Christendom; and we speak only our most deliberate conviction when we say that the world would be incalculably better off without it. It drains into profitless or worse than profitless channels the wealth that, wisely used, might accomplish an untold amount of genuine, solid good to man. It squanders the best sympathies of the people on utterly visionary and chimerical objects, and to that extent impoverishes every enterprise that aims at valuable ends. In order to "save souls" from dangers that exist only in the heated brain of the Christian delusionist, it causes a frightful neglect of educational and social reform. In a word, humanity has to-day no worse enemy than this propagandist spirit of Christianity and the various ecclesiastical organizations it creates, which are but so many quicksands swallowing up the best energies, aspirations, and resources of the world. Dissipate the vast illusions on which the entire system rests, and you will set free the great moral and social forces for the work of making human life, here and now, what it might be and ought to be. Speed the day when intelligence rather than superstition shall direct the generous instincts and efforts of the human heart!

"Manhood ennobles all ancestors," says Mr. Weiss. That sentence is a grand application of Darwinianism. Personal worth is paramount to all other considerations, and reflects glory on those whose upright and healthful lives made possible a fine personality in their offspring. To be a sneak is to convict your progenitors of sneakiness. To be a hero is to wreath their heads also with laurel. This is the American doctrine of pedigree, that parents are ennobled by their children, and that he who would not vilify his ancestors must see to it that he betters their example. The royal soul proves its own royal descent. Let us put crowns on the heads of our parents by showing ourselves kingly in character, and thus obey the law of Nature—"Honor thy father and thy mother."

Would you know what God is? Do a noble act when it costs. But you will not be able to tell what you know.

NON-RESISTANCE.

A few months ago we received the appended note from Mr. Alfred H. Love, of Philadelphia, the genial, large-hearted President of the Universal Peace Union. An enclosed circular announced the fifth anniversary of the Union at New York, May 10, and would have been published in THE INDEX at the time in compliance with Mr. Love's request, if it had not arrived too late to be of any avail. In our reply to his note, we promised to comment on it in these columns, and would now apologize to him for the long delay in the fulfilment of this promise. The note was as follows, being postmarked Philadelphia, but without date:—

F. E. ABBOT, ED. INDEX:

My good friend,—Here is another call for a Peace Convention. If in time, please insert.

Thou loves peace, and yet dare not take the stand that peace is disturbed and war provoked by taking the sword. The North ought to have been above such a wicked act—an act that involves murder. Life is an "inalienable right." Let us hold to that.

Perhaps thou may choose to insert the letter enclosed.

I have much to thank and commend thee for in thy paper. It is a light in the world. It is a staff for mankind everywhere.

Thy assured friend,

ALFRED H. LOVE.

P. S. I carry THE INDEX to our Free Reading Room, and put it on the files.

Is the doctrine that "life is an inalienable right" inconsistent with the right of self-defence? What shall be done in case any one is determined to alienate it? Shall we allow a murderer to take our life, rather than take his in self-protection? Whose life is inalienable, that of the peaceful citizen or that of the assassin? In a case such as this, where one of two lives must be sacrificed, is the lover of peace under moral obligation to yield his own life rather than take the life of a would-be murderer?

Questions such as these, in our opinion, are not hard to answer. Life is not "inalienable" in any sense that forbids self-defence. The public conscience of mankind has always so adjudicated. We never believed either in the abstract right or the practical feasibility of the doctrine of non-resistance. With all deference to our good Quaker friend, we submit that there is no question of "daring" in the ground we take concerning war. It is rather a question of conviction.

We are quite willing to "take the stand that peace is disturbed and war provoked by taking the sword." But who disturbs peace and provokes war? The assailant, of course. And when peace is thus disturbed, how shall it be re-established? By submission to any evil rather than that of resistance? By no means. The North had to choose between war and the universal extension of Slavery. It did right to choose war—right in the abstract, right in the concrete. Life is worth less than liberty; and he who would save his life at the expense of his liberty is unworthy to live. Bloodshed is indeed a terrible crime; but the guilt of it lies with him who forces on his brother-man the alternative of slavery or death.

These principles are the same whether applied to men or nations. They are our profound convictions, which we hold and promulgate in deference to nothing but right reason and sound morals. And we think that the Universal Peace Union will accomplish little, so long as it counsels the attacked to be peaceably murdered, rather than the attackers to cease the attack. War ought not to be avoided, if the only alternative is national death or national slavery.

FREE THOUGHT NOT INDIFFERENCE.

"Many people seem to think that there cannot be perfect fellowship on the ground of free thought, without the loss of all deep and earnest conviction. If belief is to be considered of no account in determining the lines of fellowship, is it not inevitable, it is asked, that it should come to be regarded as of little account from any point of view? If all honest thinkers are to be respected without regard to the conclusions at which they arrive, will not those who seek intercourse on this principle be very apt to feel that it makes no difference what conclusions are reached—that one kind of belief, or of non-belief, is just as good as another, and that therefore it is of no consequence that any one should urge his opinions for the acceptance of others, or even that he should hold any opinions with firmness and distinctness? Does not free thought logically and practically lead to indifference in belief?"

Now there is, doubtless, on the part of those who are desirous to establish a free fellowship in matters of religion, some temptation in this direction. The natural feeling will be, for the sake of courtesy and harmony, to seek and to dwell upon those points wherein all can agree, and to hold one's special belief in reserve. Especially is this likely to be the case in first establishing the conditions of freedom. In order that all truth-seekers may not only be included, but may feel themselves included, there is danger that some persons should keep silent concerning convictions that are really dear to them, and which they believe important to mankind. And this is a danger, certainly, to be considered and to be guarded against.

But the logic of free inquiry and free thought would lead in exactly the other direction; and those who most thoroughly comprehend what fellowship on the basis of free thought means, are probably least liable to this kind of temptation. They understand that spiritual liberty signifies not only freedom of thinking but freedom of utterance, and that there is no more real liberty where one is bound to keep his convictions silent, out of courtesy or for the sake of a harmonious platform, than there would be if he were bound to the same course by the articles of a creed or a constitution. Freedom is only a means to an end, and that end is the promotion of truth and virtue. The primary object of fellowship on the basis of free thought is to secure a wider and fairer field for truth and right to win their triumphs. It is an object that admits of no concealment of individual conviction and of no compromise. On the contrary, by the very conditions of such a fellowship, the right is guaranteed to every person, not merely to hold such convictions as his own free thought may justify, but to offer them as opportunity offers, with all the ability and vigor he can command. We may say that this is not only his right, but his duty. He is, of course, under obligation to speak courteously, respectfully, but candidly, firmly, boldly, keeping back nothing of his belief out of regard to the feelings of a fellow-member sitting by him who holds different opinions, but only pledging himself that he will listen candidly, courteously, respectfully to that member's utterance of his beliefs. This is just what fellowship on the basis of freedom means—not necessarily conciliation of opinions, not necessarily harmony of thought, not at all the securing of the appearance of harmony by the voluntary suppression of one's convictions, but the free expression and respectful reception of convictions however different.

And this condition of association, when most perfect, will be found to be most remote from indifference in matters of belief. Variety of opinion will be assumed and expected. But earnestness and vigor in the defence of one's opinions will be equally expected. If one is an earnest theist, and believes, as an earnest theist is most likely to believe, that the conviction of a Supreme Being, as intelligent creator and providence of the universe, is very important to human welfare, he will speak so as, if possible, to get his convictions accepted. If one believes that theistic faith is born of ignorance and superstition, he will be equally frank in opposing it. If one is a "Spiritualist," he will freely state his belief and the grounds for it; or if he believe "Spiritualism" an error and productive of harm, he will be just as free to give his reasons against it. Whatever one's belief, free fellowship must be conditioned on the right and duty of giving it utterance, not on the courtesy of keeping it silent—on respect for all earnest belief, not on indifference to it.

W. J. P.

THE PRIEST AND THE PROPHET.

II.

In a recent article on this subject in THE INDEX, I remarked upon the conflict between the priest and prophet, and the violence and persecuting tendency seemingly germane to the priestly function and character. The course of religious history is, to a large extent, the records of the persecution of the prophet by the priest.

But when we look more narrowly, a strange fact comes to view. Although the priest always persecutes the prophet, it is always in the name of some other prophet, who once tasted the bitterness of human hatred himself. The Jewish priests crucified Jesus in the name of "Moses and the Prophets;" but fourteen centuries afterwards, the priests at Constance burned Huss in the name of Jesus. When Mohammed arose in Arabia, he was persecuted in the name of the existing religions with their elder sanctions; but not long ago they massacred thousands of heretics in Persia, in the name of Mohammed. And so on, with many illustrations.

The explanation of this striking fact I believe to be this,—that religious development has necessarily followed the course of social progress; that is, progress by a series of steps, with imperceptible gradations between, each of which steps or advances has received its impulse from a tyranny, or powerful personal domination. The great man is a necessity in the first gathering and slow organization of society. Human institutions necessarily set out with tyrannies. They arise by the will and power of some person who happens to be strong enough to compel others to serve him. Probably no other truth is better established by modern science than that human society began in the savage state. All Edens and similar abodes of primal bliss when man was first created, are dreams in which humanity has mistaken the soul's prophetic promptings of its high destiny for traditions of a glorious origin. Comparing its actual self with the splendor of its dreams, mankind conceived of a degeneration from blessedness, not perceiving in its despondency that it was working out its salvation during immense, but progressive, periods of moral creation. Science in many departments, physiological, geological, biological, ethnological, historical, philological, has proved that human society is a growth from utter ignorance and brutality; that the first men were even indefinitely lower than our usual idea of the savage, beings just attained or attaining to humanity, ferocious, wild, without society, language, tools, arts or shelter, probably without conscience or any idea of God. The first step towards the social union of such beings is their subjection to some individual who has more will, more cunning, and more strength than the rest; and such an individual is the first great man. His pursuit of power and pleasure is the initiation of society; and he begins a long line of great men who form the governing classes of kings, soldiers, landlords and traders, all of which we are now studying how to dispose of in the present social order, which has begun to get beyond and above them. Centralization, which means despotic power, is assaulted on all sides by the claims and influence of local association, or freedom.

Similarly we must interpret the history of religion and its relation to the prophet. The prophet is the great man, necessary to give impulse to moral subordination, but like other great men enslaving his fellows, naturally resisted in the progress of things, and finally cast out of the world's life altogether, as quite foreign to the present, though remaining a grand and impressive shape in the past. Often the prophet is absolutely disinterested; he is essentially so in proportion to the integrity of his prophetic aspirations. Such, I believe, were the great Hebrew Seers; such, to my interpretation, was Jesus; such also was John Huss, and many others of equal virtue but obscure names. It is the hard fate of such men, time and circumstances permitting, to enslave mankind in spite of themselves. They generally overthrow one spiritual bondage, but their powerful impression upon the world hardens in time into as oppressive a yoke as they destroyed. The great prophet inevitably creates the priest, the hierarchy, the over-awing church, the binding ritual, analogous to the governing classes in political progress. It becomes accordant not only with the priest's interests, but with his honest fanaticism, founded on the great personality of the prophet, to perpetuate by every means the spiritual serfdom of society; until, at last, when the oppression and stagnation become unsupportable, another great prophet is sure to rise to undo the involuntary work of his predecessor, and give the world a new start in its pursuit of liberty. Thus did Jesus overthrow Moses; thus did Christianity, which Paul endeavored to enforce as freedom from the law, re-judaize itself in the tyranny of the Mediæval Church; and thus did Luther arise for its purgation. It is significant that Luther's name is now at the head of a sect. Mohammed, Swedenborg, George Fox, and many others besides Luther, prove that other names than that of Jesus may inspire ecclesiastical enthusiasm. It can hardly admit of a doubt that if, in the sixteenth century, the name of Jesus had become identified with a society as corrupt and dead as that of Judaism and the surrounding world of the first century, some great soul, arising with prophetic power, would have superseded Jesus in our religious love and veneration and in ecclesiastical authority, as Jesus put out the smoking torch of Moses.

The men who are now trying to chain the world to forms, creeds, and priesthoods, are actuated, they tell us, by devotion to the name of Jesus. Let them awake to see that they are his greatest enemies. He will be preserved to us, and his influence and inspiration be both wholesome and venerated, so long as he inspires in us what was the secret of his own prophetic grandeur—freedom. If it be sought to put Jesus above humanity, God will not lack means to sink him in humanity. If the world be again given over to formalism and death in his name, a new prophet will surely arise for its salvation, and Jesus will disappear as Moses did before him. If this seems impossible to us, so did it to the Jews. Let us be wise in our day and generation.

J. V. B.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

I am looking westward again, my last New England meetings for the present being yesterday in Ashfield, a beautiful little town in western Massachusetts. The bracing breezes from the lofty hills and woods, and the brooks and streams which continually come laughing and leaping down their rock-ribbed sides, all sing songs of freedom; and a goodly number of the industrious, well-to-do inhabitants are learning to appreciate them, and have organized a Free Religious association. Some are perhaps almost Materialists, others Spiritualists, with all the "Phases of Faith" between; but all co-operate harmoniously to sustain a common cause. Subscribers to THE INDEX there hold varied forms of belief on many questions, but all like its ability, tone, and temper, and in Mr. Church you have a most valuable local agent,—such as I wish you might have many of in other places.

With his characteristic good taste and judgment, Hon. Geo. Wm. Curtis has fixed in Ashfield his summer retreat; and with his well-known liberality in religious sentiment and more material consideration, he is of invaluable service to the new Society there.

It is only eighteen miles down to Florence, where Mr. Burleigh has labored so long and well in the cause of religious freedom. I heard excellent report, too, of the success of Miss Powell, his newly-installed colleague. She has already accepted invitations to exchange with neighboring Unitarian ministers, and given remarkable satisfaction, as I was told.

For fertility and beauty both, it seems to me the valley of the Connecticut river is the pride of New England. It should include, however, a town or two on each bank inland, to frame the river into mirrors of pictures. But did ever mortals have to make more humiliating confession than this, namely, that thousands and thousands of those magnificent acres to-day literally stink with their heavy but sickening crops of tobacco?

Next Sunday, I have an engagement in Linesville, near Meadville, in Pennsylvania, in connection with some evening lectures near by in Ohio. Then I proceed on farther west, my books still open to calls for evening and some Sunday lectures.

Be assured the fields are white, the harvest great; but the laborers who wield our sickles are indeed few.

P. P.

Mr. H. L. Green, the Secretary of the Syracuse Radical Club, writes to us:—"Our Club gets along finely and attracts much notice in this section." It is no more than justice to Mr. Green to add that the Club's prosperity is in no small measure due to his own energy and untiring zeal for liberal ideas. The results that can be accomplished by such qualities are surprising to one who does not know their power.

The Club has recently published in tract form a fine little essay by James G. Clark on "Dogmatic and Real Religion," originally printed in the Golden Age. Mr. Green will send it by mail for $1.25 per hundred copies.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

FULTON ON THE RIOT.

TREMONT TEMPLE.—Rev. J. D. Fulton, D. D., will preach to-morrow at 10½ A. M. and 3 P. M. Subject in the morning—How to use Liberty, and by love serve one another; or the New York Riot and its Lessons.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Again, Mr. Editor, I must intrude upon your time and, perhaps, patience, by calling your attention to another of Dr. Fulton's off-hand, sensational, inconsistent and most unrighteous sermons, delivered upon the above subject. Permit me to refer you to the enclosed description from the Boston Times, of the man, his audience and their appearance on that day; nearly all of which I can heartily endorse, and which might be interesting to some of your readers.

But no review of this remarkable discourse is there-in contained, which fact impels me to forward this article for the purpose of criticising one of its most objectionable features.

Most remarkable, I would say, because, as you recollect, in my last article I informed you that Dr. Fulton, with other pastors and leading men of their several Churches, signed a petition against Sabbath-day parades, marches, and escorts, for the purpose of preventing Colonel James Fisk's regiment from holding religious services on the Common, on Sunday, June 18th.

This petition, addressed by the New England Sabbath Association to the Massachusetts State Government and to the City Government of Boston, received over 21,000 signatures before the eve of June 16th, 1871.

This virtuous refusal from the laws of Boston's puritanic ancestry daunted not the determination of the Colonel of the New York warriors to worship his Jehovah in a "temple not made with hands." Therefore an appeal was made to the authorities of our sister city, Charleston, which, following in the track of the holy "hub," vetoed also the Colonel's pious request. Congratulations were interchanged by the saints of Boston and Charleston upon their success in preserving their sanctified Sabbath and consecrated ground from desecration on the Lord's Day.

You may inquire, Mr. Editor, where is the connection between these facts and the discourse? It is right here. His subject being "the riot and its lessons," he maintained the equal right of the Orangemen (Protestants) and the Hibernians (Catholics) to parade, which we do not dispute, while at the same time his prejudices were so strong against liberty being granted to a regiment to hold a meeting on Boston Common, as to lead him to petition that it be suppressed. He not only keeps one day of the week (Sunday) sacred, as he calls it, because, as he supposes, God commanded the Jews 4,000 years ago to rest on the seventh day, Saturday, but he also thinks he has the right to compel every one else to do the same, or, what amounts to the same thing, restrain their liberty; while he believes that 200 Orangemen have the right to outrage the feelings of their own countrymen and fellow-citizens.

The inconsistency lies here: Had James Fisk and his regiment been active members of the Young Men's Christian Association and desired the Common for religious services, Fulton and his colleagues would have offered no objection, but would have overcome their squeamishness about parades on Sunday as they did in war times; and instead of being disturbed by these religious devotions, would with their congregations have joined in the procession or escorted it to the Common, and there attentively and venerationly listened to Chaplain Flagg's interpretation of God's Holy Word.

I thus judge, because it is right for Protestants to disturb and persecute Catholics, but not for Catholics to disturb and persecute Protestants; for this unwise divine in his discourse dilated long and fluently upon the wickedness of the Catholics persecuting the Protestants, but lightly passed over the fact that power finally came into the hands of the 200,000 Protestant minority; and that under the reign of their Protestant King they controlled and compelled the 800,000 Catholic majority to pay tithes to them, and support a religion that they disbelieved and hated; and that they drove thousands from the kingdom. Not one word of pity or sympathy did he express for the poor persecuted Catholics.

Now I affirm that religious persecution or proscription of the Catholics in Boston, in spirit, is as rabid as when ears were cropped, foreheads branded, and Quakers hung and expelled from the Colonies.

Fulton says virtually, I keep Sunday as a Sabbath sacred to my God; and so must you. You shall not disturb me in my worship, but I will disturb you as I please, and outrage your feelings by my devotions. Orangemen shall be protected in their right to parade, but you shall be prevented on my sacred day from doing anything offensive to me. The sanctity of my Sabbath shall be preserved, no matter what it deprives you of, nor how much it interferes with your rights or is opposed to your ideas of true worship and of a God.

Is not this inconsistent? Further comment is unnecessary.

NOT A FREE RELIGIONIST.

[We have no room to copy the extract enclosed. But our spicy correspondent has done the subject ample justice.—ED.]

DISGUSTED.

ADEL [IOWA] Aug 4 71

MR. FRANCIS E. ABBOTT.

Dear Sir, Since Jan'y 1 I have received your paper, (The Index) much to my disgust and have repeatedly ordered it stopped and refused to receive it. was called home to New York the first of Feb. and now, on returning I find it still coming to my address. In the first place I don't go much on your "Free Religion" and in the next place I never shall. Now the best thing you can do is not to send it to my address any more. I count it a disgrace to be seen taking it from the office or countenancing it in any shape. You are wasting your paper when you send it to me. I have got a head of my own, after my mother's own heart and propose to exercise my own mind in those matters so please discontinue at once and oblige one who will never be a Subscriber. you cant collect any thing off me.

Yours Truly

M. B. COLE

[We should regard the above irresistible letter, which we print with orthography and punctuation unchanged, as an ample equivalent for a year's subscription to THE INDEX. As a matter of fact, Mr. Cole's name was sent to us as one of a large club, together with money to pay for six months' receipt of the paper—we presume by his own order. No order to "stop it" has been received, to our knowledge. We congratulate our disgusted friend on having "a head of his own after his mother's own heart," and solemnly disavow all desire to "collect anything off him," or it.—ED.]

IN MEMORIAM.

Died in Hyde Park, Mass., July 26, 1871, Mrs. Sarah M. Stuart, aged 40.

The calmness with which she met her death by the scalpel in the hands of her attending surgeon, may be seen from her letter below, written only a few hours before she died.

For the last quarter of her life she had suffered from an internal tumor, the pain of which she bore from day to day and from year to year without a murmur, and the uncomplaining fortitude with which she endured so long a period of invalidism excited the sympathetic admiration of all who knew the history of her complaint. Hers may be considered one of those cases to which the religion of humanity points as illustrating the triumphs which it achieves over all that is factitious in our hopes and fears. Mrs. Stuart gave direction that no mediæstic or clerical ceremonies should be had at her funeral. She believed that in correct views of nature and the constitution of things we find no more reason for the fear of death than for fear of life before birth. Temperament, together with education and surroundings at the same time, determines the degree of composure we may be conscious of in view of immediate death. Of Jesus it is said, he was agitated, "exceeding sorrowful," and distressed at the idea of dying, when he thought his time had come. So I have known many Christians, Ministers, and even modern mediums, who, as they come to view death near at hand, were bewildered with fear, and believed themselves, as Jesus did, forsaken of the God in whom they had trusted.

The mind of Mrs. Stuart had been polished by education, and she was an artist by profession. She was liberal in her views and always in the front ranks with those engaged in the progressive reforms of the age. Her early exit from life is mourned by a large circle of friends.

Here is the last letter she ever wrote:—

To LA ROY SUNDERLAND, Quincy, Mass.

Dear Father:—

I am about to have a surgical operation performed; and, although I am hopeful, and expect to come out all right, there is, of course, some risk to run, and in case it might not prove favorable, I write to assure you that it is my own desire to have a chance for health or death. I have not written you anything about it, in order to save your feelings beforehand, as I feel it would be unnecessary, and I could not bear it as well knowing you were worrying about it. So, if I never see you more, remember we must accept the inevitable.

Shall have three surgeons—Dr. Margaret B. Brown, and Dr. Wm. S. Brown of Stoneham, and Dr. Cutter of Woburn, all skilful physicians; and I have perfect confidence that everything possible will be done for me. Now I hope to have the pleasure of telling you all about it; if not, good-by. I prefer to die rather to continue a year or two longer dying by inches. Love to Martha and the Capt. I thank her for her kindness to you. Shall send her a small token of remembrance.

My last letter is to you, my Dear Father.

Your Daughter,
SARAH M. STUART.

"Farewell! My soul shall weep,
While Memory lives;
From wounds that sink so deep,
No earthly hand relieves.

Farewell!"

THE NEW DISPENSATION.

BY S. B. M'CRACKEN.

[Concluded.]

We have spoken of those social and moral phases as phenomenal. No one of them depends upon the other, but they all depend upon a common stem, and that stem is GROWTH, and its product is individualism, or the endowing of each individual with a higher prerogative and greater responsibility in his or her own government. It would seek to make every man and every woman and every child, so far as it may have understanding, an independent republic in all things personal, acting wisely and justly through obedience only to the twin forces of knowledge and virtue. We add to the enumeration of moral phenomena, as forming in some degree the sum of the whole, Free Religion and Spiritualism. In the enumeration which has been made, it is not claimed that the terms used, or the conditions which they are intended to describe, are all new, while some of them are in greater or less degree synonyms of others. They are thrown together rather as suggesting topics of thought and analysis, than with the view of particularity and exactness. They are sufficiently related, however, to be grouped together in the same family, and present an array of horrors that may crack the walls of Maynooth and give Oxford the ague, if they do not transfix the amiable old gentleman who presides at the Vatican, or evoke the spirit of John Calvin, armed with a basket of charcoal, a roll of brimstone, a compound blow-pipe, and a string of infant skulls, for experimental purposes; to say nothing of the Liberal Christian which aims so as to hit if the game be a deer, and miss if it be a boy.

Some of the adherents of some of these ideas may deem themselves associated in strange company. But it is well that they should understand who their neighbors are, because, if they cannot affiliate with them, they had best seek other company. In other words, the class of ideas that we have grouped together are the germinal forces of the new dispensation, or rather the first visible growth from their forces. They but certify the freedom-time of man. They tell us that the members of the family have become of age, and are competent to think and act for themselves; they are the diplomas of graduation in the great seminary of human history. They represent the individualism of the time, which in our first article we placed in juxtaposition to its opposite absolutism. Referring further to the line of thought in that article, they may be characterized as the blocks that form the fabric of Reason or Rationalism in the moral world, in the scale opposed to Authority, of which Rome is the highest embodiment. These ideas taken separately command a large number of adherents, while there are, perhaps, comparatively few who would give their adhesion to them as a whole. It is therefore important, as has been said, that individuals should know where they stand with reference to the class of ideas, so that, if they cannot act with them—that is, on the side of Reason—they may go to Rome; and it is important that the ideas should understand their relation to each other, in order that they may act together.

There is a divine harmony manifest in the order of this new development. Had a pure Rationalism been presented to man fifty years ago, for his acceptance as against Authority, it would have found no adherents, and Authority would have remained master of the field. The principle, however, presented in the second form of manifestation that we have named, with others, has secured for each particular form adherents that it could not have secured for the whole, and by this process a party must be evolved that shall comprehend the whole; for, as the individual mind comes to embrace one or more of the several ideas, it sees the correspondence and connection of the whole, and is thus prepared to embrace the whole. For really they are equally favored with the anathemas of the conservative or absolutist party, and come to have a common sympathy from being made the objects of a common abuse.

The same antagonist elements are at work in Europe as in this country, but with what different results, especially in the Catholic countries! There every phase of the manifestation of Rationalism has been put down by the authority of the church, until the whole combustible mass is aflame beneath the foundations of society. Europe at this moment rocks and sways over a sea of lava, under the name of Communism or Internationalism. These are the hot mass fused from the several components which in this country have manifested themselves in a less harmful way, because of the different character of our institutions, the absolutist principle not having yet concentrated its power upon us. The two forces are identical, both in Europe and America. With us the development from the old to the new dispensation promises to be by more natural processes; but we can hardly expect that it will be free from bloodshed in the future, as we are painfully aware that it has not been in the past. Communism in Europe, the noxious gas evolved from the decaying forms of freedom's babes, birth-strangled by the double-knotted cord of Church and State despotism, must pioneer the work that shall establish the rightful reign of Rationalism—but at what cost, let its incipient manifestation in Paris prophetically suggest. We, here, must prepare to bear some of its burdens, and to suffer for some of its sins. For what the decaying remains of throttled freedom and justice have done and may do in Paris, it will be held that freedom and justice, which are the synonyms of Rationalism, will do in their full development in America. This ground will be assumed by the opponents of freedom here, although it would be just as reasonable to say that because the rotting compost emits foul odors, the fruit and the flavor that it nourishes must of necessity be bad. It is held by some that the person who is cut off before maturity must be developed to full growth in the spiritual realm, but by processes slow and tedious, because unnatural; while those whose earthly development is natural, drop the more naturally into the fruition of spiritual life. And further, that those who are developed in the spiritual world are the spirit nurses of the children of earth. Regarding the idea as a myth, it, nevertheless, serves as a predicate for the thought that freedom in Europe, strangled in its cradle, must be born to full stature through painful trials, and that he with whom freedom has enjoyed a more natural development, must trim the holy lamp which shall light stifled freedom to its goal.

The elements are ripe for a re-formation of political parties. The tendency is already apparent in conservative circles. Rationalism should beat to quarter. We need a broader political faith than we have had. We need a political faith that shall be a political religion. We have said that every State should have a religion, although we do not mean thereby an established church of the ancient sort. This thought, however, cannot be discussed here, but may form the basis of a subsequent article.

In our enumeration of radical ideas, we do not assume to determine the proportion of good and evil, or of rationality, or individuality in either. They all have both, in greater or less degree. We speak of them only in the aggregate, as entering largely into the foundation of the new dispensation. How important that the new structure be builded with care and skill! How important that it be endowed with a right spirit—with a religious spirit,—for religion is to the body politic what the soul is to the natural body. By this we do not mean a religion of dogmatism and supernaturalism, but of Rationalism and naturalism. This religion, we believe, must be found either in Free Religion or in Spiritualism. The old system in none of its dilutions—not even its latest attenuation of Unitarianism—will meet the demand. We are commanded not to put new wine into old bottles. The converse of the rule follows. We are to have a new heaven and a new earth. Let us rejoice.

DETROIT, Aug. 7, 1871.

A funny incident occurred in Newark, N. J., the other evening. A vestryman of the Episcopal church, after service in his own sanctuary, dropped in at the Methodist Episcopal church. He took a very conspicuous seat. Miss Laura Borden was addressing the congregation, and for a time the vestryman listened with interest. In spite of his efforts to overcome a disposition to doze he finally dropped his head upon his breast and became oblivious. The lady concluded, and the pastor followed with an invitation to all who desired the prayers of the church to stand up. The change from the soft treble of the lady to the sonorous base of the pastor disturbed his slumbers, and he awoke just in time to hear the last two words. Punctilious in his custom of observing the modes of worship of other denominations, he sprang to his feet, and was astonished to hear the pastor exclaim: "There's one poor sinner, thank God; let us all pray for him." The congregation and the pastor prayed long and fervently. Three times since has the sinning vestryman been called upon by the persevering pastor, and, ashamed to acknowledge that he had been "asleep in meeting," he has gone on a visit to a distant point to avoid the opportunity that besets him at home.—Ex.

Let us, if we must have great actions, make our own so.—Emerson.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

RIFLES, SHOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS, Gun Material. Write for Price List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [88-108.]

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 731f

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 731f

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B. C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (like on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88y1

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE, BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS,
Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published.
D. G. FRANCIS,
75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.

The advertiser, having been permanently cured of that dread disease, Consumption, by a simple remedy, is anxious to make known to his fellow sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge) with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure Cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.
Parties wishing the prescription will please address
EDWARD WILSON,
264 South Third Street, Williamsburgh, N. Y. 87-99

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (20 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER,

Secretary.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are especially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.
Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.
"It Injures Our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?
Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.
These four for 10 cents.
Address
CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

BOOKS BY MAIL.

BOOKBUYERS wishing to purchase the LIVE BOOKS of the day, can have their orders filled promptly by addressing

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher & Bookseller,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

The following Books, or any Book published in the United States, sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the publisher's price:

- The Origin of Species, By DARWIN, New Edition, $2 00
- The Descent of Man, By DARWIN, 2 vols, each.... 2 00
- Wallace on Natural Selection, (London)..... 2 00
- Mivart on the Genesis of Species,..... 1 00
- Man's Place in Nature, By HUXLEY..... 1 25
- Origin of Species, By HUXLEY..... 1 00
- Origin of Civilization and Primitive Condition of Man, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK..... 2 00
- The Earthward Pilgrimage, By M. D. CONWAY, (London)..... 3 75
- History of European Morals, from Augustus to Charlemagne, By W. E. H. LECKY, 2 vols. 8vo.... 6 00
- Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, By Prof. HUXLEY..... 1 75
- Chips from a German Workshop, By MAX MUELLER, vol. 3..... 2 50
- The Old Roman World, By JOHN LORD, LL. D. 3 00
- Short Studies on Great Subjects, By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE..... 1 50
- Lecture on Calvinism, By the same..... 75
- The Heavens, An Illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, By AMEDEE GUILLEMIN, (London) full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to..... 4 50
- Words and their Uses, By RICHARD GRANT WHITE, 2 00
- Steps of Belief, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE..... 1 00
- Nature and Life, By Rev. ROBERT COLLYER..... 1 50
- Sartor Resartus, By THOMAS CARLYLE, Cheap Edition..... 90
- The Choice of Books, Same..... 75
- Essays of Elia, By CHARLES LAMB..... 75
- Thoughts about Art, By PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON..... 2 00
- Words of Weight on the Woman Question, (London)..... 2 25
- The Friendships of Woman, By W. R. ALGER... 2 00
- A Day by the Fire, LEIGH HUNT..... 1 50
- Sanctum Sanctorum, THEODORE TILTON..... 1 50
- Carlyle's Essays, Riverside Press, 4 vols..... 9 00
- Among My Books, By J. R. LOWELL..... 2 00
- The Prose Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 2 vols..... 5 00
- Society and Solitude, By the same..... 2 00
- Topics of the Times, By JAMES PARTON..... 2 00
- Success and its Conditions, By E. P. WHIPPLE... 1 50
- Literature and Life, By same..... 1 50
- Tablets, By A. BRONSON ALCOTT..... 1 50
- Companions of My Solitude, By ARTHUR HELPS, 1 50
- Organization in Daily Life, Same..... 1 50
- Reahmah, By the same..... 1 50
- War and Culture, By same..... 1 50
- Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms, By same... 1 25
- Ten Great Religions, By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, 3 00
- Light and Electricity, By TYNDALL..... 1 25
- Our Girls, By DIO LEWIS..... 1 50
- Studies in Literature, By G. W. GRIFFIN..... 1 75
- Books and Reading, or What Books Shall I Read,—NOAH PORTER..... 2 00
- Principles of Psychology, By HERBERT SPENCER..... 2 50
- American Religion, By JOHN WEISS..... 1 50
- Fragments of Science For Unscientific People, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
- Light Science For Leisure Hours, By R. A. PROCTOR..... 3 00
- Handbook Of Legendary And Mythological Art, By Mrs. CLEMENT—Illustrated..... 3 50
- Hereditary Genius—Its Laws and Consequences, By FRANCIS GALTON..... 2 00
- The Races of The Old World, By CHAS. L. BRACE..... 2 00
- Little Women, By LOUISE M. ALCOTT..... 1 50
- Wallace's Review Of Darwin's Descent Of Man, PAPER..... 25
- Heat as a Mode of Motion, By TYNDALL..... 2 00
- Buechner on Force and Matter, (London Print)..... 3 75
- Essays, By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE..... 1 00
- Aristotle's Ethics, (Bohn's Edition)..... 2 00
- France before Europe, By MICHELET..... 1 00
- Roman Imperialism and Other Essays, By J. R. SEELEY. Author of "Ecce Homo"..... 1 50
- The Republic of Plato..... 1 25
- The Book of Golden Thoughts, By HENRY ATWELL... 1 25
- Colton's Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words..... 1 25
- Consolations of Travel, or The Last Days of a Philosopher, By SIR HUMPHREY DAVY..... 1 50
- The Poetical Works of HOOD, WORDSWORTH, SHELLEY, KEATS, MOORE, SCOTT, BYRON, full gilt, and on tinted paper, each only..... 1 75

Address,

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Publisher and Bookseller,
Toledo, O.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.
N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.
For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.
For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.
For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.
For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of FIVE CENTS.

- No. 1 The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion..... 1
- 2 What is Free Religion?..... 3
- 3 Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones..... 4
- 4 Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit..... 5
- 5 The Practical Work of Free Religion..... 6
- 6 Unitarianism versus Freedom..... 7
- 7 Sunday Schools..... 8
- 8 Friendship..... 9
- 9 Grief and its Compensations..... 11
- 10 The Hebrew Prophets..... 12
- 11 Capital Punishment..... 13
- 12 Human Ideals..... 14
- 13 The Essence of Religion..... 15
- 14 The Management of Children..... 16
- 15 A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. R. S. D..... 17
- 16 Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune)..... 17
- 17 The Candle of the Lord..... 18
- 18 Public Opinion..... 19
- 19 Conscience..... 20
- 20 The Pedigree of Man..... 21
- 21 "Following Christ"..... 22
- 22 The Tongue..... 23
- 23 The Golden Age..... 24
- 24 What is Truth?..... 25
- 25 The Last Battle on the Creed Question..... 26
- 26 Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams..... 27
- 27 The Sunday Question..... 28
- 28 Motes and Beams..... 29
- 29 The Dove's Departure..... 30
- 30 The Bible in the Public Schools..... 31
- 31 Religious Freedom..... 32
- 32 A Plain Talk to Young Men..... 33
- 33 Noise..... 34
- 34 The Humility of Free Religion..... 35
- 35 Chaos and Cosmos..... 36
- 36 An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt..... 37
- 37 Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion..... 38
- 38 War and Free Religion..... 39
- 39 Religious Revivals..... 40
- 40 Mary and Martha..... 41
- 41 The Ministry of Free Religion..... 42
- 42 Success..... 43
- 43 "Repentance" and "Forgiveness"..... 44
- 44 Spiritual Beauty..... 45
- 45 The Book of Daniel..... 46
- 46 The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter..... 47
- 47 The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition..... 47
- 48 Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin..... 47
- 49 The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin..... 47
- 50 Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise..... 47
- 51 Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers..... 48
- 52 Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham..... 49
- 53 Parties and Party Spirit..... 50
- 54 The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age..... 51
- 55 The Incarnation—Christmas Discourse..... 52
- 56 Transient and Permanent..... 54

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 36.

TOLEDO, OHIO, SEPTEMBER 9, 1871.

WHOLE No. 89.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VELA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE VOICES OF THE SEA.

[Read to the Unitarian Society in Dover, N. H., Sept. 1, 1867.]

"The Sea hath spoken."
ISAIAH, 23 : 4.

To-day, my friends, begins the fourth year of my ministry among you. Three times has the earth made its annual journey of nearly six hundred million miles about the sun, while I have stood here Sunday after Sunday to deliver my weekly message. Great travellers, surely, have we been together in these three years, whirling through the vast of space at the rate of sixty-eight thousand miles every hour; and great truths ought we to have learned together in our travels, to shine like flashing diamonds in the golden setting of our daily lives. What magnificent pages of infinite wisdom have been lying ever open before our eyes! What glorious voices, uttering the secrets of infinite love, have been ever pouring their inspiration into our ears! Surely we must have been dull of sense and sluggish of heart, if these three years, so crowded with divine intuitions, have failed to enrich our being with spiritual treasures. So, at the threshold of this new year of my ministry, I have paused to interrogate my own experience; I have paused to put to myself the searching question: "What have I learned of God and of life?" For better than he has learned can no man teach.

Revolving in my own mind afresh the reason why I venture before you so frequently with a spoken word, I have been compelled to ask myself what is the burden and tenor of this word, what its purpose, what its worth. If I would not talk as the fool talks, aimlessly and emptily, I must have somewhat to say; and it is as well for the preacher as for the trader now and then to "take account of stock." In beginning thus a new year, I would come face to face with myself; and, as a highwayman stops a passenger with a stern "Stand and deliver!" so would I challenge my own soul, and compel it to confess its profoundest faith. If there is any value whatever in this church, this pulpit, this ministry, what is the word I have to say to you—the message which justifies your gathering together and your patient listening?

Dear friends, I have long and anxiously pondered this question in my heart; and I have come to this conclusion, that the justification of my preaching and of your listening lies not so much in any particular word that I can utter, as in the fact that this weekly assemblage is a mutual confession, on your part and on mine, that human life, if not utterly shallow, must have a religious interpretation. I speak to you in the name and authority of no Church, no Scripture, no Messiah; I bring you only my own fallible thought and my own limited experience; yet you come and patiently listen, not because I am any wiser or any better than other men, but because our meeting here once a week is a perpetual reminder and recognition of great and eternal realities. The preaching, after all, is of small account; only one day in the week do I preach to you by word of mouth, while (a thought that fills me with concern) I cannot help preaching seven days in the week by my daily life among you. In fact, all of you are preaching to each other and to me daily sermons that are more audible than words; and even here on the Sunday the pews are ever preaching more audibly than the pulpit. I repeat it, the justification of our weekly worship, its whole worth and influence, consists in its being a common and spontaneous expression of our faith in eternal truths. You may dissent from what I say; yet if your consciousness of a Divine Law and a Divine Presence in all things becomes stronger because you are here, the end of my preaching is all accomplished. It is no aim of mine to bring you merely to my way of thinking; I am quite content if I bring you to think for yourselves earnestly and seriously, on the great problem of life and its duties. It would be impossible, therefore, for me to condense into any snug formula of words the end and object of my preaching; I seek only to keep before your minds and hearts the great truth that your lives should be lived, not merely in the world of practical pursuits, but also in the world of ideal aspirations and ennobling ideas.

As varied as life itself, then should my teachings be. Yet, fragmentary though they must be and are, one common spirit should run through them all, stimulating to more independent thought, sturdier fidelity to conscience, profounder remembrance and love of God. Unless your homes and hearts are at once holier and happier for the influence of these ministrations, unless you rest with a deeper acquiescence in the orderings of that Perfect Wisdom which folly only would wish to change, unless your whole lives are brought into a more perfect harmony with that boundless Love without which not a sparrow falls to the ground, then my words perish on the idle air, and it were better that I were dumb. What gain is there in your achieving clearer views of God's truth, if it fails to transfigure your characters with ideal beauty? Why should I seek to illuminate your understandings, if your hearts are no warmer, your spirits no purer, your lives no diviner than before? Believe me, I would make your thought freer and larger, that in this added freedom the power of eternal truth may more deeply penetrate into your souls, and build you up more perfectly into the divine life. It is nothing to me that you should think my thoughts, unless they lead you to a nobler and larger faith in the One to whom all thought points; and if, after candidly hearing the best I have to utter, you find the old truer to you than the new, my aim is wholly accomplished, provided the old acquires more beneficent influence over your lives in consequence of this re-affirmation. I seek, not to make proselytes to my opinion, but to make more fearless disciples of infinite truth, more earnest workers for the good of mankind, more trustful and pure and loving children of the Heavenly Father. And my message to you week by week is the best utterance, enforcement, and illustration that I can compass of this supreme object of all human living. To this end am I here in this pulpit; and because my heart is in the work, I love it daily more and more.

For two weeks past I have been dwelling beside the sea, and the best of preachers have I found it. Everlasting truths I have heard reverberating in the ceaseless thunder of its waves; and, instead of my poor voice, I would that you might even now be listening to that eloquence unapproachable. I can only speak to you to-day what the sea has been speaking to me. As I lay on the white sand of the beach, watched the grand advance of the surf as it curled upwards to its final plunge, and listened to its roar as it rushed towards me in sheets of foam, what cadence of human voice could compare with these awful tones of God in Nature? Surely, "The Sea hath spoken." More truly than my corporeal ear was filled with the noise of its inarticulate roaring, was my spiritual ear filled with the divine burden of its speech. And because, dear friends, I wish to give you ever the best and highest word that has come to me, and because in this grand oratory of the boundless ocean I have heard the audible voice of God, I will report in desultory fashion the substance of that sublime discourse. It is the best answer that I can give to the question why I stand in this place before you.

It is common to speak of "dead matter," "inanimate Nature." Such sayings are the ignorant babblings of a child. Nature is alive, and the last word of physical science is earnest testimony to its life. Throughout the boundless universe one mysterious Force presides, assuming countless Protean shapes, but ever remaining indestructible and the same. Science can at last demonstrate by balance and measure that all the physical phenomena of the universe manifest a single, all-pervading cause. Not an atom exists but is moving in harmony with the universal life. Nature is alive, and its life is the life of God. The same Power that is the law of human destiny guides the stars in their courses, speeds the sunbeam through the vast abysses of space, shoots the lightning round the globe, governs the invisible play of chemical affinities, rolls the tides in the wake of the full-orbed moon, holds alike the atom and the constellation true to their functions in the sublime economy of the whole. All natural laws are simply diverse manifestations and modes of a single, infinite, omnipresent Force. Yes, that divine power which men vaguely conceive as somewhere exerted up in the skies, is round about us in the solid earth we tread, in the air we breathe, in the green garments of the summer and the white vestments of the winter, in the very bodies of flesh, blood, and bone that obey our conscious wills. The activity of God we behold every moment of our lives in the changeless uniformities of Nature, to quarrel with which is to rebel against the wisdom they express. In that blue expanse of water which lies unbounded even by imagination before our eyes, and is alive all over with innumerable billows, we behold a visible manifestation of the omnipresent Mind, which invisibly, but no less really, reveals itself in the tossing ocean of human feeling and thought.

The Sea is a thing of life. Regular as the pulsations of the human heart, constant as the inhalations and exhalations of the human lungs, are the ceaseless motions of its waters; and, floating on its undulating surface, you are lapped in Eternal Being, and fondled by the Eternal Love. "God is not afar off in the invisible depths of the empyrean," preaches the solemn Sea; "He is here and now—behold and worship!" Amazing thought, that the mighty force impelling the vast host of breakers to dash upon the curving shore is the very same Power that rules the spiritual world, and governs alike the tempests and the calms of human life. Let us quit the search for God—we cannot escape him if we would; we can not open our eyes without beholding him; we cannot unseal our ears without hearing him; we cannot stir hand or foot without feeling him. In the stately periods of the eloquent Sea we hear eternal proclamation of the living God, the God that lives as truly in the shining spray that flashes with prismatic splendor, as in the soul of Jesus that illumines the page of history with a tender glow. Truly, "the Sea hath spoken."

Look out upon the seething surface of the great deep; what a maze of shifting lines, what bewilderment of forms passing endlessly into each other, what confusion worse confounded of waves rising and falling and chasing each other over the limitless expanse! Can the mind conceive a better type of absolute disorder than this vast labyrinth of billows? Yet this seeming type of lawlessness is really an instance, pre-eminent and astounding, of absolute harmony in apparent discord. Free as the waves may seem, they are controlled in every motion by unvarying law. Twice every day the waters rise and sink; the vast tidal waves, one on each side of the globe, follow the moon as faithfully as the flock follows the shepherd. No disorder there; the laws that rule the tides know no exception, and all is perfect harmony. And so the waves obey the winds, though science cannot as yet formulate the law. Expect no break in the grand procession of the tides and waves; order which the beholding eye cannot even in its elements comprehend, is perfectly maintained from the beginning to the end.

Herein is God made manifest to the pondering soul. He is revealed in order, as no disorder could ever reveal him. The steady ongoings of Nature and of life disclose an ever-active Intelligence which the notion of miracle can but fatally obscure. God is law; therefore there is no luck or chance or fortuity in Nature. God is love; therefore there is no luck, chance or fortuity in Life. The changeless order of things is only ORGANIZED BENEFICENCE; and to inculcate distrust of it by preaching miracle is secretly to bring back chaos to men's minds. Let others rest their faith in the interruption of law—I rest mine in its absolute immutability; for in that alone can I behold such a manifestation of Being as is worthy of my intelligent adoration, my boundless confidence and worship. If the course of this changeless law, the preservation of this absolute order, ever seems to conflict with my individual happiness, let me regard my wild wishes as uninstructed folly, and, instead of pouring out frantic prayers that the wise law of God may bend to my blind wilfulness, let me rather strive to discern the real benevolence of that law. If at the core of all things there beats an infinite Heart, love is the motive of law, and itself forbids the interruption of order for any fancied good of mine. In all the cares, wounds, and griefs of life, at last Time shows me the outflow of a fathomless Benignity, providing for me infinitely better than I can comprehend. The experience of my life has taught me to feel no fear in the very Valley of the Shadow of Death, and to cry with David of old, "Though thou slay me, yet will I trust in thee." The mighty Sea before me, full of an orderly motion which God alone can comprehend, is a pledge to me that my life also is governed by the same Presiding Power, before which I stand untroubled and unafraid. The bewildering march of the billows, tossing and leaping in a wantonness which to man is madness, but to God is method, becomes a symbol of human life, imaging by the ebb and flood of its tides the sorrows and joy that succeed each other in every human experience. Oh for a profounder confidence that here, too, all is the wise method of encompassing Love, the ordainings of a Wisdom that controls our destiny with unerring skill and fathomless tenderness! "The Sea hath spoken," and, heeding its tuition, my conviction grows deep and strong that we are forever embosomed in the omnipresent God.

One more lesson only from the preaching of the Sea, kindred, yet perhaps not precisely the same. I have spoken of the tides, how constantly and regularly they obey their law, and how order and harmony characterize their march around the globe. But I have not dwelt on what I might call the motive of this regularity, the mighty attraction of the Moon. Visible or invisible—now a full, round sphere of silver, now gibbous, now a slender crescent, and now wholly dark—the Moon still finds the same faithful following from the Sea. Clouds and storms may hide it; the earth may eclipse it; the glare of day may swallow it up; yet unforgetfully the Sea yearns for it and untiringly pursues it. The beautiful orb in the heavens, changeable as it is to our human eyes, changes not at all in the power of its attraction, but down to the deepest depths moves the faithful Sea that loves it evermore. The mighty heart of the Ocean throbs without pause, in constant fealty, and onward forever rolls the great tidal wave. What profound suggestions do we find in this unswerving fidelity of the Sea! Whether to our feeble spiritual vision God appears or disappears, whether he hides in the stormy night of sorrow or the dazzling day of joy, our hearts may yet glow with a love for him that shall make our actions true. Unlike the Sea, we are not constrained to follow him, or to live the godlike life against our wills; there is a margin left us for moral dereliction. But all the more beautiful becomes our voluntary allegiance and fidelity, and if we heed the lesson, the Sea will not have preached to us in vain. The grand, free virtue of a soul obeying because it loves, is the high worship that is worthy of humanity; and in this unforced, spontaneous tribute of faithful affection, is found a moral spectacle even more magnificent than the stately march of ocean tides.

Such, friends, has been the instruction of the Sea, which I have tried to rehearse to you afresh. The omnipresence of Infinite Power and Love, embracing us close as the air we move in—the absolute harmony and order of its working in the universe, and the inward repose that springs from a perception of this order—the divine beauty of a life which freely and comprehendingly obeys, because it loves, the perfect law of God—these great truths, preached to me so eloquently by the roar of the surf along the beach, what could I do but preach to you again in feeble human echoes of its strains? They are the grand burden of all my message from this desk; they can but clothe themselves in new forms and illustrations, remaining essentially the same; they are the power and the peace of God, if taken into our hearts and made the law of our lives. "The Sea hath spoken," and in its solemn speech are the audible voicings of that Infinite Life of which the entire universe we know is but a broken syllable. Let us hear and heed!

FAMINE-STRICKEN.

[From the Illustrated Christian Weekly, May 30.]

We do not expect often to find in THE INDEX anything to quote. It is the organ of "Free Religion." It "recognizes no authority but that of reason and right." It accounts the transition from Christianity to Free Religion as even more momentous than that of ancient Rome from Paganism to Christianity. There is nothing in common between such a journal and ourselves. Yet it has this much to commend it above some other journals of the same class, that it does not assume the name of Christ in order to attack his teachings. It disavows the title Christian. It professes to have found a new religion. We are no longer in the dark concerning the meaning of this new philosophy. It is avowedly anti-Christ. And an open enemy is better than a secret foe.

Its last number contains a letter from a lady once apparently a professor of Christianity, now a free religionist. Attracted by this new philosophy and embracing it with all the ardor of a new faith, she finds what she thought was a living God is only a stone statue. There is no answering embrace; no warm and inspiring heart. Like the child of the parable, she has asked for bread and her teachers have given her a stone. Hear her pathetic plaint:—

The preaching of many young ministers of this class [Free Religionists] seems a cold philosophical intellectuality, with nothing for the heart, nothing for the yearnings of the spirit. They pray, but at the same time acknowledge that they use the term God as a mere personification, or as standing for the Moral Ideal; thus involving an inconsistency, and apparently a want of honesty. Why use the form of prayer at all when it amounts only to a species of jugglery? Then, as to immortality, when the friend most essential to our earthly happiness passes from sight, and an inexorable silence stands opposed to our longings for continued communion, they have no word to give sufficient to rest our hearts upon and restore peaceful balance to our agonized spirit.

Here lies the embarrassment of many who are convinced that the only true and tenable ground in religious matters lies outside of the Bible and Christianity, and is to be found alone in the teachings of nature and the instincts of our own souls. From earliest days accustomed to exercise implicit, unquestioning faith in God, heaven, and immortality, as taught in their churches, they feel in a great degree bereft of that which gave support under trials and an impetus to effort, and find in comparison a cold, barren emptiness. Life seems robbed of its stimulus. The iron clutches of despair seem about to seize upon them, and they are ready to cry out in their perplexity, "Why live any longer?" . . . I am glad you promise to define, "What is Free Religion?" I trust you will show what scope, if any, it has beyond its exercise upon humanity, and what is the corner-stone of rest and trust for the spirit, as Jesus is in the Christian scheme.

There is not in the Bible a more pathetic story than that of Ishmael and Hagar. There is something inexpressibly touching in the picture of the mother blinded by her tears, and driven by her despair away from her God, laying her child down to die of thirst, close by the side of a springing fountain. There is something inexpressibly touching in this story of a woman, whose heart hungers for a personal Christ, robbed of him, and stricken with thirst, crying out for some fountain of life, while close by her side, unheard by her, stands the Ineffable One, saying, "Come unto me and ye shall find rest unto your soul." It is pitiful! pitiful! this flying of the dove that finds no rest for the sole of her foot; this yearning of a famine-stricken heart in the desert experiences of a Christless religion.

"What is the corner-stone of rest and trust for the spirit in 'free religion,' as Jesus is in the Christian scheme?" Consider well this question, you that would have Christ depart out of our coasts. Consider it well, you that are drawn on to follow after this shadow of a shadow, this mirage of a land of rest, this old, old infidelity that christens itself with a new name to escape the well-deserved odium that attaches to the mournful history of its past.

[The best answer to the above article will be another letter from the same accomplished lady who wrote the above-quoted extract, which we print with her permission. It is dated May 21, and although quite long, deserves publication in full, as we think our readers will themselves conclude after reading it:—

"I have just read in the last INDEX the communication from Mr. Howard, headed 'Rationalistic Methodism,' together with your comments upon it. Your assertion as to the 'decay of Methodist ideas' reminds me of a conversation I had in the cars last December with a highly intelligent gentleman, who, I found, was a clergyman of the Methodist denomination, and an officer of the Methodist Institution at —, Conn.

He took a seat beside me, and, being very kind and gentlemanly in manner, I readily responded to his genial manner in introducing some conversation. — suggested to him President Edwards, whom he recognized as one of the great spirits of his age, but at the same time expressed surprise that he could entertain such religious views as he did.

Conversation went on. I, with some hesitation at first, venturing to express my own convictions, was gradually drawn along to the utterance of the most startling ideas of Free Religion. Although expressing an inability to see the truth of some of them, with many he agreed, and was not shocked with any of them. He volunteered the remark, that, with my estimate of those views, it was right and good that I should cherish them.

I found at length that the doctrine of eternal punishment was one that had greatly exercised his own mind, and that he could not possibly reconcile it with his ideas of God as a loving Father. He dwelt very feelingly upon this subject. He said it had come up for discussion to a great extent in the Methodist Church, and was destined to shake it to its centre; that it would go through the whole body, and I think he predicted would divide it into two portions.

It was all surprising to me, as I did not know there was any tendency of that kind in the denomination. And it seemed to me a very significant fact that this gentleman, who was evidently a scholarly person, and one who occupied an important position in the Methodist Church, should express such liberal and progressive ideas as he had uttered in the course of our conversation. For some time, indeed, I took him for one of the 'Radicals' or 'Infidels' of the day.

And now I have my pen in hand, as I am sitting in the night-watches, occasionally ministering to a sick friend, I am tempted to talk on to you a little more. If you have not time to read further, my good friend, just throw aside this missive.

I would say to you that I have just returned to this place, where my INDEXES have been accumulating since the first of January; and it is with great enjoyment that I am reading them up to the present time. The fresh, live, rational views I find in them are like a glass of ice-water to the traveller in a hot, dusty railroad car. I have fallen in with very little of the spirit of Free Religion since I have been away from here, and have scarcely seen a number of THE INDEX. The only subscribers I have been able to secure are Mr. —, of —, and Mr. —, of —. Both of these are men quite advanced in years, and it is as pleasant as it is rare to find persons of age entirely emancipated from preconceived opinions. The former gentleman was one of the most zealous founders and supporters of the Tabernacle Church in New York. He has become entirely free, and entertains the broadest and most rationalistic views. This, in a man who in mature life would sell the carpets on his floors to raise money for orthodox foreign missions, is certainly remarkable.

In Philadelphia I heard the saintly Dr. Furness preach; but the beauty of his spirit was somewhat obscured to me by his taking the ground, in his Easter sermon, of the resurrection of the body of Christ by miracle. It seems to me wonderful that persons who get free from many old dogmas are yet held in bondage by others that consistency would require them to discard.

In Washington I was told that Unitarianism was not respectable. I went to the Methodist Church, where the President attends, and was sorry he could be refreshed for his ordinary duties by nothing better than the terrible pictures drawn by Dr. Newman of the agonies of wicked men. I attended service at the ritualistic churches of St. John, in Washington, and St. Luke, in Baltimore. I felt myself much more in sympathy with the Catholic Cathedral worship than with those aping imitations of professed Protestants, with their choir of white-robed boys, and their symbolic colors of purple, white, yellow, etc., for their different seasons. And—as I told the accomplished and interesting Father Mullaby, of the Jesuit College in Georgetown—if my religious faith were not as it is, I should join the communion of Rome, as alone consistent with taking authority as a guide.

The worship at the Synagogue of the Reformed Jews in Baltimore, was truly inspiring. It was almost entirely lyrical, and the bursts of music from the organ, in concert with the rich voices of the German choir, and in response to the intonations of the presiding priest, seemed to call for the uplifting of the everlasting doors, that the King of Glory might come in. It gave the impression of pure theistic worship.

May 26. I have now finished reading up the back INDEXES. Your discourses on the 'Warmth of Free Religion,' in answer to my questionings, written in a state of anxiety and mental unrest, which had been for months oppressing me, I find truly warming, cheering, and restful in their influence. And, I may add, perfectly in harmony with the spiritual condition into which I had already been inducted by your teachings and influence since the date of that letter. There is a rest, a joy even, in thus throwing oneself upon the bosom of the Universal, the Infinite, and working on as part and parcel of the 'Stupendous Whole,' in full faith that what we can find to do here-to-day, in harmony with, and furtherance of, the great principles of Nature which we are able to discover, must be wisest and best, come what will to us, in our comparatively atomic relation to the whole.

An excellence of these views, I think, consists in this, that they tend to quench that feverish self-consciousness, and give no place to that refined selfishness, which come from making one's own happiness in the Hereafter the chief pivot on which action turns. A more profound humility, that is, a juster estimate of one's own individuality, is another result of these views.

Hoping, etc., very truly yours."

Since we have published this beautiful letter (omitting only a few private references) as an illustration of the natural influence of the ideas of Free Religion, not on the mind alone, but on the heart as well, it is necessary for our purpose to add that we never met its author but once, and then only for a few moments, in a crowd, after the delivery of a public lecture. Nothing, therefore, is to be set down to the account of personal friendship—everything, rather, to the great inspiration and soothing power of Truth.—Ed.]

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON ON MARRIAGE AND MATERNITY.

[From the San Francisco Examiner, July 14.]

Mrs. Stanton delivered her lecture on "Marriage and Maternity" yesterday afternoon, before an audience composed exclusively of ladies, if we except the Chronicle reporter, to whom we are indebted for the extracts subjoined. The lecture has in it so many good points, so much of sound advice to female humanity, that it would be wrong to confine it to the small circle of those who were so fortunate as to be present at its delivery. We willingly give space in our columns to the most important subjects treated, believing that the dissemination of such information will work great benefit to every one of our lady subscribers. Mrs. Stanton says:—

"We must educate our daughters in this order: First—To regard their own lives and bodies, and the laws which govern them. Second—Their duty as parents. Third—Their duties as citizens. Fourth—To supply life with its luxuries and fopperies. But now we reverse this order. Our daughters learn music and worsted, and silly arts and accomplishments; but not a thought or word is given to their development as wives, as mothers, or as citizens. We, who have reached and passed middle life, cannot do much in this matter as concerns ourselves; but we can for our children—to train and teach them that their coming lives will find grand positions in their various spheres. I would have mothers feel that their daughters have full and equal rights in all things with their brothers; and that they are entitled to be so considered in the world's opinion. It is a divine right of woman that she may do, and do rightly, whatever it is right that man may do.

The idea that woman is weak inherently is a grand mistake. She is physically weak because she neglects her baths—because she violates every law of her nature and her God—because she dresses in a way that would kill a man. I feel it to be my mission to arouse every woman to bring up her daughter without breaking her up in doing so. Our female idea of dress is all wrong. My girlhood was spent mostly in the open air. I early imbibed the idea that a girl was just as good as a boy, and I carried it out. I would walk five miles before breakfast, or ride ten on horseback. After I was married I wore my clothing sensibly. The weight hung alone on my shoulders. I never compressed my body out of its natural shape. My first four children were born, and I suffered very little. I then made up my mind that it was totally unnecessary for me to suffer at all, so I dressed lightly, walked every day, lived as much as possible in the open air, ate no condiments or spices, kept quiet, listened to music, looked at pictures, read poetry. The night before the birth of the child I walked three miles. The child was born without a particle of pain. I bathed it and dressed it, and it weighed ten and a half pounds. The same day I dined with the family. Everybody said I would surely die, but I never had a relapse or one moment's inconvenience from it.

Another idea: It is of more importance what kind of a child we raise than how many. It is better to produce one lion than twelve jackasses. We have got jackasses enough; let us go into the lion business. Suppose our great statesmen, Clay, Webster, and others like them, had only had the society of refined and educated women, they would not have, as they did, looked upon women only in a physical light. If men have dolls for wives, they will seek the society of intellectual courtesans. We must have a new type of womanhood. We need it more than gold. Courtesans ruled France and brought her to ruin. Courtesans will rule this country unless woman rises to her true dignity. The old idea of the oak and vine is pretty, but it is mere poetry; the emergencies of life prove its falsity—the lightning strikes them both alike."

"DOCTORS DIFFER."

[The following two extracts, one taken from the Chicago New Covenant (Universalist) and the other from the Pittsburgh Christian Radical (Evangelical) will go well together. Which is the more liberal?—Ed.]

The horrors of the recent French Revolution were a legitimate result of scepticism. Gen. Henry, the insurgent chief, captured at Chatillon, was asked before his execution if he would see a priest. Here was a rare opportunity to make an impressive speech; nor was it allowed to pass unimproved. "No," said Henry; "I believe in no God—none of us do; we are of the universal and atheistical republic. Why should I waste my time by seeing any priest?" Radicalism focalizes in anarchy, and thus proves that it is illegitimate as a process of thought, and as an exponent of truth unreliable. All forms of scepticism and infidelity are fraught with mischief. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Don't pester yourself, reader, with uncertain reasonings, but wait and watch narrowly the practical result. "A good tree bringeth forth good fruits."—New Covenant.

Of their atheism much ado has been made. For this they have been freely anathematized by the press, religious and secular. And atheists they are in name, and perhaps, as far as may be, in practice. We make no apology, God knows, for their bloody and diabolical excesses, for their blasphemies and sacrilegious enactments against religion. But still they are men, and their conduct must find its explanation in some other more valid cause than the mere love of cold-blooded diabolism. The history of their insurrection will yet be written, and its true logic given.

And now while we make no apology for their unprecedented licentiousness, cruelty and their dreadful hostility to God and religion, neither do we make an apology for those proscriptive and bigoted religions that wrong and ruin men. For we know of no more cruel and devilish thing than a religion that consists of priestcraft, and that in the name of the great God and loving Father of all undertakes to trench upon and abridge the rights and liberties of the humblest souls—that in the name of the blessed and pitying Christ sets up the rack and the stake and builds the inquisition, either physical, mental or spiritual.

Our most solemn conviction is that the Commune—its irregularity, its repudiation of God, its downright atheism—is the logical result of priestcraft, the legitimate outcome of papal tyranny, the fruitage of a religion that in God's name and Christ's proscribed, robbed, over-rode and held commerce in the minds and consciences of men.

And if the atheistic Commune shot nuns and priests and bishops, let it not be forgotten that in the name of religion—of Christ and God—St. Bartholomew was made a day of carnival and blood. A tyrannous and bigoted religion will always produce atheism.—Christian Radical.

SOCIETY OF NATURAL SCIENCE—CORRESPONDENCE.

[From the Toledo Blade, August 24.]

EDITOR BLADE:—A call numerously signed by the members of the Toledo Society of Natural Sciences having been given to the Rev. F. E. Abbot, requesting that he would deliver a lecture before the said association during its winter or fall course, the following is his reply:

TOLEDO, Aug. 19, 1861.

Messrs. E. H. Fitch, Frank Drake, and others, members of the Toledo Society of Natural Science:

Gentlemen:—Please accept my thanks for the courteous invitation you have extended to me to lecture before your Society. I hasten to reply on the same day that it has reached me.

In accordance with your wish as privately expressed to me by the Secretary of the Society, I will select as my subject a question which is exciting universal attention at present, and will entitle it—"The Ascent of Man, or the Evolution Hypothesis as applied to the Human Species."

Private engagements oblige me to name either October 17th, or December 5th, as the time of the lecture, leaving to you the choice between these two dates and the selection of a suitable place. Regretting that I cannot name an earlier day in accordance with your suggestion, and hoping that no inconvenience will result to you, I am

Very truly yours,

F. E. ABBOT.

TOLEDO, Aug. 22, 1861.

REV. F. E. ABBOT: Dear Sir—We would name December 5th as the day for the lecture, the Sociable of our association falling on the 17th of October.

Yours, &c.,

E. H. FITCH,

Secretary Toledo Society of Natural Sciences.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I am in the same boat with you, so long as you do not advocate any creed. The stand taken by Moncure D. Conway, in England, against any creed meets my views exactly; and whether there is a God outside of Nature or not, so long as he does not manifest him or herself to man, so as to be unmistakably understood, I consider it beyond the capacity of man to fathom. If there is a God who takes cognizance of the actions and affairs of man, his omnipotence would have ordered a better and more harmonious state of things; his benevolence would have prevented such tremendous wars and human suffering; his omnipresence would have commanded peace and love; and his prescience would have foreseen and prevented all possibility of conflict, and the known and unknown sufferings of the human family. Reading the Bible and praying to the unknown Almighty God to give me light, thirty-five or forty years ago, terminated (against my desire and expectations) in making me a confirmed disbeliever in the creed doctrines of all denominations and sects, and of there being any divine revelation whatever to man outside of the laws of Nature—which are inherent, self-existing, eternal, and always in harmony, never conflicting. To similar harmony I desire that the whole of humanity may arrive, which my judgment tells me must be entirely by intelligence, if ever—free from all sectarian bias or creeds, or written revelations purporting to have come from God."

"I enclose my subscription for the ensuing year. Though I hardly know how to spend the time necessary to glance at many of the papers that come to me, yet I should be very unwilling to be without THE INDEX. If this time needs anything, it is courage, back-bone, and perfect sincerity. Such qualities are the salt that will yet save a world that just now seems going devilward with accelerated velocity. I say 'seems,' for the motion in that direction is not real but apparent. What would the orthodox of Edwards' day have said to R. H. Howard's treatment of Total Depravity, in your Dec. 24th issue, No. 52? Your excellent note does the work faithfully, and with one remorseless blow shatters the pleasant retreat an evangelical is building for himself. How strange it is that men with brains, who are combating these errors, will allow these orthodox to shift the position, to change the base, to plant themselves on natural ground, and then say they are orthodox! Why can't the liberal free-thinkers hold them up to clear, sharp definitions? Much of the force of the argument against their system is lost, because they misrepresent it, and the young people of the present day really do not know how horrible in its real essence it is."

"We take the most radical papers of the day, but none brings more digestible matter to the inner man than THE INDEX. May it live and prosper until it is better known and properly appreciated by all, is the wish of your friend."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be held for the present in GERMAN HALL, St. Clair St., on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE WILBURN FUND.—Additional donations for Miss Cora Wilburn are as follows:—

M. HIRSCH,	Franklin, Pa.,	$1.00
G. MOLNAR,	" "	1.00
N. HAGERMAN,	" "	.20
A. COCHRAN,	" "	1.00
J. DEMPSEY,	" "	1.00

RECEIVED.

RECENT DISCUSSIONS IN SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, AND MORALS. By HERBERT SPENCER, Author of "First Principles," "The Principles of Biology," "The Principles of Psychology," etc. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 549 & 551 Broadway. 1871. 12mo. pp. 234.

A FOUNDATION AND PLAIN INSTRUCTION OF THE SAYING DOCTRINE OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, BRIEFLY COMPILED FROM THE WORD OF GOD. Translated from the Dutch Language into the German, together with other Instructive Treatises written by the Author of this 'Foundation,' which were formerly published separately, but here appended, and the whole arranged as a Common Manual. By MENNO SIMON. Printed in Europe. A. D. 1565. Translated into the English by I. DANIEL RUPP. Published by ELIAS BARR & Co., No. 6, East King St., Lancaster, Pa. 1863. 12mo. pp. 420.

THE ILLUSTRATING MIRROR, OR A FUNDAMENTAL ILLUSTRATION OF CHRIST'S SERMON ON THE MOUNT. For all Lovers of the Truth, and to promote their observance of the Doctrines of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. By JOHN HERR. Translated from the German. Lancaster, Pa.: Published by ELIAS BARR & Co. 1858. 16mo. pp. 360.

NON-RESISTANCE ASSERTED: or the Kingdom of Christ and the Kingdom of this World Separated, and No Concord Between Christ and Belial. In Two Parts. By DANIEL MUSSEY. Lancaster, Pa.: ELIAS BARR & Co., Publishers. PEARSON & GEIST, Printers. 1864. pp. 74.

RICHIELE. As Performed by Edwin Booth. HENRY L. HINTON, Publisher, 680 Broadway. pp. 33. Price 25 Cents.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. Edited by Mrs. M. CORA BLAND. Indianapolis. September, 1871.

Poetry,

DIES NATALIS:

JUNE 14, 1871.

Oh mother with the ebon hair!
To thee thy dreamy boy has brought
His timid verses, poor and bare,
The first fruits of his childish thought;
And thou, with smile of tender grace
And look of mother-love divine,
Settest in alabaster vase
His drooping little columbine.

Oh mother with the silver hair!
To thee the bearded man has come,
And husky signs of visions fair,
Dear memories of his boyhood's home—
Sings of that far, love-hallowed time,
Sings till the blinding tear-drop starts;
A simple violet, take his rhyme,
And set it in thy heart of hearts.

ASTERISK.

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 9, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

For Special Notices see eighth page.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed; and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOOKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten	" 1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	" 1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	" 1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	" 1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	" 300
W. C. FRISK,	"	"	"	" 300
J. M. KITCHIE,	"	"	"	" 300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	" 300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	" 500
J. G. HOLZWARTH,	"	"	One	" 100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	" 100
C. AUCHARD,	"	"	"	" 100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	" 3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	" 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Three	" 300
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	Two	" 200
	Defiance,	"	One	" 100
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	" 100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	" 100
J. SEDGEBER,	Painesville,	O.,	"	" 100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	" 300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	" 500
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	" 100
J. L. WHITING,	Boston,	"	"	" 100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	" 100
J. E. SUTTON,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	" 100
S. I. DUKER,	"	"	"	" 100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	" 100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	" 1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	" 200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	" 200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	" 200
	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
FRANK PRATHER,	Wellsville,	Kan.,	One	" 100
E. F. DINSMORE,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	" 200
J. T. DICKINSON,	Middlefield,	Ct.,	Fourteen,	" 1,400
W. J. POTTER,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three,	" 300
G. C. GLATTE,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	" 300
W. C. GANNETT,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	" 300
MISS M. C. PERKINS,	"	"	One	" 100
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	" 100
MISS E. EMERSON,	"	"	"	" 100
W. H. DOWNES,	Birmingham,	Ct.,	"	" 100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing,	Mich.,	"	" 100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	" 100
W. C. RUSSEL,	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	" 100
WM. CLARKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Three	" 300
C. L. SMITH,	"	"	One	" 100
	"	"	Twenty	" 2,000
J. N. LYMAN,	Cincinnati,	"	One	" 100
L. G. FELCH,	Monroe Centre,	"	"	" 100
A. FOLSOM,	Boston,	Mass.,	Three	" 300
L. O. BASS,	Colebrook,	Conn.,	One	" 100
S. E. SEWALL,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
ELIZUR WRIGHT,	"	"	"	" 500

$27,300

Can any of our readers see the point to this little joke of Zion's Herald? Either the editor or the compositor must have just returned from an anti-prohibitory-law "love-feast":—

The Infidel Index is not against the New York riot, and fancies only free-religion can put down such Papist blood-thirstiness. To charge on Protestantism such a tendency, is as far wrong as for the one hundred thousand New York Romanists to charge the riot on the two hundred Orangemen. But this free-religion binds justice as bad as it does faith.

THE INDEX TO ITS FRIENDS.

According to announcement, a meeting of the Directors of the Index Association was held in this city on Aug. 29, a majority of the Board being present. Mr. E. Bissell was elected chairman, and Mr. P. H. Bateson secretary. The following list of permanent officers was elected:

PRESIDENT—T. W. Higginson. VICE-PRESIDENT—F. E. Abbot. SECRETARY—P. H. Bateson. TREASURER—A. E. Macomber.

Messrs. C. Cone, E. Bissell, and A. K. Butts were appointed a special committee to obtain subscriptions to the stock of the Association. Messrs. A. E. Macomber and F. E. Abbot were appointed a special committee to draft by-laws for the Board of Directors. Mr. P. H. Bateson was appointed general business agent. The Vice-President, Secretary, and Treasurer were appointed an executive committee for the transaction of ordinary business. The meeting was then adjourned.

The Index Association is thus completely organized. More than half of the fifty thousand dollars required have been subscribed within two months after the publication of the project, and these the very worst months of the year for any enterprise. Four months remain, and these are the best months of the year for such an enterprise as this. Provided fifteen thousand dollars more shall be subscribed outside of Toledo, parties here stand ready to subscribe the remaining ten thousand dollars. Active and systematic efforts will be made to secure the subscription of these fifteen thousand dollars; and it should not be forgotten that hitherto very little effort of this kind has been made. What has been subscribed outside of Toledo is almost entirely the spontaneous response of friends. The generous favor thus shown to our project is highly gratifying to the local friends of THE INDEX, and they are sanguine of the result. Ultimate success is not only possible, but in the highest degree probable; and if brain, will, and zeal can win it, it will be won.

With greatly strengthened faith in the feasibility of a plan which has been most wisely and carefully matured, and which is already more than half accomplished, we venture to make another direct appeal to our friends, and to urge those who, although well disposed, have not had sufficient confidence in the scheme to act in its support, to step forward now. There are but few of our subscribers who cannot afford to pay ten dollars a year to support a cause in which they heartily believe; yet that is all that is required by subscription to a single share. Hundreds and hundreds of our subscribers have written to us in terms of enthusiastic approval of our work; now is the time to prove that these words were not empty wind. It will be impossible to address many of them personally; nor do we choose to do so—it being no part of our purpose to importune. All we intend is to acquaint our friends frankly with the true state of the case, sure that those who are in earnest will need no more.

It has been urged upon us by several of those who are most deeply interested in the final establishment of THE INDEX on a permanent basis, and who have themselves most largely subscribed to its stock, that we should consent to a voluntary agreement among the subscribers, to pay in the first assessments on their shares at once, and to cancel the condition requiring the raising of fifty thousand dollars. We have little doubt that nearly all, if not all, of the shareholders would acquiesce in this arrangement, which would guarantee the continuance of THE INDEX as now conducted. But we must decline to sanction this plan; and because we mean to treat our friends frankly, we will give our reasons publicly.

For almost two years we have given our best energies and efforts to the editing of this paper. To do this work we have been obliged to postpone other work of a different and certainly no less important nature. But unless we can make THE INDEX what it ought to be, it is not worth this sacrifice. Unless we can make it a great deal more than it has been or is now, we can devote our time to objects of more importance—we do not mean to us personally, but to the cause which is so much more important than we are. THE INDEX is only a means to an end. If we could find a better means, we should abandon it; and we shall find a better means, unless we can improve this.

That is why we want a large fund to work with. Far less would suffice to pay all deficits. But we aim at great results; and we want adequate tools. If we cannot make THE INDEX a great and mighty organ of Free Religion, so as to reach the heart and mind of the whole American people, we prefer to address a narrower audience in a different way. If we cannot make it the LIBERATOR AND EDUCATOR OF THE MASSES, we prefer to speak to the few in another manner. If there is not enough zeal or self-sacrifice among radicals to give us the means to do the first thing, we prefer to attempt the other thing as best we may. In other words, we do not want to waste our life in building up an instrumentality which will not be ready for use before it is time to die. Twenty or thirty years of hard work would make THE INDEX what we want it at last. Fifty or one hundred thousand dollars will do this in five years. If the money cannot be had, we have other work to do. But our conviction is rapidly growing strong that the money will be forthcoming.

Friends, do you appreciate the necessity of a weekly paper going into every nook and corner of this land, kindling the spirit of freedom, waking the intelligence now hibernating in the sleep of superstition, educating the people in the great principles that are as sure to be put to a tremendous test in the future as the sun is sure to rise to-morrow? It is the weekly paper that must do this work among the people. Books and magazines cannot do it. They are too cumbersome and heavy. They are only auxiliaries. It is the newspapers that are laying the foundations of America as it is to be. If you are determined to reach the people, you must do it through the weekly press. There is great need to-day of a weekly paper so strong, free, fearless, varied, and indomitable in the cause of American ideas, that its voice shall ring from ocean to ocean, and blow a blast like that of the fabled priests at Jericho, bringing down with a crash the hoary citadel of spiritual slavery. Prussia was wise enough to educate her warriors for her great struggle a generation beforehand. Our struggle is to come. Are we so stupid or so sluggish as not to train our legions betimes? The duty is so great, so pressing, as to justify and demand postponement of all ends more remote. For the sake of meeting it manfully, we are willing to put aside long-cherished objects that are very dear to us, and leave behind, however regretfully, the "still air of delightful studies." We are willing to go into the great eternal battle of freedom against tyranny—but not without a weapon. We ask nothing but a sword.

Give us money to make THE INDEX known far and wide—to induce the ablest thinkers of the age to speak through its columns—to secure, by the co-operation of skilled assistants, the variety and vigor necessary to a popular paper—to enlarge the paper itself and secure the circulation it ought to have. If we only sought to make pleasant reading for cultivated and liberal minds, it is big enough now. But we seek for THE INDEX influence and power, not for its own sake, but for the sake of the ideas that are its pole-star; and power and influence have their necessary conditions. Size is one of them. Variety is another. A great circulation is a third. There are others also. All, however, with one or two vital exceptions, are to be got with money. If you think THE INDEX has already these "exceptions," give it money, and we will be responsible for the rest.

In the Moniteur Scientifique (we translate from a French quotation in Nature for July 27), M. de Quesneville administers the following magnificent rebuke to M. Paul de Saint-Victor, who had indulged himself in a fierce outburst of hatred against Prussia:—"Humanity wills that we forget. The welfare of the nations (which are brothers), reason, good sense, everything tells us that, in this war which has just ended, France ought to seek her revenge, not in the might of brutal force, but in social regeneration; and that she should require her genius to prove its superiority in the sciences, in letters, in the arts, and that there should be her only vengeance. It is by this means that France is truly invincible, by this means that she must remain the great nation, the nation loved and preferred; and not by a conflict of shells and chassepots." What better illustration could one ask of the benign influence of science on civilization than these magnanimous words? When the vanquished can thus allude to the victor, and transform the rage of defeat into the pacific emulations of science, art and literature, surely the friend of peace will see more hope of it in these elevating pursuits than in the preaching of a gospel which from the start has been a religion of blood.

The admirable lecture of Mr. Voysey on the Bible, re-published in the last two numbers of THE INDEX, has been thrown into tract form for more convenient circulation. Our readers can now judge of its merits for themselves, and we believe they will agree with us in regarding it as one of the best popular treatises on the subject. No better tract can be found for putting into the hands of those who deny all error and imperfection in the Bible. Clear, strong, brave, it is irrefutable in its main positions; and no better service could be done to the cause of liberal ideas than by circulating it everywhere. Price, ten cents a single copy—fifty cents for six copies—one dollar for fifteen copies.

THE PRIEST AND THE PROPHET.

III.

Society originates and progresses by means of the "great man," but it progresses in such a manner as gradually to outgrow the need of him, and finally to dispense with him entirely. He is merged in the rise of the people. Whether in politics or religion, we cannot tell how many "mute inglorious" prophets now hold their peace, or how many possible heroes now go quietly about their daily business, because education, republicanism, and free thought are grandly at work in a universal elevation of mind and condition, instead of in the production of exceptional greatness to counteract general degradation. Sometimes a dearth of great men is complained of. But the greatness is distributed; and those who are specially eminent are comparatively dwarfed by the higher general level of the community.

This explains, in great part, the origin of the tendency to ascribe exceptional virtue and authority to the past. The past gains to a superficial view by contrast with the present, because the dominating power and character which were then massed in a few colossal figures are now distributed in a general elevation. The rills of influence flow surely and on all sides from a table land which has a higher general level than the mountain range, but shows none of the towering peaks which solemnly crown the horizon from a lower point of observation. The tendency to magnify the past is thus a natural one at all times, inherent in the very laws of progress and of reminiscence. In the natural course of historical development the present must always appear devoid of the exceptional glories which illustrate the past; and, within limits which mankind seems not yet to have reached, it will be the most enlightened and advanced classes of people who will be the most devoted and submissive to past greatness and authority, because among them the more equable distribution of power will make its extraordinary concentrations in elder days seem more admirable and more mighty. Thus it is not the Roman Catholic, but the average Protestant Christian who is most ruled by past authority and least able to explain the present by his creed.

Now it is the business of the priest to maintain and enforce this advantage and authority of the past. Natural development, unhindered by the passions and "inventions" of men, would provide a road of easy slope and gradual ascent from the contrasts of the mountain range to the equable atmosphere of the table land. It would be a change as noiseless and steady as the slow accumulations of differences by which species are transmuted. But among men whose sphere of individual determination quite puts under its feet the sphere of specific unconsciousness and uniformity, new conditions, mental and moral, necessitate new methods of progress, and compel the order of Nature to find a way to utilize selfishness and passion. How this is done it is difficult to see even in the cases most minutely submitted to our observation; and, in the whole, in the order of providence over all mankind, we are perhaps more ignorant of it than of any other subject whatever. But one thing is clear, namely, that the "passions and virtues" by which priests and others resist the natural levelling movement of society, cannot be utilized without pain and privation; and though, by mysterious ways, they may conduct to still higher abodes than the unhindered transit could attain, it is through sufferings, terrors, and cruelties that, at the time, seem only the most horrible calamities. The priest resists the quiet growth which would lead, in peace, to independence, and the changes become violent and convulsive. Free association to discuss and reason would create individuality and the sense of responsibility; societies would gradually be formed, but quite peaceably, to represent and teach dissenting schemes, and then would be united to protect freedom, while the clash of controversy would develop truth. Instead of this, violence and suffering mark the course of progress; and however these may mysteriously minister to the end, the end is that they shall cease; that a noble brotherhood and fellowship shall prevail among men, which all shall recognize to be better than the prevalence of any doctrine whatever; that the selfishness of devotion to a creed or an authority shall be replaced by the simplicity and charity of devotion to truth, whatever that may be; and that the priest shall utterly disappear, remembered only as a distorted shape in the early eras of the moral creation.

What will then remain? The prophet? No; but a prophetic society. I am tempted to quote Emerson's lines,—

"When the State-house is the hearth,
When the Church is private worth,
Then the perfect State is come,
The republican at home."

J. V. B.

SCIENTIFIC SOLVENTS.

We well remember to have known in the West a family that used no remedy for the ills that flesh is heir to but "Ayer's Cherry Pectoral." It was their panacea—equally a specific for corns, colds, or colic—fifteen drops, every half hour or so, was warranted to cure. The simple paterfamilias almost worshipped his bottle of Cherry; he swore to live and die by it, and die by it several of his children did, so said his neighbors. Still it never shook his faith in his Lord Ayer.

Since that we have seen many Dr. Quacks with their patent medicines worshipped, almost deified, by simple folk who must or will have a "Savior," and it seems to us that scientists are likewise often prone to a similar boundless faith in some one universal solvent, or panacea, for the errors or ills of mind. Death is bad, said the alchemists; therefore there must be some Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, some extract of Buchu, or, as they called it, elixir vite, in Nature, which will insure the drinker's life forever. But they wasted their lives in the effort to preserve them. And as there must be some one "cure-all," so they imagined there must be some one turn-all, some philosopher's stone that, when once discovered, would transmute all the baser metals into gold. And they burned gold and alembic too, in their vain search for the magic stone.

In astrology we see the belief, not merely in the general influence of the celestial bodies on the life and destiny of men, but in the one "lucky star" for every person—sometimes it was an unlucky star, or the wandering moon.

The first geologist attempted to explain all the past changes of the earth's strata upon one principle. Buckle tells us how Werner, in Germany, "assumed that all the great changes through which the earth had passed, were due to the action of water." The action of water was thus his "scientific solvent" of all difficulties. But Hutton, in Scotland, had his different one idea. Werner explained all by water and Hutton by fire. Fire, not water, was his solvent. Each was partly right and partly wrong. Says Buckle—"Both were essentially one-sided; both paid a too exclusive attention to one of the two principal agents which have altered and are still altering the crust of the earth; both reasoned from those agents, instead of reasoning to them, and both constructed their system without sufficiently studying the actual and existing facts."

And this very criticism which Buckle makes of these one-sided theorists can be made of him. He has his hobby—his one great universal solvent. He takes for the whole truth what is only a part of it, though a great part of it. He sees clearly the influence that invention and discovery have had in advancing civilization, and then jumps to the conclusion that the intellectual are the only progressive forces, and that the moral nature—that sympathy, conscience, sense of right, duty, justice, &c., are stationary. If he had studied "actual and existing facts," he must have seen that the standard of morals is advancing; that not only the intellectual but also the moral "thoughts of men are widened by the process of the suns." If intellect gives conscience opportunity, so also does conscience give intellect opportunity. Both are progressive.

The important discovery of the correlation and conservation of the physical forces has put men keenly on the scent of mind itself. It is an easy thing to name mind "force," and then link it in theory with the physical and chemical and vital forces. From the study of the relation of these three forces, the mind gets such a headlong momentum toward unity that it becomes most natural and easy to christen mind "force," and so complete the beautiful circle. But this is the very reason why we halt and say, let us see your "actual and existing facts." We are suspicious of these universal solvents. We remember that the passion for "beautiful circles" was one of the chief obstacles to Kepler's astronomical success, and we say that we will not believe that life is a circle, or a triangle, or anything else, until it is proved. You may assume it, to aid experiment, if you like; but don't try to put off upon us your assumptions for proof.

Two centuries and a half ago the circulation of the blood was discovered, and "the first result of it," says Lecky, "was a school of medicine which regarded man simply as an hydraulic machine, and found the principle of every malady in imperfections of circulation." Blood-letting became the remedy for every disease. This generation has discovered that man has got nerve-cells, and, true to its habit, denies that man is an "hydraulic machine;" but following the channels of nerves instead of the channels of blood, off they go at lightning speed, and now proclaim, with the voice and command of a prophet, that man is a great nervous machine, that the "eye is an abstraction," thought a motion of nerve-cells, mind the function of brain—that poetry and potatoes are merely different states of one universal force. Beautiful circle!

Now we would by no means deny that mind may be thus caught in pincers and bottled up in alcohol; but before we take any great amount of stock in this scientific solvent, we demand to see—not electricity changed to heat or light—but any given amount of these changed into an equivalent amount of thought, and vice versa. We are ready for facts, whatever they are, but we demand facts. It was Goethe, I believe, who said he didn't need to go around the whole world to know that the stars were everywhere above his head. We are more sceptical. We insist on seeing every single star. He would, we think, if he had lived in this generation of "scientific solvents."

W. H. S.

"We could never see the virtue of the boast which is so often made by the papers and magazines, that so large a portion of their pages is original. Such originality is often maintained at the expense of the worth. The best exchanges of our acquaintance are by no means those which have the greatest amount of original matter. There is more of editorial tact and talent required to make proper and practical selections, than is put in requisition by the production of the vaunting original papers, who seem to require originality as the only requisite for a good periodical. A good newspaper is always dependent on other resources than its own. And the boast of a periodical that it is entirely original, is too often like the boast of a library if it should claim to have the productions of only one author."—Quoted in the Seaside Oracle from "Ez."

But we do "see the virtue" of the paper which honestly gives due credit for its selected articles, and refuses to palm them off upon the unsuspecting public as original. A contrary course is both lying and theft. But journalism, like war, reverses all moral rules; and men who in private life would scorn such temptations permit themselves, in their editorial capacity, to lie and steal like a New York pickpocket. THE INDEX desires its compliments to the "religious papers" that honor it in this fashion. To be fleeced by the pious may bring it under the protecting ægis of their piety.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal, a Spiritualist paper of Chicago, republishes in full (or professes to republish in full) the late address of Mr. Frothingham on "Superstition and Dogmatism." But without the least hint of any omission, it leaves out all but the first three lines of the passage criticising Spiritualism. Is this a fair specimen of that paper's honesty and moral courage? Are its readers afraid to hear a frank criticism of their belief? Or is the editor of the Journal afraid to publish it? We hope to have an answer to these questions. Such a suppression as this is no whit better than the "pious frauds" of the Jesuits. Such tactics will cost Spiritualists all reputation for sincere belief in their own doctrines, and for fidelity to the first principles of free thought. Not in this manner will Spiritualism commend itself to any thoughtful and upright person.

The London correspondent of the Boston Commonwealth narrates the efforts of a certain Rev. Bee Wright for the more stringent enforcement of the Sunday laws in that city. Is the fanatical gentleman a joke? Has he not a better claim to be regarded as the Rev. Bee Wrong?

Zion's Herald says THE INDEX is "the most infidel of the respectable sheets of America"—which is a voluntary malediction choked by an involuntary groan. It is a bitter pill for the Herald to see that "infidelity" is getting to be "respectable."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

WANTED—A TRUSTWORTHY HAND-BOOK OF RADICAL RESEARCH.

IOLA, KAN., Aug. 8, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—I have been reading your article upon Taylor's "Diegesis," and I wish to tender you my thanks for replying to W. H. B. The ideas and proofs you give convince me that my Taylor is entirely useless.

Would it not be well for you to influence the Free Religious Association to publish a book as suggested in THE INDEX, No. 79? It would be a boon to me, and, I have no doubt, to very many similarly situated. We are, of course, strongly convinced in our own minds of the errors of Christianity, and would advocate abolition of its distinctive dogmas. But what can we do, when the weight of McCosh and Barnes and other well-known authorities, with many that are not so well known, is brought to bear in their favor?

Unless some radical of sound learning will step forth and embody all the results of modern theological research in a compact form, suitable for reference, we who have neither the time nor talent for such research ourselves are at a disadvantage in any discussion that may chance to arise. Although intuitively convinced of the superior beauty of our belief, we stand but a poor show against—

"The lines of argument,
The logic linked and strong,"

of Calvinism especially. The spread of Free Religion depends much upon just the class to which I belong; and if some such work as suggested by you be not soon written, the growth of the ideas advocated by Free Religion will be perceptibly retarded.

I have written more than I intended, and desire no answer; but, being so prominently connected with the religious movement of the age, I would urge upon you the importance of calling the attention of leading Radicals to the necessity of publishing such a book at an early day, at least if they really wish their ideas to have any influence upon the people at large.

If you have read this letter through, excuse me for its length, in view of the importance its idea has to me.

Yours, &c.,

WALTER F. JOHNSON.

P. S. I have now studied Mueller's "Chips," the whole three volumes, and I esteem them among the most precious books in my little library. But of his accuracy (as of Taylor's) I of course am not competent to judge.

[A series of thoroughly accurate and learned works by some first-class scholar, setting forth the condensed results of modern researches in all departments of liberal thought, written without any attempt to prove narrow theories, and designed only to separate what is known from what is still dubious and problematical, would be of incalculable value. We heartily wish the Free Religious Association had the funds to publish such a series of works, and to pay well for them. But, alas! this can be a hope only, until radicals learn to be generous of their money in support of their ideas.—ED.]

FRANKLIN'S PRETENDED LETTER TO PAINE.

PLYMOUTH, WIS., August 19, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—In THE INDEX of the 12th inst., you say: "An esteemed correspondent inquires whether 'Franklin's Letter to Paine,' now going the rounds of the press, is genuine." I do not know what particular letter your correspondent refers to, but I do know that about once in every decade, for the last half century, a pretended letter from Benjamin Franklin to Thomas Paine, advising the latter, for the good of society, not to publish the "Age of Reason," has "gone the rounds of the press." It is generally prefaced by an explanatory remark, stating that after writing the "Age of Reason," and before its publication, Mr. Paine (no, that is not Christian etiquette—"Tom Paine" is the term) sent the manuscript to his friend Franklin, hoping for an endorsement of the book. The essay following this explanation is said to be the reply of the great philosopher upon the occasion.

The first part of the "Age of Reason" (for it is in two parts) was written hastily in Paris, in the autumn of the year 1793. Mr. Paine informs us that he had such a work in contemplation, but should not have written it so soon, had it not been for events transpiring during that year. He says: "The circumstance that has now taken place in France of the abolition of the whole national order of priesthood, and of everything appertaining to compulsive systems of religion and compulsive articles of faith, has not only precipitated my intention, but rendered a work of this kind exceedingly necessary, lest, in the general wreck of superstition, of false systems of government, and false theology, we lose sight of morality, of humanity, and of the theology that is true." He further informs us that he had not had the manuscript finished more than six hours, when he was arrested by order of Robespierre and taken to prison, and on his way there managed to see his friend Joel Barlow, to whom he confided his book. These are the facts in regard to Paine's writing the first part of the "Age of Reason."

The assertion that he ever sent or showed a copy of it to Dr. Franklin, or that the latter ever wrote the letter printed over his name, is not true. It is a pious fraud. The letter is a Christian forgery! It is a theological lie! To prove this, I have only to remind your readers that Dr. Franklin died on the 17th of April, 1790! The falsehood has been exposed again and again; but no attention has been paid to the exposition, and in a life of Franklin, in my library, the author of the work refers to it in vindication of his ridiculous attempt to prove that Dr. Franklin was an orthodox Christian! He says: "When Paine showed him his 'Age of Reason,' he censured it in just terms, as fallacious in argument and destructive in its tendency of all good. 'You had better burn it,' said he, 'than print it!'"

Your correspondent may refer to some other letter than this; but as it is about time now for this one in its decimal revolution to return to us, I strongly suppose it is the same. If so, I believe I have answered his inquiry.

EDWARD M. MACGRAW.

THE INJUSTICE OF SUNDAY-SABBATH LAWS.

The Sunday question now agitating political circles presents many curious comparisons, and suggests inquiry as to the origin of Sabbath observance. If Sabbath observance be the dictate of Divine Law, as distinguished from municipal law, one would suppose no argument required to convince a Protestant American citizen, loyal to the constitution of the United States, and believing in the Declaration of Independence, of the impolicy and injustice of a penal statute requiring such observance.

It is because there exists in the minds of many good men a confusion of ideas on this part of the subject, that much heat and ill-feeling are engendered. Men are found who have all their lives believed in freedom of conscience, yet in this instance invoke the temporal power of human law to compel men to obey Divine Law. Right here, then, begins the difficulty. Right here must the foundation be laid for a higher faith, for a better rendering into practice of the toleration which freedom of conscience in terms implies.

Compare divine with human law. In order to a just comparison let us define our terms. By divine law are regulated our duties to Almighty God. The observance of religious ceremonies, times and seasons, fasting, prayer, sacrifices, and self-denial, all that is included under the term worship and reverence for the great unknown Father, falls within the scope of divine law. Human law, as understood by the founders of our republic, concerns properly the relations of man to his fellow-man; and the penal branch of human law, with which we now propose to deal, concerns properly those overt acts of men which injure individuals by their direct consequences.

The Mosaic law did not recognize this distinction. Within the theory of the Mosaic law there is no room for Protestantism. There the voice of toleration is silent, even as a bell struck within the limits of an exhausted receiver. Whatever be the agitation within, no sound can penetrate the outer air. So in the progress of ages the code of Moses became the letter which killeth, and a prophet greater than Moses arose and declared—"The Sabbath is made for man, not man for the Sabbath." The right of private judgment is essential to the growth and development of the perfect man. The old code did not recognize that right. The new ones do not always do so fully. Under the Mosaic law, blasphemy and murder were alike punishable by death. Theft and Sabbath-breaking, adultery, idolatry, profane swearing, and perjury, all alike had the sanction of human penalties. Now a law fixing penalties against blasphemy, in the light of modern thought, would be something blasphemous in itself, because it would take for granted the necessity of a human sanction for a Divine Law. A penal law against blasphemy enacted by Congress or a State legislature could be imagined possible only by those weak, well-meaning persons who think it necessary to compliment God by an amendment of the Constitution, recognizing him as the source of power, majesty, and dominion.

Yet the death penalty for blasphemy was Jewish law, and good Mosaic law, as announced by the High Priest at the trial of Christ, and was enforced by his crucifixion. Is that good law to-day in the tribunals of the United States? And if not, why not? O, citizen of America, heir of the wisdom and the works of Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Adams, Hamilton, Carroll, Paine, and the others we are so proud to call the fathers of our country, say why a man who commits so great a crime as blasphemy shall walk the earth unscathed of human law, unmarked by penalty of man's devising!

The answer is not that blasphemy is not a crime. That will satisfy no man's conscience. But the experience of ages has been required to teach by the blood and tears, the sorrow, suffering and death, and by the moral abjectness and degradation attendant on ecclesiastical rule in things temporal, the folly of arming judges and rulers with the power to punish crimes against the Deity.

The Supreme Ruler of the Universe needs no such aid. Our compliments to him, and our punishment of blasphemy for his honor, are alike ill-placed and untimely. Like Cain's offering on the altar, they cannot be regarded as supplying the place of cheerful gratitude, reverential love, and holy faith such as Abel offered.

So plain a distinction as that existing between the scope and province of divine law and that of human law, like all other truths, in order to be seen must be looked for with candor and with a desire for truth for its own sake, not for the aid it may give to a preconceived opinion.

If you are looking for an argument for the Sunday law, you may easily brush aside this distinction as unworthy of notice, and ask for judgment and penalty against the Sabbath-breaker with the same holy unction that the penalty of death was demanded in times gone by against the blasphemer.

A Sunday law, as an ordinance requiring the observance of a Sabbath on Friday, or Saturday, or Sunday, is an attempt to sanction Divine Law by the penalties of Human Law. Either day of the week numbers its observers as a sacred day by millions of persons just as good as you or I—just as well endowed with conscience and the inalienable rights of life and liberty—and each party just as sure of revealed authority from God's own throne for their practice. Before such a question men should pause in moderation, lest a hasty judgment obstruct the wheels of progress and do violence to truth. Neither the church nor religion is in danger without a Sunday law. What would be thought of a law requiring a man to go to the Episcopal Church—to take the sacraments of that of any other Church? A municipal regulation, setting apart one day in each week for rest and recreation, has the sanction of long custom and public opinion, and is a purely human regulation.

It is competent for the Legislature to suspend ordinary business on that day, by a law making the proper exceptions, and to declare it a legal holiday; so says the Supreme Court of Ohio by the mouth of Judge Thurman. But on purely secular grounds, and from the same source of power as the Fourth of July, Thanksgiving and Washington's birthday are declared holidays. It hence follows that it is equally within the power of the Legislature to repeal such laws, if they doubt the policy of them.

Insisting on the maintenance of such laws as Christian observances is simply folly. It is a desecration of the principles of Protestantism. Sunday laws are subject to the same tests of public policy as other laws. No peculiar sacredness shrouds them from public gaze; no Divine mandate forbids their alteration or repeal.

[The above liberal article is especially noteworthy as coming from a gentleman of high reputation in the practice of law, and of high position in one of our most popular churches. It encourages the hope that the good sense of the American people will yet decide the present heated controversy on the Sunday question in a manner consistent with the priceless principle of civil and religious liberty. We regret that we are not permitted to publish the author's name, and hope we shall be repeatedly favored with similar productions of his pen.—Ed.]

THE SCOPE OF FREE RELIGION.

LIMA, OHIO, Aug 7, 1871.

EDITOR INDEX:—Free Religion seems to be the only system that develops a practical means by which equal religious rights can exist and be recognized in action; and if it does not crystallize into a sect, as some indications seem to threaten, may very largely help to rid mankind of the insolent idea of toleration to other human thought than our own, which last seems the best conception that man has yet been able to render at all practical.

But as you propose that mankind shall look forward in religion to a system of belief to be positively established by science, (which thus far affords us only provisional theories, so far as the verity of God and immortality is concerned), and as you seem to include political affairs in the matters that concern Free Religion, how would science apply to politics? I find Dugald Stewart quoted somewhere as saying that—

"There is a science of legislation, which the details of office and the intrigues of popular assemblies will never communicate; a science of which the principles must be sought for in the constitution of human nature, and in the general laws which regulate the course of human affairs, and which, if ever in consequence of the progress of reason philosophy (science) should be enabled to assume that ascendancy in the government of the world, which has hitherto been maintained by accident combined with the passions and caprices of a few leading individuals, may perhaps produce more perfect and happy forms of society than have ever yet been realized in the history of mankind."

Is this a practical hint of what the Free Religionist is to aim to accomplish? If not, it seems to me that in the effort to perfect himself as an end, he had better leave his special political conclusions unmixed with what science shall determine for him of religion.

If we are wholly incapable of determining scientific principles for the regulation of society in ordinary political affairs, how shall we hope to succeed in doing so in the higher realm of thought which is to guide man to perfect himself as his chief religious end and aim?

I do not know that the above query will be esteemed of any value, but offer it as a thought in part my own, and, so far as it is so, imperfectly expressed.

M.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Understanding the main purpose of the death penalty that attaches to certain crimes, under the statutes of most of the States, to be the certain prevention of an individual's again committing the like offence, it follows that, unless the State wishes to show its revenge by making that death as terribly painful as possible, the easiest way the unfortunate can be deprived of the precious boon of life is the best.

What way, then, is there so certain and so quick, and, if you please, so painless, as instant death by a powerful galvanic or electric battery?

This suggestion is made in the hope that, if this is a method just as effectual, as it certainly is less agonizing and painful to the victim, it may be adopted throughout the Union without delay, and be found not incompatible with the highest

CIVILIZATION.

THE INNOCENT SPECTATOR.

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer.]

The Innocent Spectator has been hurt again. He is always getting in the way when there is a row going on, and, if anybody is hurt, he is sure to be the sufferer. He don't mean any harm. He is there just to see what is going on, bless his innocent soul, and hasn't the slightest idea of hurting anybody; and yet see how he catches it. The real offender escapes, but the poor Innocent Spectator, who hasn't done anything but stand around and look on, wards off policemen's clubs with his head, and offers his body as a target for the avenging bullet. He complains bitterly about it, if he be not past complaining altogether; his friends declare it an outrage, and the entire press cry out, "Too Bad." If he had been doing anything, now, more than looking on; if he had aided and abetted; if he had expressed his sentiments on either side, the case would have been different; but he was only an Innocent Spectator, curious to see what was going on, which renders his case a very deplorable one, indeed. A sad fatality attends the Innocent Spectator somehow. For instance, there is a row in a saloon he is passing. It don't concern him at all, but he thinks he will just step in and see what is going on. He enters the door just in time to stop a beer-mug or some more deadly projectile with his head, and next morning a local paragraph concerning the row informs us "no one was hurt except an Innocent Spectator." Again: Two men are engaged in altercation in the street. Innocent Spectator happens along, and stops to hear what it is all about. Pistols are drawn. One of the belligerents jumps behind Innocent Spectator and fires upon his antagonist. Antagonist returns the fire, and Innocent Spectator falls, shot through the vitals. It is a very hard case, to be sure, but that is always the way with him. Last Wednesday there was a fearful riot in New York. Innocent Spectator couldn't keep away; of course not; he never can. He left his work, his business, whatever it was, and went to look on. He saw all the worst elements of a mob congregated in vast numbers, awaiting a favorable moment to begin the attack. He saw, also, hundreds of resolute and determined policemen, armed with clubs and revolvers, and thousands of soldiers not to be trifled with, whose muskets were known to be shotted, ready to repel assault in the most vigorous and effective manner. And yet he takes a position to see the show, as though it was to be one of the most peaceful of pageants. He gets the best place he can find—takes a front seat as it were—this guileless, unsuspecting creature, where he won't miss any of it, and he don't. The anticipated collision occurs. The street resounds with the volleys of the soldiery, and Innocent Spectator has the top of his head blown off, or is desperately wounded. "That is always the way," is the newspaper comment. "It is the poor Innocent Spectator who suffers." Now why couldn't the Innocent Spectator keep away, knowing the danger? He had no business there. Had it not been for the spectators, innocent as to their intentions, who thronged the streets, there would have been no riot. With none there but men who meant mischief the problem could easily have been solved, but the crowd formed the bulwark behind which the cowardly rioters fired upon the procession, and among whom they skulked away from recognition. A ruffian fires and kills a National Guard, and then is "lost in the crowd." Crowd of what? Why of those same Innocent Spectators who should have kept away. So the Innocent Spectator is not so innocent after all, and if he suffers in common with ruffians and rioters, it is through his own folly. In a general way the Innocent Spectator gets vastly more sympathy than he is entitled to.

There shall be less distress
Than heretofore,
When men make poetry less,
And live it more.

—Hosmer.

The one event which never loses its romance, is the encounter with superior persons on terms allowing the happiest intercourse.—Emerson.

The great city is that which has the greatest man or woman. If it be a few ragged huts, it is still the greatest city in the world.—Walt Whitman.

THE SUNDAY QUESTION IN LONDON.—Our London correspondent has dwelt upon the efforts for a more complete observance of Sunday in that city by the Rev. Bee Wright, and the counter-laborers of the friends of a more liberal interpretation of the statutes. A recent writer has this on the subject:—

The Sunday question has got into a strange fix here. I told you in a former letter of the fierce prosecutions undertaken against the small shop-keepers at the west end of the town who keep open on Sunday for the sale of tobacco, newspapers, sweetmeats, and the like. The reason why the crusade was confined to this quarter of London was that the magistrates here felt bound in conscience to administer the law as they found it, while elsewhere the other magistrates repudiated the law as obsolete and ineffective. After a great many poor people had been fined at the instance of the Sabbath Protection Society, their opponents, the Free Sunday Society, took up the act and began to enforce it against the upper classes. This staggered the conscientious magistrates. When at last the audacious Free Sunday people began to strike at the royal family itself, it was felt that acts of Parliament, however aged and absurd, might be very well for the lower orders, but it would never do that princes and princesses should be victimized in the same manner. A few days ago summonses were taken out against the contractor who waters the road in front of Kensington palace (where the Prince and Princess Teck and the Duchess of Inverness live, the Princess being the Queen's cousin, and the Duchess Her Majesty's aunt), against the fish-monger who sent in half a salmon for the Sunday dinner, and the men who supplied the ice. This brought the magistrates at Hammersmith to their senses. They took counsel together and decided that henceforth all application for summonses must be refused unless made by some public authority. Nor is the agitation confined to London. At Warrington attempts have also been made to put in force the provisions of the Lord's Day act. A woman was charged with having sold two loaves to a man "who had been out harvesting till late on Saturday night, and had walked four miles to procure the loaves." The Mayor dismissed this charge. It was much less blamable, he said, to sell bread than beer on Sunday. The defendant in another case was charged with selling a pound of flour, some biscuits and sweets; but he put in a plea that his customer had purchased the articles in anticipation of the visit of some friends to tea; and justice again relaxed its frown. But a third offender, who had sold five pounds of potatoes, was ordered to pay a fine of one shilling; and the justice announced that the penalties imposed in future would be more stringent. The two societies, the one for and the other against the rigid observance of the Sabbath, are playing into each other's hands; but I should say there can be little doubt that the Free Sunday people will win.—Commonwealth.

A CHARACTERISTIC PRAYER.—"The Convention went smoothly along in the forenoon with their temporary organization, the main feature of which was a prayer by a Methodist minister named Wilson. He prayed for harmony in the radical ranks, that they might have at least forty thousand majority in Iowa, etc. His prayer was interrupted by applause; and at its conclusion, shouts and laughter, stamping, cries of 'bully for you,' etc., were heard for some time. The prayer created a sensation."

The above we clip from an exchange, giving account of the proceedings of the Iowa Republican State Convention. It would seem from occurrences of this kind that the clergy, if we may judge by their acts, are determined to make the subject of prayer supremely ridiculous. This pharisaical, religious mockery of asking God to interfere and give to the party with which the Reverend was identified forty thousand majority, is about as sensible as many of the petitions we hear offered to Deity from our modern pulpits. While listening to these prayers from our most popular preachers, we cannot free ourselves from the impression that the petitioner, in his seeming supplications, has entire reference in his choice of phraseology to the effect to be made upon the audience. A vivid picture of this class was very clearly drawn in the language of the humble Nazarene, as reported.

"Matthew VI, 5—And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues, and in the corners of the streets, to be seen of men."—Present Age.

CHINESE JUDICIAL OATH.—When Chinamen were first placed in the witness-box of English courts, it was proposed they should be sworn according to Chinese practice, the oath to be administered over a decapitated cock, but it was objected that this mode of inducing witnesses to speak the truth was objectionable and local; for that reason, and perhaps also on account of the inconvenience and unseemliness of the procedure, Chanticleer was never pressed into the service of justice. Instead, an invocation and conditional imprecation was written on a slip of paper and burnt in Court by the witness. Latterly this has been abandoned; witnesses are merely admonished to speak the truth. The practice of administering an oath over a slaughtered cock was lately adverted to by Dr. McCartee, in a communication which he addressed to the North China Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society. Magistrates sometimes use the shrine of the tutelary deity of the district for performing the ceremony, when there is extraordinary occasion for inducing witnesses to speak the truth. In some cases the cock's blood is drunk. —Shanghai (China) News-Letter.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

RIFLES, SHOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS, Gun Material. Write for Price List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [88-108,]

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 731f

THE EXAMINER is published monthly at $4.00 a year. Address Rev. E. C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill.; or THE EXAMINER, 41 Madison street, Chicago. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number. 731f

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH. A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO'S Argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true, and that it was composed by Samuel, Jeremiah and other prophets, from 1100 to 624 B.C. The substance of five volumes in 48 pages. Price 25 cents. American News Company, New York. 73-98.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38yl

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S LECTURE, BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS, Forwarded free for twenty cents. Just published. D. G. FRANCIS, 75-87 17 ASTOR PLACE, New York.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE Free Religious Association. The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (20 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER, Secretary.

NEW TRACTS, Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).

I Am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?

The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.

The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.

God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.

Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.

Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-Operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.

Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.

Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.

What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.

Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.

Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.

The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.

Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.

Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.

"It Injures Our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?

Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.

These four for 10 cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE, 43 Bowdoin St., Boston. 701f

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX, A Weekly Paper Devoted to FREE RELIGION. Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, Toledo, Ohio TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is TWO DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Circulars with list of subjects will be sent on application.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names.....$50 in Greenbacks.

For 50 Names.....$25 in Greenbacks.

For 25 Names.....$15 in Greenbacks.

For 10 Names.....$5 in Greenbacks.

For less than ten Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address FRANCIS E. ABBOT, LOCK BOX 88, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Single Copies OF THE INDEX FOR 1870, Containing the following ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of FIVE CENTS.

No. The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....1

What is Free Religion?.....3

Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones.....4

Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....5

The Practical Work of Free Religion.....6

Unitarianism versus Freedom.....7

Sunday Schools.....8

Friendship.....9

Grief and its Compensations.....11

The Hebrew Prophets.....12

Capital Punishment.....13

Human Ideals.....14

The Essence of Religion.....15

The Management of Children.....16

A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian. R. S. D.....17

Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....17

The Candle of the Lord.....18

Public Opinion.....19

Conscience.....20

The Pedigree of Man.....21

"Following Christ".....22

The Tongue.....23

The Golden Age.....24

What is Truth?.....25

The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....26

Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....27

The Sunday Question.....28

Motes and Beams.....29

The Dove's Departure.....30

The Bible in the Public Schools.....31

Religious Freedom.....32

A Plain Talk to Young Men.....33

Noise.....34

The Humility of Free Religion.....35

Chaos and Cosmos.....36

An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....37

Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....38

War and Free Religion.....39

Religious Revivals.....40

Mary and Martha.....41

The Ministry of Free Religion.....42

Success.....43

"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....44

Spiritual Beauty.....45

The Book of Daniel.....46

The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....47

The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....47

Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....47

The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....47

Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....47

Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....48

Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....49

Parties and Party Spirit.....50

The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age.....51

The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....52

Transient and Permanent.....53

The Index.

VOL. 2. No. 37.

TOLEDO, OHIO, SEPTEMBER 16, 1871.

WHOLE No. 90.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, O.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT,

Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

A FORTNIGHT IN A DUTCH TOWN.

[By a "London Clergyman" in the Sunday Magazine. Reprinted in Littell's Living Age, Jan. 26, 1867.]

During the autumn I staid for a fortnight in an out-of-the-world Dutch town, with my friends, Mr. and Mrs. Van der Kemp. I had made their acquaintance at a German watering-place, where I was seeking relief from the effects of overwork. As my lengthened residence in Germany had made me sufficiently well acquainted with the German tongue, to understand the Dutch, which, in fact, is only a dialect of the German, I soon got into familiar intercourse with Mr. and Mrs. Van der Kemp, which led to a cordial friendship between us, for I clearly saw that they looked for their help and strength to the same Savior from whom I drew my consolation. Indeed, we soon felt so attached that I could not resist their hearty invitation to accompany them to Holland, that I might witness the happiness of their family life in the atmosphere of their prettily-situated country town.

To begin, then, with the town. It numbers about 7,000 or 8,000 inhabitants, the greater portion of whom belong to the agricultural class. The upper class chiefly consists of landed proprietors and merchants, who conduct a considerable trade in cattle and corn; while the middle-class number many well-to-do tradesmen and shop-keepers. A market is held once a week, and on that day large crowds come into the town from the surrounding villages and farms. The market-place is large and neatly paved. It is surrounded by lofty, well-built houses and shops, and is adorned at the upper end by a venerable Gothic Cathedral, which, on such a day, presents a very interesting and cheerful aspect. It is easier to cross Cheapside at noon than to walk across that densely-thronged square between the hours of eight and three. Little booths, protected from rain or sunshine by white canvas awnings, and containing refreshments or knick-knacks, form a long row which divides the market into two equal parts. On one side the corn trade is carried on, while the cattle, carts, and carriages fill up the space on the other. Almost every living creature capable of moving about makes its appearance here about the middle of the day. Aristocratic-looking gentlemen are to be seen engaged in lively conversation with stout farmers, and slapping each other's hands in settling their bargains; while well-dressed ladies work their way through the crowd, and stop every minute to exchange kind words with a peasant's wife or to look at the novelties in the booths. Clergymen, too, from the neighboring parishes come to see their friends, or to attend their clerical meetings; but the stranger does not readily recognize them, for it is not customary with the clergy in Holland to wear a special ministerial dress on week-days. As my host lives in one of the finest houses in this central spot, I had ample opportunity of beholding the lively scene.

Nor do I recollect ever having witnessed a sight in a town with greater pleasure, for I did not observe a single instance of disorderly conduct or drunkenness, while the kind, cheerful tone in which the people seemed to converse with each other made me even fancy that I was witnessing some large festive gathering. I saw only one policeman all the time I stood looking out on this human bee-hive, and having drawn Mrs. Van der Kemp's attention to the fact, she told me that, for aught she knew, there were only two or three of them in the town, and that these proved quite sufficient to keep the good citizens in safety, "because," she added, with a smile, "stealing, you know, is forbidden amongst us."

I expressed to my friends the agreeable impression made upon me by the kind and peaceful tone of conversation that appeared to prevail amongst the people.

"Why," Mr. Van der Kemp answered, "we do enjoy a quiet, peaceful life here, and we are thankful for it in one sense; but I am sorry to say that it seems to me our peace rests upon a wrong foundation, since it is maintained at the expense of truth, and is, in fact, more a kind of lethargy than anything else. You would be very much mistaken if you were to suppose that we were really of one heart and one soul. First, you must know that two-fifths of the population are Romanists. Between these and us Protestants there is no intercourse whatever, except at the market. This is not altogether owing to the circumstance of their belonging mostly to the lower class, but chiefly to the systematic carefulness of their priests to keep them aloof from Protestant influences, and to the fact that we are a thoroughly Protestant nation. You know, of course, that we owe our national independence to that noble eighty years struggle which our forefathers carried on three centuries ago against popish priestcraft and Spanish tyranny, and which has been so admirably described in your language by Mr. Motley. Though the animosity which existed in those days between the two parties has long since subsided, and we now live in peace together, yet separation has continued from a kind of traditional habit in a small place like this, where people are so well acquainted with each other's history, circumstances, and religion.

"But apart from the Romanists, the Protestants themselves are divided into three parties; and, though they also live in peace, yet they differ from each other in principle almost as much as Protestants do from Romanists. When I speak of parties, you must not think I mean sects. We have no sects in this place. We Protestants all belong to the National Church, which, as you know, is Calvinistic and Presbyterian. I think we number about five thousand people. We are not, as is the case in your country, divided into parishes. We are all members of one Church, which is under the charge of three ministers, who are assisted by a consistory composed of twelve elders, and as many deacons. The sole business of the latter is to look after the poor, and to administer the money that comes in from weekly collections in the churches, endowments, donations, &c.

"Now we have two places of public worship—the cathedral yonder, and a smaller church in another quarter of the town. In each of them we have three services every Sunday, and once on an evening during the week. The ministers regularly exchange with each other; Dr. Lakerman, for instance, preaches next Sunday morning in the cathedral, and the following Sunday morning in the other church, while one of his colleagues just does the reverse. Our little local paper tells us every Saturday in which church and at what hour each of the three gentlemen will officiate on the following Sunday. Now each of these three ministers represents a different system of divinity. Dr. Lakerman, a young man who left the University only three years ago, is what is called a 'modern theologian.' He is an advocate of the principles of Strauss and Renan, and consequently denies the divinity, the miracles, and the resurrection of our Lord; in short, he denies everything supernatural in the Bible. You will understand that Mrs. Van der Kemp and myself never attend his preaching, though the church is always crowded, and chiefly by the members of the upper class, for he is an eloquent preacher, and a man of great learning. But it is impossible for us to listen to a sermon, however ably delivered, in which our blessed Savior is degraded to the level of a mere Jewish genius, if not even to that of an amiable though erring fanatic. His colleague, Mr. Moor, is a man of about thirty-five, and is not quite so decided in infidel views as he is, but still there is a great deal of Gospel truth which he does not believe in. He goes under the name of the 'liberal minister,' to distinguish him from Dr. Lakerman, 'the modern minister,' and from Mr. Willems again, who is the 'orthodox minister.' Mr. Moor belongs to the supernatural school. He acknowledges the divine inspiration of the Bible, and is far from denying all miracles. But there are some miracles which he does not believe in, and there are some doctrines which he rejects. To bring this arbitrary way of believing and rejecting what he pleases into harmony with his unlimited reverence for the Bible as being a divinely inspired book, he avails himself of a peculiar method of interpretation which he often clearly applies, and by which he leaves the letter of the Word intact, while he succeeds in putting a sense into it which in the end simply makes the Bible say the very opposite of what it means to say. For instance, he is an Arian, and rejects the Godhead of our Lord; but to harmonize this opinion with those texts in Scripture in which Christ is called God, he knows how to talk so subtly and philosophically on the term 'God,' that in the end it comes to mean 'a creature.' He is a man of what is called 'the golden mean,' not too infidel, and not too credulous, submitting his reason to the Bible where the Bible (in his opinion) is not too absurd, and submitting the Bible to his reason where his reason is too obstinate.

"Of the third minister, Mr. Willems, I have only to say that he is a good and faithful preacher of Gospel truth. He is a man in the prime of life, his audiences are as numerous as those of Dr. Lakerman, but they consist chiefly of members of the middle and lower classes, with the exception of a few wealthy merchants and landed proprietors who are known as the leaders of the orthodox party here. I need not tell you that Mrs. Van der Kemp and myself always attend his service, except, it may be, when he happens to preach in the little church and the weather will not permit us to go there. In that case we attend Mr. Moor's service in the cathedral, as he often preaches such sermons as would make a stranger, who is not acquainted with his opinions, believe that he is a good sound preacher."

This explanation of the state of religion in this Protestant Church sadly surprised me, and the more so as I learned that matters were still worse in other towns throughout the kingdom. In fact, on further inquiry I found that the orthodox party among the Dutch clergy are in the minority, and that the so-called modern theology is making most alarming progress, especially among the younger and more talented of the clergy. This destructive system manifests its truly heathenish principle by stripping religion of everything divine, and lowering it to a compound of moral, aesthetic, and sentimental agencies for the cultivation and refinement of the purely human. What my friends told me about profane, even blasphemous, notions which these theologians at the present time preach from their pulpits and propagate in their writings, was something quite frightful. It is absurd to think of men who hold such opinions being even members of a Christian Church, much less teachers and pastors. Indeed, a few of them have felt the absurdity, and have been honorable enough to resign not only their office, but their membership in the Christian Church.

"But how is it possible that such a monstrous state of things can be tolerated in your Church?" I asked. "Is there no law and no government in it?"

"There is," replied Mr. Van der Kemp, "but both, alas! are powerless. You know, of course, that the creeds of the Reformed Churches are perfectly sound in point of doctrine. I have only to mention the Heidelberg Catechism, the jewel of a confession, which during more than two centuries has been the chief standard of faith of our Church. But since the synod of 1816, which was convoked by the king, the clergy have been relieved of their obligation to subscribe the creed, and instead have only to sign a formula of subscription which, being drawn up in very vague and general terms, really binds them to no doctrine at all. The supreme government of our Church is not in the hands of a General Assembly, as is the case with the Scotch Presbyterians, but in those of a few men, who are not chosen and appointed by the members of the Church, but by the Consistories, which are self-elected bodies. This supreme court, which is called 'the Synodical Commission,' meets once a year with closed doors at the Hague. It has no power to interfere in doctrinal controversies; and is, in fact, nothing more than a board of administration. Numerous protests and petitions have been sent up to it on the part of the orthodox party during the last thirty years, but they have all proved fruitless, and last year the court published a final answer, in which it confessed its impotence to cure the fearful confusion, and declared that no alternative is left but to allow matters to take their own course. Sad, nay wicked, as that declaration is, yet one cannot marvel, for the men themselves who constitute that court are, with only one or two exceptions, members of either the liberal or the modern party."

"What an absurd and dangerous state of things!" I exclaimed. "But there are some parishes or churches in which the orthodox people are the majority, are there not?"

"Certainly, and they are not few, for the spirit of infidelity has not spread so widely amongst the people as amongst the clergy."

"Well, then, I expect they at least have orthodox ministers."

"Most of them have, but there are not a few who have not. It all depends upon the spirit that prevails among the members of the consistory of a church, i. e., the elders and deacons, for they have the sole power of calling a minister. Now, in many churches in which the members are for the greater part orthodox, the elders and deacons are sceptics, and these compel the people to acknowledge as their minister a man whose doctrines they abhor."

"But then, do the people not have it in their power to withhold that man's salary?"

"The clergymen are not paid from contributions of the people, but partly from endowments, and for the greater part from the public exchequer. All clergymen in our country are State-paid; the people, in fact, have nothing at all to say in the arrangement of Church matters. We do not choose our ministers, the elders and deacons choose them for us; we do not choose our elders and deacons, for, should one of their places fall vacant, the rest choose a successor without asking our consent; we do not choose the professors of divinity at our universities, the Government chooses them, and, if the Government should appoint such men as Strauss and Renan, we have no power to prevent it. And we cannot send our young men to other colleges, for the rules of our Church admit of no preachers except those taught by the Government professors. And yet, with all this, our Church is no State establishment; for, according to the charter, our king and his ministers are not bound to profess any religion. Our king, of course, is a member of our Church, because it is the church of the majority; but if he should choose to turn a Romanist or even a Jew, no legal proceedings could be taken against him. Among his ministers there are Romanists, and there have sometimes been Jews. All religious denominations have equal rights in our country, and all of them are State-paid, unless they decline to accept the money. But this equality of rights, stipulated as it is in our charter, is yet carried out with gross injustice so far as regards the Church. For, while the other denominations, such as the Lutherans, the Methodists, the Arminians, the Separatists, and even the Roman Catholics, are left perfectly at liberty to manage their own affairs, to appoint their own officials, and to have their own colleges or seminaries, we, on the contrary, must submit to those arbitrary, despotic, and absurd restrictions which I have stated to you."

I was quite at a loss to comprehend how such a state of things could be tolerated in a society of rational beings, not to speak of a Christian community.

"It needs must come to a separation amongst you," I said.

"Well, so we all think, and we have thought so for long; but the difficulty is, how to bring about a satisfactory secession. Of course we orthodox people might go out at any moment and found a church of our own. Nothing in the laws could prevent us doing so. But then we should have to leave all our cathedrals, churches, school-rooms, in short all our church property, in the hands of the infidels. We should deem that a gross injustice towards the cause of truth, for we are de jure the sole proprietors of the church property, and the infidels ought to leave the Church, because it is they who have fallen away from the creed and broken the rules of the Church of our fathers."

The following day we were invited to take coffee at Mr. and Mrs. Van Kolen's, who were friends and neighbors of my host. Now it must be known that what the Dutch call the "coffee hour" corresponds with our luncheon time. In country places, where the respectable class seldom dine later than two or three o'clock, this "coffee hour" is about eleven. The lunch only consists of coffee and little cakes or tarts. The savory liquid is poured from a polished brass urn, or a china filter-pot, into small china cups, which are served at long intervals, so that the "coffee hour" lasts at least for two hours, during which the gentlemen smoke long clay pipes or cigars, and the ladies knit stockings. When I entered the spacious, high-roofed, comfortable-looking parlor, I saw the coffee-urn on the table amongst little piles of cups and saucers and dessert plates, and a couple of japanned tin boxes containing the cakes and tarts. Behind the urn were an oblong square mahogany case containing clay pipes, and two little vases with cigars in them; and a square mahogany tobacco box and a little chafing-dish containing a piece of red-hot coal, at which the gentlemen could light their pipes.

Mr. Van Kolen is a merchant in affluent circumstances, and an elder in the Church. He belongs to the "liberal party," and had invited his minister, Mr. Moor, as he courteously observed to me, in order "that he might enjoy the privilege of making the acquaintance of an English clergyman." Accordingly the Rev. Mr. Moor and his wife soon made their appearance. He was an intelligent-looking man, rather stately in his manners, but with a very open and frank expression, which promised some cheerful conversation.

The usually complimentary phrases over, we soon got into a talk in which all the friends present took part. We were led to discuss the similarities and the differences between the languages and customs of the English and of the Continent, by the circumstance of Mr. Moor's taking a pipe which the mistress of the house courteously offered to him, whereas I declined it with an assumed expression of dislike. It was not long, however, before Mrs. Van der Kemp, who was a little of a controversialist, found a suitable opportunity of asking Mr. Moor a question about a passage in the sermon she had heard him preach the Sunday before. "She could not understand," she said, "how he could have averred that the poor man in the Gospel, who was possessed of a legion of evil spirits, was only insane, since it was so clearly stated that there were invisible beings dwelling in him and speaking through his mouth." Mr. Moor, far from showing any surprise at his being thus called to account for his opinions, appeared quite pleased, which made me suppose that he must be well accustomed to such inquiries. I was confirmed in this supposition by the easy and familiar manner in which all the other members of the company at once took part in the discussion, which, notwithstanding that the opinions differed greatly, was conducted in a lively, spirited way and appeared not to interfere in the slightest degree with the good feelings of the parties. I could not help thinking, as they talked, that this freedom of discussion on religious matters between the minister and his flock was at all events something worth taking notice of. It would be a good thing, I thought, for myself, as well as for my people, if such questions about passages in my sermons were put to me when I visited them. I almost envied Mr. Moor, though I regretted his erroneous opinions; for, to tell the truth, I never heard of any member of my flock talking in that way about my sermon. The discussion which ensued, though it led to no settlement at that moment, yet had this advantage, that it caused the friends to think, to utter their opinions, to examine and to test the grounds of their faith, and to take home many a useful suggestion.

But a stop was put to the discussion by the entrance of the Rev. Mr. Willems, the orthodox minister. Mr. Van Kolen had invited him too, supposing that it would please Mr. and Mrs. Van der Kemp. Nor was Mr. Willems a stranger to Mr. Van Kolen's house. Though the latter, as I have said, belonged to the liberal party, yet he was far from being an enemy to orthodoxy. Mr. Willems, who appeared to be past fifty, was a rather grave-looking man, whose honest, open face, however, inspired confidence. He, too, had something stately about his mien, which seemed to throw a slight shade of reserve over the rest of the company. At all events, after his appearance amongst us the conversation lost a good deal of its easy, familiar tone, and got into a strain still kind and polite, but rather stiff. England again became the topic; and I had to answer a great many questions from Mr. Willems, who seemed to take a lively interest in our home and foreign missions and our various religious societies. This turn in the conversation, however, was not exactly what I wished. I wanted to learn something more about the condition of the Dutch Church; and since two ministers representing two different parties happened now to be together, I thought I should probably have a good opportunity of obtaining some authentic information concerning the relation in which the parties stood to each other. So I tried several times to turn the conversation from England back to Holland. My efforts proved in vain, however. Every one seemed bent upon avoiding all topics relating to religion or Church matters, and our talk became very much like that generally carried on in a railway carriage.

Having returned home, I expressed to Mrs. Van der Kemp my feeling of disappointment.

"Ay," she said, "you see it would not do to turn the room into a cock-pit for the two champions. We never speak of religious matters when two ministers are together. Nor would the reverend gentlemen have allowed themselves to be drawn into any discussion of the kind. Every nerve is strained to keep the three ministers on good terms—at least, before the eye of the public—for an open war would be an awkward thing, since they are compelled very often to meet as members of the consistory and at various ecclesiastical committees."

"But suppose your 'modern' minister had made his appearance amongst us," I asked, "what would have been the consequence?"

"He would have been politely received by his colleagues, and the company would have continued its commonplace talk upon different matters. Only, most probably, you would have soon seen Mr. Willems look at his watch, and take his leave, saying that he had other engagements, and Mr. Moor would, perhaps, have followed his example. It is seldom that the ministers meet except when necessity compels them. Indeed, I wondered very much how Mr. Van Kolen could have thought of such a thing as bringing the two together. To-morrow we shall have a few friends at our house to tea, and Mr. Willems will be one of the party. You will then make his acquaintance, and find him a sound Christian and a well-instructed theologian. I have no doubt we shall spend a very agreeable evening in useful and edifying intercourse about religious matters. But I have not invited either of the other ministers. It would altogether spoil the evening."

Next night I found Mr. Van der Kemp's expectation as to the character of the meeting fully realized. Mr. Willems appeared quite a different man from what he had done the day before. He seemed to feel quite at home, spoke in an easy, familiar tone, and cheered the company as much by his wit as he edified it by his theology. Nor was a little bit of friendly controversy wanting, as some of the party expressed opinions about the extent of the atoning power of Christ's death, which seemed, in Mr. Willems' judgment, to be too narrow. Bibles were produced, and texts turned up, and the question about particular or universal redemption was fully gone into. It was, indeed, a very interesting and lively discussion, in which most of the members of the company took part.

Every day Mr. Van der Kemp and myself took a walk through the town. One day we visited an orphan-house which belonged to the reformed Church, in which about fifty children of both sexes were supported and trained. The Church also possesses an asylum for aged men and women. Both institutions made a most favorable impression upon my mind, being remarkably clean, comfortable in appearance, and orderly throughout.

"Do the children in this orphanage receive religious instruction?" I asked.

"According to the regulations of our Church," Mr. Van der Kemp answered, "the youngest minister has to teach them one hour every week."

"Your modern minister has at present that charge, if I am not mistaken?"

"He has, and there is the mischief, you see. Of course he teaches those poor children not to believe in Jesus as the Son of God, and nobody can prevent him. But happily the house-father and his wife are good orthodox people, and administer an antidote in their morning and evening services, and their daily intercourse with the children."

"But contradictory teachings like that must have a very pernicious effect on the children's minds," I observed.

"Of course it has, and it is to be feared that a collision will ere long take place between the house-father and Dr. Lakerman; for the house-father is rather hot-tempered, and in his indignation at the Doctor's teaching he sometimes allows himself to speak very disparagingly about it in the presence of the children. One day he even told them plainly that the Doctor taught them blasphemous lies."

"Well, I suspect he said nothing but what was true," I observed.

"I agree with you," Mr. Van der Kemp answered; "but perhaps it was not judicious to express that truth to the children. It was reported to Dr. Lakerman, whose party, you must know, is very strong among the directors of the orphan-house. I am afraid the poorhouse-father will be turned out some day."

"And so you will allow a good man to suffer for the truth?" I exclaimed.

"Well, nobody amongst us has power to prevent it. But, of course, we shall not by any means allow him to starve. We will manage to procure some other employment for him."

"And meanwhile you will allow the children to swallow the poison?" I asked in an indignant tone.

Mr. Van der Kemp shrugged his shoulders.

"We can not help it," he answered in a sad voice. "But I will show you that we are not deficient in trying to provide the children of our Church with good spiritual food."

He took me to a building in a back street, which looked like a school-house. And such indeed it was, for it contained a spacious schoolroom and a few other apartments.

"This building," said Mr. Van der Kemp, "is the property of the orthodox party. The Church has no control over it whatever, as it has been built by voluntary subscriptions, and placed under the control of a society formed for the purpose. Here we have a day school for about two hundred children, and Sunday schools for more than double that number. Mr. Willems is the president of the society, and visits our school regularly. Mr. Moor also comes occasionally; and, though he is not a member, yet he gives us an annual subscription. But Dr. Lakerman, of course, never makes his appearance. We also hold public Scripture-reading meetings at this place once or twice a week. They are conducted by our 'evangelist,' a good and able young man, whom the society has engaged for visiting the poor, distributing tracts, &c."

"Do your ministers visit the poor?" I asked.

"They do, each in his own district. The town is divided into three districts, and each minister has his own. Mr. Willems, being the oldest, has the most respectable of the three. Dr. Lakerman again has the outskirts of the town. It goes by succession. If Mr. Willems should die or remove to another town, Mr. Moor will take his district, and Dr. Lakerman that of Mr. Moor; so that it is quite possible Dr. Lakerman may some day get the respectable class. The ministers are also bound to catechise the children of their respective districts; so that not only the children of the orphanage but those of the poor district are entirely given up to the teaching of that infidel. And he is, indeed, a very active, energetic man. He not only devotes ten hours a week to catechising the children, but he also delivers lectures on history, philosophy, and literature, which are largely attended by the well-educated class."

The more my friends told me of their Church, the more it became clear to me that the condition in which it was was utterly absurd and pernicious. I had many serious conversations with Mr. Van der Kemp about the responsibility which he and his party took upon themselves by thus passively submitting to a disorderly state of things, which could not but be a disgrace to Christ, and end in the spiritual ruin of the large majority of the people. I said to him, that in my opinion it was quite inconceivable how any good could come out of thus deliberately dividing the Church and the people into three different sections.

It appeared to me that a Christian who is conscious of his duty towards his Lord and Master, would rather allow himself to be turned out and deprived of everything than have aught to do with such a barefaced alliance between Christ and Belial.

Mr. Van der Kemp answered that he could quite understand how an Englishman, in whose country such a state of things was quite unknown, would pronounce such a judgment as I had pronounced. Indeed, he told me that, moved by that same spirit, some fifty thousand members of the Church had left the establishment sixty years ago, notwithstanding that the Government, which was then more autocratic than it is now, tried to scare them back by heavy persecutions. They formed a separatist church founded upon the old creed and church regulations, and in the beginning of their existence had to struggle hard, as very few of the clergy or of the well-to-do class joined the movement. They are, however, making much progress in the present day, owing to the increasingly absurd condition of the Church, and the fact that the law of the country protects dissenters from persecution.

Still Mr. Van der Kemp and the orthodox party at large cannot resolve to join them yet. Though he could not tell how the present difficulty would be satisfactorily removed, yet he could not help entertaining some hope that the Lord would in some way or other bring about a reformation. As to my observation that I would rather allow myself to be turned out than continue in such an anomalous body, he had only to say that, for a layman at least, such a thing as being turned out had become quite out of the question. The Church was at present in such a state of anarchy that it was out of a man's power to do anything that would justify his being punished by expulsion. The only way of leaving the Church was to resign one's membership; in other words to run away from it. But then you would run alone, for nobody would follow you, and the Church, with all its rights and properties, with its numerous channels for spreading its influence among the people, would be left in the hands of the infidels. Indeed, that is just what the modern party want. They would be quite pleased if the orthodox people would only leave the Church. In Mr. Van der Kemp's opinion, it is the duty of every Christian man to remain in the Church, and to fight for its rights till his last breath.

I think there is some logic in this.

"But," I said, after a pause, "suppose your orthodox minister, Mr. Willems, were to refuse to acknowledge Dr. Lakeman as his colleague, warn the people from his pulpit against his teaching, and urge them not to send their children to his catechisings, and send in a solemn protest to the Consistory against his being permitted to teach the children at the orphanage, what would be the consequence?"

"I believe he would be turned out by the ecclesiastical courts," Mr. Van der Kemp answered. "They would punish him as having broken the peace."

"And suppose he were turned out," I said; "would you and your party stick to him and follow him?"

"Well, it would depend upon circumstances," Mr. Van der Kemp answered, after a pause. "Mr. Willems might act in an injudicious and impetuous way, you see."

"Of course he might; but, then, who would have decided whether he had acted injudiciously or not?" Mr. Van der Kemp shrugged his shoulders again.

"I see how the matter stands now," I said. "You cannot be turned out, but your minister can. He, however, avoids pressing matters to that crisis, because he knows he cannot depend upon you. However cautiously and to the best of his knowledge he may direct his steps, he can never be sure that you will not discover some flaw or other in his conduct. So you will always have a reason to keep in, though he might be turned out."

Mr. Van der Kemp said nothing to that, but after this conversation we never spoke about the state of the Church any more. He studiously avoided it.

When leaving the town I deeply pitied the people, especially the orthodox party amongst them. Salt is good; but if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be seasoned?

The farewell address of Rev. Charles Voysey to his parishioners at Healaugh was a remarkable production. Tenderly, sweetly, with the utmost kindness, but with the utmost plainness of speech, he told them what he had done, and for what he was deprived of his living; he had taught them to think for themselves as both their privilege and their duty; he had represented God as an immeasurably better Being than he is generally believed to be; and if he had denied doctrines taught by the Orthodox party, it was almost solely because these doctrines—such as the Trinity, the atonement, endless punishment, and the infallibility of the Bible—dishonored God; he had insisted on morality as an essential part of religion. He was grateful to his people for standing by him so faithfully, but in accepting the issue he accepted the results, and rather than enjoy a good living with ease on condition of being in bonds, he threw himself upon the world without prospect of even earning a support, in order to be free and obedient to the truth. In reading such affectionate and courageous though reverent words, one cannot but feel that there is something wrong in the constitution and spirit of the Church that requires the teacher of such truths to quit its ministry, and to ask whether in every such degradation the great Teacher of Galilee is not crucified afresh.—Golden Age.

THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

[From the New York Illustrated Christian Weekly, August 26, 1871.]

The question of Sunday laws appears to be coming up in several different and somewhat perplexing forms, both in this country and in England.

In London prosecutions were recently set on foot under an old statute of Charles II., against the street-peddlers. The law was clear enough, and the magistrate enforced it, rather reluctantly. Thereupon some of those who were opposed to the law set on foot a prosecution against a different class of dealers, summoning, among others, the man who supplied the aristocracy with ice on Sunday morning. The ruse succeeded. Magistrates did not dare to interfere with the ice-dealers, and finally compromised the matter by announcing their determination to refuse all applications for summonses from individuals. This, which leaves the enforcement of the law in the hands of the attorney-general, where under the law it does not belong, is equivalent to a refusal to maintain the law at all. Notice has now been given in Parliament of a bill to repeal it.

In Toledo, as we have already informed our readers, a liberal club has been organized, with the avowed purpose of procuring a repeal of the Sunday laws, and now a similar movement has been instituted in Cincinnati. In both cities the movement originated among the Germans, and appears to have been instigated by the lager-beer makers and sellers. Thus the question is really reduced to one between church and lager-beer. [!] The first plan was to nominate anti-Sabbatarian candidates. This was abandoned, and, in lieu of it, the proposal was made to interrogate the candidates of both parties, and demand a pledge to vote for the repeal of Sunday legislation. On the whole the movement has done good. It has aroused and crystallized a Sabbath sentiment which before had been dormant. The religious portion of the Germans have met and publicly disavowed all sympathy with the movement. A public meeting, called to oppose the proposed repeal, filled Pike's opera house with an immense crowd, and it is estimated that two thousand were turned away, unable to find even standing-room. The indications are that the effort to repeal the Sunday laws will die a natural death, and that at all events candidates for public office will think twice before they pledge themselves to vote for their repeal.

In New York city the Sunday question has arisen in a very curious manner. A certain Jew has a manufactory near one of the churches. His room is filled with sewing-machines. The worshippers in the church complain that the noise of his machines is so great as to drown the voice of their minister, and seriously to interrupt their public worship. They have had him arrested, accordingly, under the Sunday laws. He replies that he is a Jew, that Saturday is his Sabbath, and that he cannot afford to take two Sabbaths in the week. It must be conceded that, looked at from the Jew's standpoint, the case appears to be one of peculiar hardship. But it does not follow that he has any more right to carry on his business in such a way as to destroy the Sabbath worship of his neighbors, than he would have to carry it on at night in such a way as to murder sleep.

There is, of course, a good deal of cant about the puritanic intolerance that endeavors by legislation to compel one's neighbors to observe the Sabbath. It is difficult to believe that those who use such language do not know better. The Sabbatarians have no desire to compel their neighbors to observe the Sabbath. They could not, if they would. Sabbath observance is of the heart, and a law is as powerless to compel it as it is to produce that sincere and heartfelt worship which is one of the essentials of true Sabbath observance.

But the Sabbatarians believe that, irrespective of religious considerations, one day's rest in seven is essential to the welfare of the community. They believe that physiology, that history, that individual experience demonstrate this. They believe, especially, that the laboring classes have a right to have this their rest-day respected, and a decent regard for it enforced, if need be. They believe, too, that not only the welfare of the individual soul, but the moral welfare of the community, imperatively requires one day in seven consecrated to religious worship and religious instruction. They believe that to abolish this day would be to strike the hardest blow that could be struck against the peace, the prosperity, the permanent liberty of the nation. Sabbath legislation may need modification. But the anti-Sabbatarians may rest assured that the public sentiment which has been aroused in Cincinnati exists everywhere else, and that any attempt to abolish from our statute-books the Sabbath, and relegate America to the condition of France in the days of the revolution, will not succeed without a contest whose proportions they have not even remotely imagined. If there was no divine law, if the Sabbath rested simply on expediency, the same principle which gives us a right to such police regulations as will preserve the night from disturbances which destroy sleep, gives us a right to such police regulations as will preserve the Sabbath rest and Sabbath worship from anything which seriously interferes therewith.

The Rev. Moses Clampt, an eccentric preacher, was holding forth at Santa Clara Valley; a young man rose to go out, when the preacher said, "Young man, if you'd rather go to perdition than hear me preach, you may." The sinner stopped, and reflected a moment, and then saying, "Well, I believe I would," went off.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Although not fully agreeing with your 'Fifty Affirmations' and stand-point of belief, I am exceedingly well pleased (in the main) with your lectures and editorials, and also with THE INDEX generally, and am desirous that it should have an extensive circulation, to aid in freeing mankind from the mental bondage that priestcraft has so long imposed on them. You will please send me one hundred copies of 'Truths for the Times,' and find enclosed one dollar, your price for same, and I will endeavor to circulate them. Yet the Boston Investigator is the publication which has fully met my views during the last twenty-five years. I regret to see in THE INDEX of the 18th inst. (which seems to be editorial) in an article headed 'Personal Government,' such keen remarks on the President. Politics should be (in my opinion) discussed in political papers, and not in one devoted to Free Religion. You will lose friends, assuredly, if you enter upon political discussions. Yours truly in the cause of mental freedom."

"I notice by the religious press that THE INDEX still lives, and has commenced its second volume, notwithstanding the early 'prophecy' of the Liberal Christian that its demise would soon occur. Having taken THE INDEX for the past year, in conjunction with Mr. —, I find that I cannot well be without it for 1871. I think it is a paper that the free-thinking population of our country have long wished for. I have tried to get you some subscribers in this locality. But as the prevalent religious belief is orthodoxy, my efforts have not been crowned with success. Some of the 'rigidly righteous' hold up their hands in holy horror, and will not look at the 'infidel' sheet. Several have offered me tracts of a fiery nature, warning me to repent and discard my 'infidel' views, before it is too late. But, like the man that recommended for your perusal 'Nelson on Infidelity,' they mean well enough."

"I learn that man's immortality is to you mainly a hope, rather than a scientific reality. I am aware that it is almost, if not quite impossible to prove it scientifically—but starting with the belief that the inmost of every man is God individualized, it seems to me to follow as a necessary sequence, that man, who is a partaker of the whole of his nature, though not to an infinite extent, is immortal, because God is immortal. It is true that God is partially individualized in trees, animals, and in all Nature—yet this latter is only partial, not including his moral qualities—so that immortality is not a natural sequence outside of man. You have probably thought this view of the case through and through—but I mention it, because to me it is a satisfactory solution of that question."

"Allow me to add one more to the numerous testimonials you are receiving, from all parts of the country, of the cordial and hearty sympathy you are awakening in the hearts of earnest thinking men and women with your efforts to teach mankind one very simple but very comprehensive and all-important truth, which thousands have known and felt, but few in this priest-ridden and creed-cursed world have dared to utter, namely—We can and must save ourselves; that just to the extent we believe and act upon this proposition shall we become truly noble, great, and good; that just to the extent we believe and act upon the converse, relying upon another's merits and upon propitiatory sacrifices and atonements, shall we be morally dwarfed—degraded—paralyzed."

"I write to renew my subscription. Two dollars (which I enclose) will cancel my indebtedness from a commercial standpoint. Accept also, I beg of you, my earnest thanks and heartfelt sympathy. I am trying quietly to demonstrate in our business the excellence and beauty of simple justice and benevolence. I am happy to say that I have not been unsuccessful. My circumstances are favorable to the dissipation of ignorant prejudice. I find my principles are daily 'weighed in the balance,' and the result of this practical popular test is, I rejoice to say, a gain of friendship."

"The Society there has a very high order of intellect. Its members constitute the controlling element of that community. I have tried to get subscribers among them. They think you too radical. You are only two or three years ahead of them; that is all the trouble. They will soon 'come through.' The harvest is nearly ripe all over the country. I am glad the sickles are ready."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be held for the present in GERMAN HALL, St. Clair St., on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE WILBURN FUND.—Additional donations for Miss Cora Wilburn are thankfully acknowledged as follows:—

C. W. WELCH,	Cambridge,	Mass.,	$10.00
O. P. Q.,	Sheffield,	Mass.,	2.00
S. S. BOKER,	Keokuk,	Iowa,	1.00

Poetry.

IF.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

O love, if we should come to feel
The heart no more in gladness beat,
When at the door we hear, as now,
The tread of dear, familiar feet—

If we, who now through fire and flood
Would rush to touch but finger-tips,
Should come to coldly meet, and greet
With careless clasp and loveless lips—

If we, who in each other's life
Live doubly every joy and pain,
Should come to coldly drift apart
And walk in self-wrapt ways again—

If morn should come and lose its rose,
And night the glory of her skies,
And all things pale and fade because
We look no more with love's deep eyes—

If down the dreary beaten way,
Where other hearts that loved do tread
With sad indifference, we too
Should come to find our passion dead—

O God! I'd wish that we to-day
Had said "Farewell!" and in a breath,
While yet our hearts were fond and true,
Had fiercely crushed our love to death!

MIGNONETTE.

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

For Special Notices see eighth page.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
No subscription is payable until $50,000 shall have been subscribed; and then only ten (10) per cent. will be payable annually. No indebtedness can be incurred in any current year by the Association beyond ten (10) per cent. of the stock at that time actually subscribed. Subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
C. CONE,	"	"	Ten	" 1,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	" 1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	" 1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	" 1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	" 1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	" 1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	" 300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	" 300
J. M. KITCHIE,	"	"	"	" 300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	" 300
ALANSON WOOD,	"	"	"	" 300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	" 500
J. G. HOLZWARTH,	"	"	One	" 100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	" 100
C. ATCHARD,	"	"	"	" 100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	" 3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	" 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Three	" 300
GEO. ROADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	Two	" 200
	Defiance,	"	One	" 100
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	" 100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	" 100
J. SEDGEBER,	Painesville,	O.,	"	" 100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	" 300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	" 500
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	" 100
J. L. WHITING,	Boston,	"	"	" 100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	" 100
J. E. SUTTON,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	" 100
S. I. DUKKE,	"	"	"	" 100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	" 100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	" 1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	" 200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	" 200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	" 200
	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
FRANK PRATHER,	Wellsville,	Kan.,	One	" 100
E. P. DINSMORE,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	" 200
J. T. DICKINSON,	Middlefield,	Ct.,	Fourteen,	" 1,400
W. J. POTTER,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three,	" 300
G. C. GLATTE,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	" 300
W. C. GANNETT,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	" 300
MISS M. C. PERKINS,	"	"	One	" 100
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	" 100
MISS E. EMERSON,	"	"	"	" 100
W. H. DOWNES,	Birmingham,	Mich.,	"	" 100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing,	Mich.,	"	" 100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	" 100
W. C. RUSSELL,	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	" 100
C. L. CLARK,	Toledo,	O.,	Three	" 300
C. L. SMITH,	"	"	One	" 100
	"	"	Twenty	" 2,000
J. N. LYMAN,	Cincinnati,	"	One	" 100
L. G. FELCH,	Monroe Centre,	"	"	" 100
A. FOLBOM,	Boston,	Mass.,	Three	" 300
L. O. BASS,	Colebrook,	Conn.,	One	" 100
S. E. SEWALL,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	" 500
ELIZUR WRIGHT,	"	"	"	" 500
E. B. WARD,	Detroit,	Mich.,	Twenty	" 2,000
A. D. WILT,	Dayton,	O.,	One	" 100
S. S. BONEB,	Keokuk,	Iowa,	"	" 100
WM. JONES,	Peekskill,	N. Y.,	"	" 100
	Oskaloosa,	Iowa,	"	" 100

$29,600

A SIMPLE DISTINCTION.

Mr. Galton, in his interesting work on "Hereditary Genius" (page 21), makes remarks which will be appreciated by every experienced public speaker:—"It often occurs to persons familiar with some scientific subject to hear men and women of mediocre gifts relate to one another what they have picked up about it from some lecture—say at the Royal Institution—where they have sat for an hour listening with delighted attention to an admirably lucid account, illustrated by experiments of the most perfect and beautiful character, in all of which they expressed themselves intensely gratified and highly instructed. It is positively painful to hear what they say. Their recollections seem to be a mere chaos of mist and misapprehension, to which some sort of shape and organization has been given by the action of their own pure fancy, altogether alien to what the lecturer intended to convey. The average mental grasp of what is called a well-educated audience will be found to be ludicrously small, when rigorously tested."

